BEN AND BILL.—Certainly, we welcome boys the same as girls to the Corner. What made you think we did not like boys? We suppose they do not like to write letters as well as girls, is the reason we do not receive more of them.

Juvenil.

Children rarely comprehend the idea that providence watches over all they do, and seldom appreciate the fact so often taught them, in different ways, that what seems to them impossible is possible with the alleged disposer of all events.

An illustration of this came to our knowledge the other day, which we think is good enough to go into print.

A little boy about five years of age was sent to the grocery store at the corner on some trifling errand, and while there his bright eyes lighted upon a barrel of pippins exposed temptingly to view just outside the door. In going out, it appears he took one, and returned to his mother munching it.

"Where did you get that nice apple, Willie?" inquired his mother.

"Dot it at the docery," replied Willie.

"Did the man giv it to you?"

"No; I took it."

"Why, Willie, that was naughty! You should not take apples or anything else without permission."

"But nobody saw me."

"Oh, yes, Willie, there was one who saw you."

"Who?"

"Why, God saw you."

Willie stopped a moment to consider, and then with a good deal of satisfaction expressed in his face, replied:

"No, he didn't, ma. There was an awning over the store!"—Ex.

Let Children Go Barefooted.

Children who are allowed to go barefooted enjoy almost perfect immunity from the danger of "cold" by accidental chilling of the feet, and they are much healthier and happier than those who, in obedience to the usages of social life, hav their lower extremities permanently invalided, and, so to say, carefully swathed and put away in rigid cases. As regards the poorer classes of children, there can be no sort of doubt in the mind of any one that it is incomparably better that they should go barefooted than wear boots that let in the wet, and stockings that are nearly always damp and foul. If every one could go barefooted during the warm weather, it would be much better for the feet; corns would disappear, cramped toes straighten out and grow to a natural size, and the foot also would become more beautiful and healthy.—Herald of Health.

A Prayer of the People.

Giv us, good Lord, the germ of truth
To light the mind of man,
That Age, in clasping hands with Youth,
Its own defect may scan.

Giv us a church without a creed,
Nor compassed round about
With windows stained, and self, and greed,
And all the poor left out;

A church that sets to thought no bound,
No muzzle on the lips,
Where hypocrits are never found,
Nor rum upon its ships.

Giv us no laws that bind and curse
Pale Science with her star,
That make a gray-haired woman worse
Than foulest felons are.

Giv us no jails that crowd and look
To see the martyrs come,
When just a new thought in a book
Has struck the bigots dumb.

Giv us no governmental spies
That hire folks to sin,
And tell ten thousand pious lies
To take the people in.

Giv us no base informers, please,
Who claim one-half the fines,
For craven creatures like to these
Hav skulked within the lines.

Giv us no rich monopolist
With bonds well salted down,
While famin drives, with bony fist,
Sad wretches in the town.

Giv us a flag, red, white, and blue
(A phantom heretofore),
Whose morning dream may yet be true,
To guard the weak and poor.

Giv us the judge who gilds no crime,
Though one be rich and strong
To cross his palm with silver's chime,
And stifle right with wrong.

Giv us the freedom that shall reach
And overlook the earth,
When liberty is more than speech,
And equity has birth.

Giv us the law that takes the thief
Of many things or few,
Nor claims the farmer's hard-earned sheaf,
As untaxed millions do.

Giv us a shield for every press—
That boast of years gone by—
And giv, oh, giv some swift redress
When legislators lie.

Giv us a mighty chieftain, Lord,
The monarch who is man,
Take from the wall our father's sword
For Labor's rising clan.

Giv us true laws, a priceless boon
To every sex and race,
When liberty unveils at noon
The new birth of her face.

Giv us the free light of the pen,
A sweeter pen than mine,
Where souls of women grand, and men,
Through centuries shall shine.

The Proper Date for Excommunicating Folks.

From Henry George's Standard.

The weeks are passing, and since Dr. McGlynn as yet makes no sign of going to Rome, the forty days of the summons of which the archbishop's secretary has informed the press will soon be up, and it will be the privilege of "his grace" to place by name on this "subject," who insists on acting like a citizen, the major excommunication. This, once vulgarly known as excommunication by bell, book, and candle, is what might be termed in vulgar speech of the present day the "big boycott." Once the boldest might well hav quailed before it, for, though in Italy it never amounted to very much, and Italian barons would sometimes make a papal legate eat a bull of excommunication—parchment, wax, lead seals, and ribbons—in parts of Europe farther removed from the holy see it struck like the whitening of leprosy, shutting off its victim from intercourse with his kind. Even if its operation had not been somewhat modified in more recent times, it could, of course, hav no such effect in this country. But it would still be, from its historical associations, a very imposing ceremony, and it is to be hoped that if Archbishop Corrigan does it at all, he will do it in public. For not only would many of our "best society"—Protestant even more than Catholic—enjoy it immensely, but the newspapers would all print full reports. And, if he will pardon the suggestion, the most appropriate day for the archbishop to excommunicate Dr. McGlynn would be the 22d of June, which this year comes on Wednesday. To be sure, the forty days, which, through his secretary, Archbishop Corrigan has informed the public are given to Dr. McGlynn to present himself fore Cardinal Simeoni, will not then hav quite expired, but still, if Dr. McGlynn does not sail for Rome before the 22d, it will be physically impossible for him to get there within the forty days, and the archbishop may safely proceed with the excommunication. The 22d of June is, indeed, of all the days in the year, so eminently appropriate for such a purpose, that if, through any misgivings, the archbishop feels compelled to deny himself the pleasure of excommunicating Dr. McGlynn on the 22d of June instant, he ought to wait until another 22d of June comes around.

For on the 22d of June, 1633, in a hall in the palace of the sacred congregation of the Inquisition, before the scarlet-robed cardinals of the holy office, among whom sat one of Archbishop Corrigan's favorit authorities, the Jesuit Bellarmine, there knelt a trembling old man of seventy, weakened by long imprisonment, and, as some say, by the torture of the rack. However this may be, sore indeed must hav been the anguish, whether of mind or body, which that venerable old man must hav undergone before he could hav been bent to take the part he did in the tragedy there enacted.

For then and there kneeling, with his open hand on the holy gospels, the old man on oath denied what in his inmost heart he knew to be God's truth, and denied and cursed the revelation that the heavens had made to him.

The exact words that he repeated, as they were entered on the records of the holy office, were these:

Solem esse in centro mundi et immobilem motu locati propositio absurda, et falsa in philosophia, et formaliter haeretica, quia est expresse contraria sacrae scripturae.

Terram non esse centram mundi, nec immobilem, sed moveri motu etiam diurno, est etiam propositio absurda et falsa in philosophia, et theologice considerata, ad minus, erronea in fide.

Corde sincero et fide non ficta, abjuro, maledico, et detesto supradictos errores et haereses.

Which, being translated into English, is:

That the sun is the center of the universe, and immovable by local motion, is an absurd proposition, false in philosophy, and formally heretical; because it is expressly contrary to sacred scripture!

That the earth is not the center of the universe nor immovable, but is moved even by a diurnal motion, is also an absurd proposition, false in philosophy, and theologically considered, at least, erroneous in faith.

With a sincere heart and unfeigned faith I abjure, curse, and detest the above-mentioned errors and heresies.

Thus two centuries and a half ago was Galileo compelled to deny on oath that the earth moves round the sun—a truth he saw as clearly as Dr. McGlynn now sees a truth that in the social sphere is as grand and inspiring, and that to the lives of men is far more important.

But the world still moved.

"The Jewish Life of Christ, being the Sepher Toldoth Jeshu or Book of the Generation of Jesus, translated from the Hebrew, edited (with an historical preface and voluminous notes) by G. W. Foote and J. M. Wheeler;" 48 pages. Price sixpence. London: Progressive Publishing Company, 1887, second edition, is a reprint of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Sepher Toldoth Jeshu," by "Scholasticus" alias "Antichrist," and the editors hav made good use of "Antichrist's" notes and comments. This is all right, and we are glad to know that so useful a work has been reprinted in England. It seems that after the republication was announced in England it was discovered that in 1823 a complete translation of the "Toldoth Jeshu" was made by a Jew and published by Richard Carlile. But there was no copy of it to be found in the British Museum. And the translation of 1823 was objectionable on account of its close adherence to the original in that part relating to the amours of Joseph Pandera and the Virgin Mary, which "Scholasticus" veiled in Latin. Otherwise he might hav been numbered among the martyrs to obscenity whose names will be inscribed on the crown of Comstock in the kingdom of heaven.

Why No Scotchmen Go to Heaven.

Years ago, in times so remote that history does not fix the epoch, a dreadful war was waged by the king of Scotland. Scottish valor prevailed, and the king of Scotland, elated by his success, sent for his prime minister, Lord Alexander.

"Weel, Sandy," said he, "is there ne'er a king we canna conquer noo?"

"An' it please your majesty, I ken o' a king that your majesty canna vanquish."

"An' who is he, Sandy?"

The minister, reverently looking up, said, "The king o' heaven."

"The king o' whaur, Sandy?"

"The king o' heaven."

The Scottish king did not understand, but was unwilling to exhibit any ignorance.

"Just gang your ways, Sandy, an' tell king o' heaven to gi'e up his dominions, or I'll come mysel' and ding him oot o' them; an' mind, Sandy, ye dinna come back tae us until ye hae dane oor biddin'."

Lord Alexander retired much perplexed, but met a priest, and, reassured, returned and presented himself.

"Weel, Sandy," said the king, "hae you seen the king o' heaven, an' what says he tae oor biddin'?"

"An' it please your majesty, I hae seen ane o' his accredited ministers."

"Weel, an' what says he?"

"He says your majesty may e'en hae his kingdom for the askin' o' it."

"Was he sae civil?" said the king, warming to magnanimity. "Just gang your ways back, Sandy, an' tell the king o' heaven that for his civility the de'il a Scotchman shall set foot in his kingdom."—Chambers's Journal.

Working Off a Farm Under Pulpit Influence.

"Your price is too high," said an Eastern speculator, as he rode over the farm of a Dakota man living near Fargo. "I can't pay $5,000 for such land as this."

"It's worth it, though," replied the owner.

"Why, look here; it's all low, flat land."

"Yes."

"Covered with water half the year."

"Yes, just about."

"The soil is heavy and cold."

"Yes, middling heavy and cold."

"Then how do you make out that it's worth $5,000?"

"My friend, do you see that hole over there back of the barn?"

"Yes, digging a well, I should judge."

"Supposed to be, but it has a deeper meaning than that. That hole is down sixty feet, and I hav two dead dogs in the bottom."

"Well, what's the scheme?"

"Why, you buy the land for $5,000, dogs begin to smell good and strong in about a week, expert sniffs around and pronounces it natural gas, Fargo papers full of it, farm sold for $25,000 inside of two days, clear profit of $20,000! See it?"

"Ye-es, the plan appears feasible, but why don't you work it yourself?"

"Me? Why, you see, I'm a minister, and the people in my church are getting so very particular that I don't want to try it. But I'll let you hav the place at those low figures and preach a powerful sermon the next day after the expert is here, and point out the fact that natural gas in the Red River Valley is prophesied about away back in Deuteronomy."—Dakota Bell.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us."—N. Y. Sun.

1 vol. 8vo. Cloth. About 600 pages.

Price, $2.50.

KERSEY GRAVES'S WORKS.

Sixteen Saviors or None. By KERSEY GRAVES, auther of the World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors; The Bible of Bibles, and Biography of Satan. Cloth, 75cts.; paper, 50cts.

Biography of Satan; or, a Historical Exposition of the Devil and his Fiery Domains. Price, 35 cents.

Bible of Bibles; or, Twenty-seven Divine Revelations, containing a description of twenty-seven bibles and an exposition of two thousand biblical errors in science, history, morals, religion, and general events. Also a delineation of the characters of the principal personages of the Christian Bible and an examination of their doctrins. Price, $1.75.

The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors; or, Christianity Before Christ. Containing new and startling revelations in religious history, which disclose the oriental origin of all the doctrines, principles, precepts, and miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a key for unlocking many of its sacred mysteries, besides comprising the history of sixteen oriental crucified gods.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

Services of "song and praise" were held in a number of Episcopal churches in this city on the 19th in honor of the queen's jubilee. The London police report the discovery of plots to blow up that city with dynamite during the week.

Mr. Blaine, of Maine, is in England.

An Episcopal church worth $30,000 was burnt at Dorchester, Mass., last week.

The Massachusetts legislature has rejected the proposed Prohibition amendment.

Emperor William, of Germany, is better of his influenza. The crown prince's throat trouble, the doctors say, may not be cancer.

President Cleveland ordered all Confederate battle flags captured in the late war to be returned to the states whence they originally came. The order raised great indignation in the Grand Army and was rescinded.

A boy playing baseball at Reidsville, N. C., had the misfortune to hit the Rev. George Pittard in the face. He went forward to apologize, and the minister knocked him down and stamped upon him, inflicting injuries from which he died. Pittard has disappeared.

The Farmers' Institute of South Renfrew, Ont., has passed resolutions in favor of free trade with the United States, and pledging the institute to do its utmost to carry such policy to a successful issue.

A mob attacked the Salvation Army at Quebec last Sunday, and pelted them with stones. One young woman is fatally injured.

The attendance at the Anti-Poverty meeting last Sunday evening crowded the Academy of Music, and the overflow filled Irving Hall. George and McGlynn addressed both audiences.

Some of the striking silversmiths are going back to work. They are allowed to take their old positions without agreeing to forsake their labor organizations, and so they regard the strike as a victory.

A man named Straumbach, of Salem, Ill., says he killed the unknown girl found murdered in Rahway, N. J., last April. It is believed that the confession is made by Straumbach, who is a musical tramp, in order that he may get a free passage East.

Mrs. Peter Eirich, whose husband, the Rev. Peter Eirich, is suing for divorce, says the reason she left the reverend gentleman is because he wanted to handle all her money, of which she possessed a considerable amount, and to obtain control of which, Mrs. Eirich fears, her husband was induced to marry her. She also alleges brutal treatment which made her life with him miserable.

There is an unprecedented exodus from this city on Sundays. The closing of the beer saloons and gardens does away also with the trade in "soft drinks" like soda and lemonade by closing the places where they are usually obtained. Hence, whether the citizen wants beer or lemonade, his best chance of quenching his thirst is outside the city limits. However, if he chooses to sneak in at a back door like a thief he can get liquor in New York even on Sunday.

From 10,000 to 15,000 persons paraded last Saturday night at the McGlynn demonstration. There were numberless bands and fife and drum corps, and banners and mottoes expressing the sentiments of the participants. One motto which might reasonably hav been expected to appear numerously was conspicuous for its absence, namely, "To hell with the pope." This omission entails a heavy responsibility upon somebody. In popular demonstrations the sentiments of the majority should not be veiled.

Gems of Thought.

The greatest gain we can make is knowledge. This will help us to cause the world to grow better more than all other agencies we can employ.—D. M. Bennett.

The Augæan stables of the world—the accumulated uncleanness and misery of centuries—require a mighty river to cleanse them thoroughly away. Every drop we contribute aids to swell that river and augment its force into a degree appreciable by God, though not by man; and he whose zeal is deep and earnest will not be over-anxious that his individual drop should be distinguishable amid the mighty mass of cleansing and fertilizing waters, far less that, for the sake of distinction, it should flow in ineffectiv singleness away. He will not be careful that his name should be inscribed upon the mite which he casts into the treasury of God. It should suffice each of us to know that, if we hav labored, with purity of purpose in any good cause, we must hav contributed to its success; that the degree in which we hav contributed is a matter of infinitly small concern; and still more, that the consciousness of having so contributed, however obscurely and unnoticed, should be our sufficient, if our sole, reward. Let us cherish this faith, it is a duty. He who sows and reaps is a good laborer, and worthy of his hire. But he who sows what shall be reaped by others who know not and seek not of the sower, is a laborer of a nobler order, and worthy of a loftier guerdon.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

"Your last day must be a ruthless kind of spiritual butchery," said Richard, "if a poor soul is punished for not having learned, when in the body, what farms belonging to her were let, and for how much and to whom. How you Christians can imagin such a divine being as he whom you worship I cannot conceive. Your God of love is more cruel than Moloch; your divine reason more insensate than Juggernaut."—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord.

SARAH GIVETH UP THE GHOST.

And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her.—xxiii, 2.

Odds and Ends.

A friend of ours calls a pretty little schoolm'am up town, "Experience," because she is such a dear teacher.

In a Hebrew school: "What crime did Joseph's brothers commit in selling him?" All the pupils in chorus: "They sold him too cheap."

From an old bachelor's album: "It's too soon to marry when one is young, and too late when one is old. The interval may profitably be devoted to reflection."

The average baseball player gets $2,000. The average minister $500. The average baseball audience is two thousand; the average congregation five hundred.

A country editor says: "An interesting article entitled: 'The Soul After Death, and What Becomes of It,' is crowded out this week to make room for more important matter."

A Lowell minister preached last Sunday on "Why do the Wicked Liv?" We don't know surely why they do, but we might suggest mildly that if the wicked didn't liv it would be a cold day for the ministers.

There is a summer hotel in New Hampshire called the Quoquinnapasskessananaguog House. The name runs twice around the building and then away out into the woods, where it is used as a trail by fishing parties.

W. H. Doane, of Cincinnati, makes $20,000 a year writing hymns. Rider Haggard and his parodists don't make this much in a lifetime by writing "Hes," "Shes," and "Its." This shows that it pays to be religious.

While some Baptist ministers were immersing a convert at Lake Kampeska, Ia., they allege that they saw a sea serpent swimming with its head and twelve feet of its body standing above the water. When ministers begin to see such snakes as that, it is no wonder that Ohio voted for prohibition.

While Jay Gould was traveling on the Wabash system he stopped over for dinner at a little town in southern Illinois. The party ate some eggs, among other things, and when the bill was presented to Gould it contained the item, "One dozen eggs, $1.80." The great railroad magnate remarked that eggs must be at a premium in that section, to which the restaurant-keeper replied, "No, sir; eggs are plenty enough; but Jay Goulds are mighty scarce."

That is a good story they are now telling at the expense of the Rev. Dr. Phillips Brooks, of Boston. This is the way it runs: The genial autocrat was fishing one day in the yacht of a well-known character of East Gloucester, named Captain Cook, who follows the sea for a livelihood. In conversation, Captain Cook informed Dr. Holmes that the last fisherman who had hired his boat was Dr. Brooks. "He was very pleasant company," Captain Cook was kind enough to say, "but he swore a good deal for a clergyman." "He did what?" inquired Dr. Holmes, aghast. "He swore," stoutly reiterated Captain Cook. "Oh, nonsense, I don't believe it," said the doctor. "Well, what do you call this?" inquired the old fisherman: "He got a haddock on his hook, and he had a great deal of trouble to get it near the boat. At last he landed him, and I said, said I: 'Well, for a haddock, that fish pulled d—n hard.' 'Yes, he did,' said Dr. Brooks. Now, what's that but swearing?"

"How is the work progressing in Dakota?" asked a Boston minister of a good brother who livs in Dakota at the Baptist anniversaries the other day. "Well, I am getting along pretty well, but still it's rather discouraging," replied the Dakota man with an air of despondency. "Isn't there any religious interest out there? Can't you awaken it? Or won't they come to church?" "No, it isn't that. The first week I went there I had big congregations. One day there were one hundred and fifty down on their knees weeping and praying. A man came in and said there were two detectivs coming down the road, and every blessed person got up and skipped."

EVER NEW AND FAIR TO SIGHT.

"Oh, the drums were heard and the picolo note, as the circus up town paraded, and the shorn-off mule and the whiskered goat, and the elephant umber-shaded. I followed it calmly at early morn, my work and my labors spurning, and I harked to the sound of a rusty horn with a wild and unhallowed yearning. Few and short were the tunes they played, and they paused not at all to monkey, so I slowly followed the route they made at the heels of the lop-eared donkey. I bought up a seat at the show that night, and looked at the limber woman, who tied herself in a knot so tight she seemed more like hemp than human. And I eagerly looked at the wondrous bloke who swallowed some cotton blazing, and blew from his nostrils a cloud of smoke, till I thought he was sheol raising. And I watched the clown as he ran and rolled, and stood in a dozen poses, and worked off a string of jokes so old, they came from the time of Moses."

"Where can I buy a pair of cuffs?" inquired a late riser of an Austin hotel proprietor one Sunday morning. "Don't believe you can buy them anywhere," replied the hotel man, "clothing stores are all closed up until four o'clock in the evening." "Well, where can I get a cocktail? I am as dry as a puff-ball." "Can't. Saloons are all closed until after four o'clock." "I suppose I can get a glass of sweet cider at some corner grocery, can't I?" "Not much; groceries are all closed up until after four o'clock." "Are, eh? Then I guess I'll hav to go down to some drug store and get a glass of plain soda." "Can't do that, either. Drug stores are not allowed to sell soda until after four o'clock." The man moved mournfully over to the water-cooler, and had about half filled a tumbler, when a policeman in front of the hotel commenced shooting at a suspicious-looking dog. The hotel guest dropped the glass, jumped about fourteen feet, and running behind the office desk shouted: "Don't shoot again cap.! I won't touch a drop of your darned old ice-water until after four o'clock. If you think it is too rich for my blood, I'll practice self-denial and spit cotton until sundown."

JUST AWAY.

I cannot say, and I will not say
That he is dead. He is just away!

With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand
He has wandered into an unknown land,

And left us dreaming how very fair
It needs must be, since he lingers there.

And you, oh, you, who the wildest yearn
For the old-time step and the glad return,

Think of him faring on, as dear
In the love of there as the love of here;

And loyal still, as he gave the blows
Of his warrior strength to his country's foes;

Mild and gentle as he was brave—
When the sweetest love of his life he gave

To simple things. Where the violets grew
Pure as the eyes they were likened to.

The touches of his hands hav stayed
As reverently as his lips hav prayed.

When the little brown thrush that harshly chirred
Was dear to him as the mocking bird;

And he pitied as much as a man in pain
A writhing honey bee wet with rain.

Think of him still as the same, I say,
He is not dead, he is just away!

Protestant, as well as Catholic, Christianity discourages investigation and love of truth, by instilling into the mind unmanly fears respecting the consequences of coming to conclusions in conflict with accepted dogmas. How can a man, educated to believe a system that forbids doubting—the beginning of all wisdom—regarding its truth, make an impartial examination of its claims, or the claims of other systems opposed to it, or investigate without fear or favor questions that are related to it?—Underwood's Lectures and Essays.

In this austere solitude [the hermitage to which Peter had withdrawn] his body was emaciated; his fancy was inflamed; whatever he wished he believed; whatever he believed he saw in dreams and revelations. . . Such is credulity that miracles, most doubtful in the spot and at the moment, will be received with implicit faith at a convenient distance of time and space.—Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.

Advancing years brought no diminution of Hume's gayety of spirit, nor did even the approach of death overshadow that cheerful serenity for which he had all his life been remarkable. There are those who hav thought it strange that the end should come thus to a man of David Hume's opinions. A more dismal closing would hav been in better keeping, they think, with such a career. But timidity or fortitude, in the face of the inevitable, is but a poor test of the truth of a man's belief.—Principal Caird, D.D.

The weak thing, weaker than a child, becomes strong one day if it be a true thing—Carlyle.

Notes and Clippings.

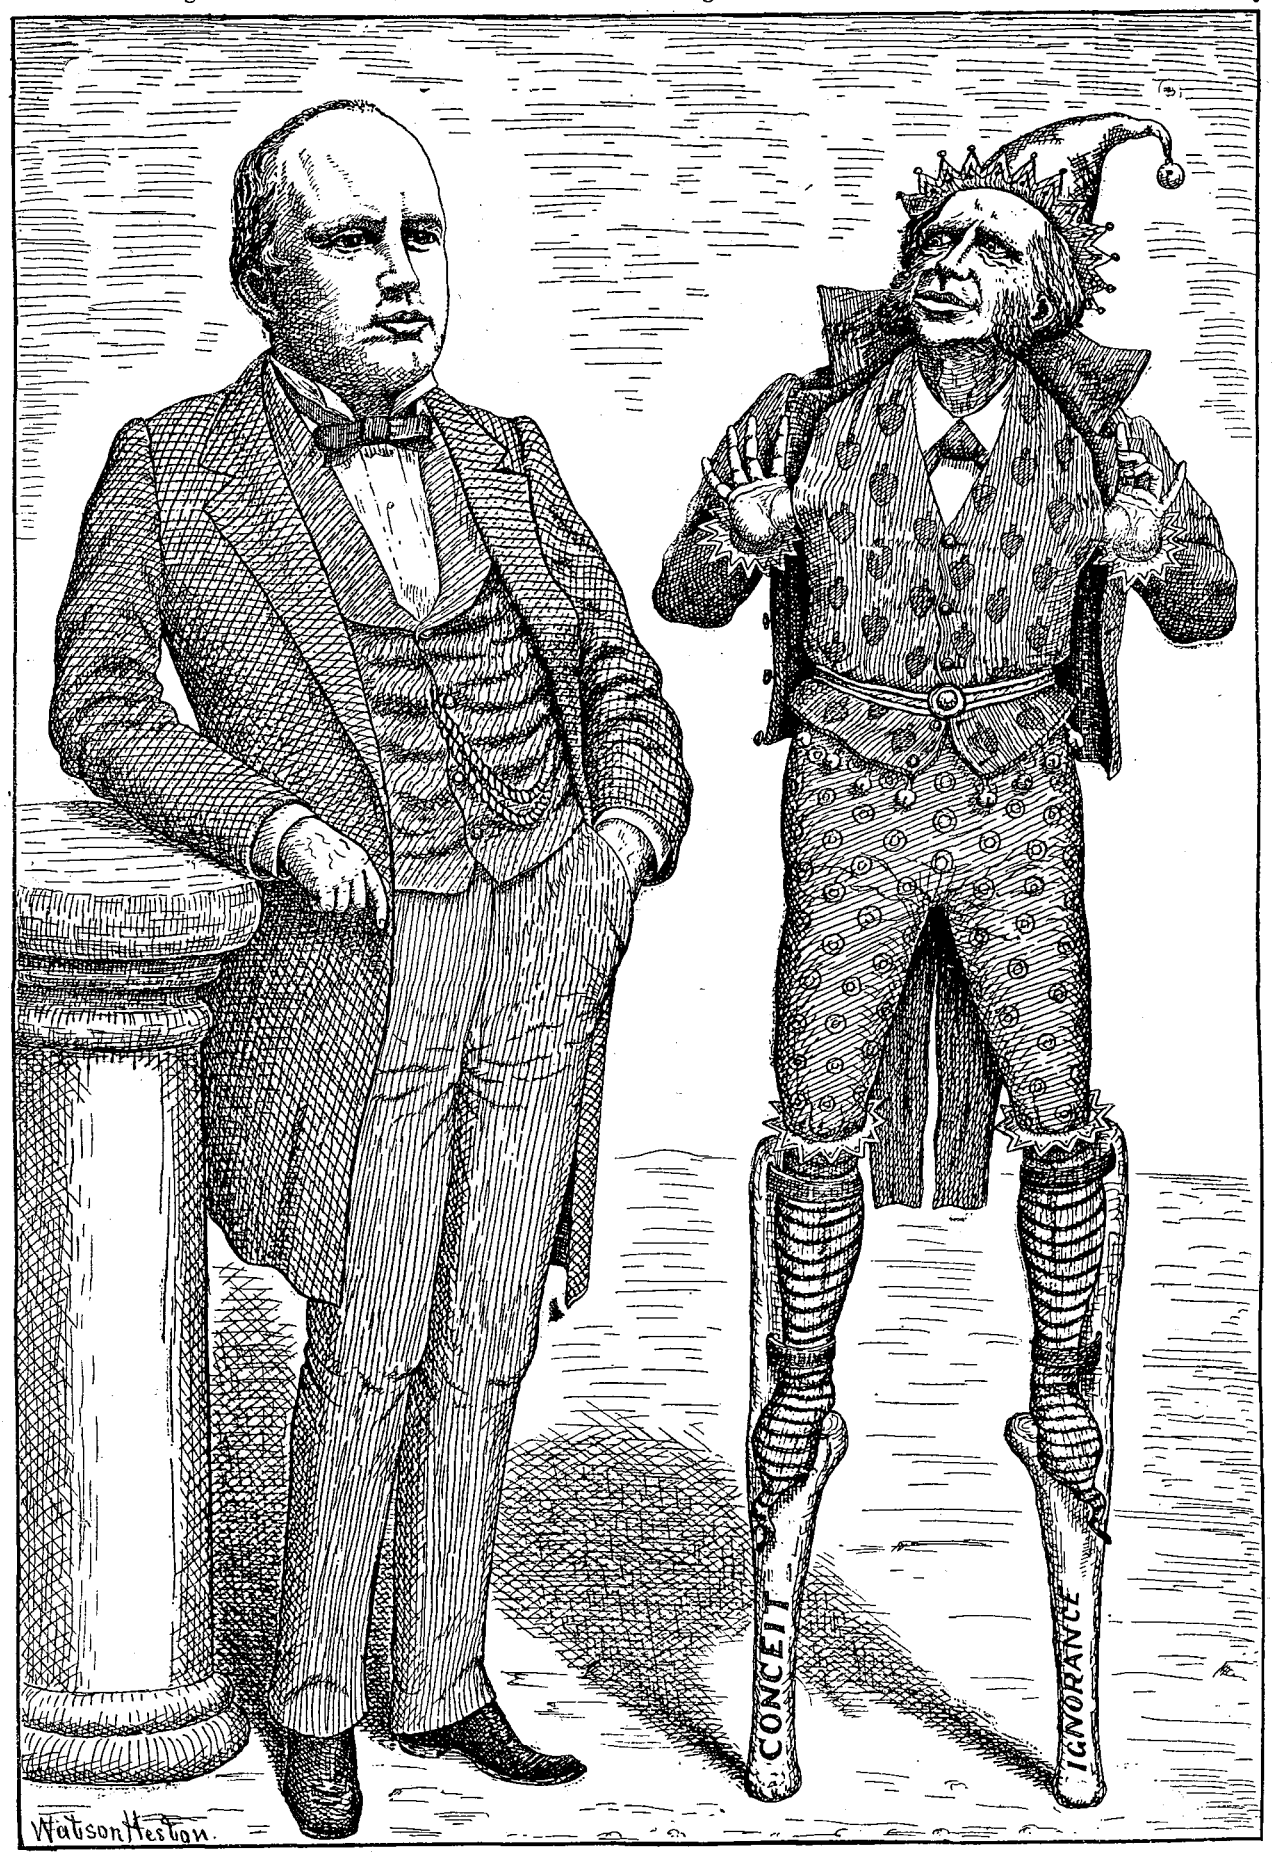
THE New York Episcopalians are having some difficulty in finding a suitable site for their proposed $6,000,000 cathedral. The committee report that as soon as they look at a site the owner of it sends the price up.

THE Swedes of Chicago are going to erect in Lincoln park a $50,000 monument to Linnæus, the famous botanist. The monument will be the finest in Chicago, and is to be a fac simile of the Linnæus statue at Stockholm.

MRS. LUCY BARBER voted at Angelica, N. Y., last fall. The federal authorities refused to prosecute and dismissed the complaint, and the grand jury has refused to indict her. The State Committee of the Woman Suffrage party interfered for her.

THE Rev. Sam Jones curls his evangelical lip at the business thrift of the great West. He says that the St. Paul Christians will not be in heaven twenty-four hours without having a real estate sign out and claiming the agency for all the best corner lots in the Celestial City.



THE Shelbyville, Ind., Baptist church was burnt recently, and a man named Calee is under arrest for lighting it. He confesses and makes affidavit that the pastor, the Rev. Wm. Snapp, bribed him to commit the act. Some of the congregation charge Mr. Snapp with ministerial conduct toward a young woman of his flock.

ARCHBISHOP CORRIGAN addressed the students of the Manhattan College at their annual examination exercises. He said regarding the labor question that it was a momentous problem, but urged the students to remember that "the Catholic church has in her keeping the unraveling of this as of all other secrets." And probably there were some people present stupid enough to believe that the archbishop told the truth.

A CITIZEN of Albany and his wife, wearied by the prosiness and long sermons of the pastor of the church that they attended, decided to change their place of worship. So on a recent Sunday they attended a neighboring church to see how they would like it. Hardly were they seated when their pastor entered the pulpit. He had exchanged pulpits for that service, and that morning preached an unusually long sermon. At the close of the service he met his two parishioners and thanked them very heartily for feeling such an interest in his preaching as to follow him to a strange church.

JEFFERSON DAVIS has written a letter in which he says that the ordering of the Confederate flags to be returned to their original states is without precedent in military history. He thinks the flags belong to the states whose soldiers captured them, and that the general government has no voice in the matter.

THE Jornal de Comercio of Rio Janeiro says that on a farm in Brazil where hemp is grown seven large monkeys hav been taught to cut the hemp and prepare it for sale. They work more quietly than the negroes, and the cost of feeding the animals is trifling.

DURING the eleven months ending May 31st 417,860 immigrants landed at the different ports of the United States, an increase of 133,608 over the same period last year. This comprises about 98 per cent of the entire immigration, as it does not include arrivals from Canada and Mexico. Over 94,000 came from Germany, and nearly 60,000 from Ireland. During the month of May the immigration reached 83,664, an increase of 28,431 over May, 1886.

A PIOUS man named John Tobin knelt down in Broadway one day last week, and offered up a prayer. A police officer listened to him until he was heard to ask God to "save New York from the politicians," and then arrested him. The judge held with the officer that anyone who would make so unreasonable a prayer must of necessity be insane, and Mr. Tobin was locked up as a lunatic.

ST. ALBERTUS Polish church, in Detroit, Mich., has been closed since Dec. 3, 1885, on account of a desperate war between two factions of the congregation. Services were held there last Friday afternoon for the first time by one faction, under the protection of sixty policemen. The other faction surrounded the church, some four hundred strong, and threatened violence. The former faction, which numbers two thousand persons, finally entered the church in a body and held services.

THREE judges hav reversed the decision of Judge Laurence and of New York's corporation counsel, who held that hotel men may not serve wine to their guests with meals on Sunday. Liquor will therefore continue to be sold as usual. Yet anyone who reads the law would say that Judge Laurence and the corporation counsel were right. The law distinctly says that no liquors shall be sold or given away on Sunday, and the very license which permits the selling of liquor on other days of the week contains the words "except on Sunday" in prominent characters. Instead of being reconstrued, the law ought to be repealed or made alike for all days.

BUFFALO BILL, otherwise Gen. W. F. Cody, is attracting great attention with his Wild West show in London. He gave a private entertainment to royalty the other day, which not only pleased his visitors, but gained for himself an advertisment which no money could pay for. He had for his audience the king of Denmark, the king of Greece, the king of Saxony, and the king of the Belgians, besides the prince and the princess of Wales, and a dozen other princes and princesses, all of whom regarded the occasion as a royal lark, and were much entertained. Buffalo Bill remarked during the proceedings that he had often held four kings, but had never before run against such a royal flush. This joke was duly explained by the Prince of Wales to the crowned heads, who were ignorant of the great American game of poker. Mr. Cody is realizing the promis of the psalmist that the "diligent in business shall stand before kings."

Tales Told Out of School.

At this point, seeing that the lady clerk was well versed in Spiritualistic lore, I said: "My dear madam, you will take no offense, I hope, if I ask you what are the Spiritualists' views concerning love and marriage. In my section of country, they are generally believed to be Freelovers." To which she replied: "You will admit that the press of a country indicates pretty clearly the advance made by society from barbarism to civilization. In these days such is the rivalry between journals, and the desire of each to get the advantage of the other in giving the public the latest and most substantial news, that a new order of men has arisen, called 'Reporters,' whose function is to picture the times as they are—to hold, like the stage, the mirror up to nature; to show Virtue her own feature, Scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time, its form and pressure. The results of these men's labors, published in the daily and weekly papers, are so disgusting in the narrativs they furnish of vice and crime among the higher, as well as the lower, classes of society, that one would be moved to vote for suppressing the license of the press, or establishing at least an index expurgatorius, were it not for the fact that it informs parents of the kind of world into which their children hav been born, and where they must perform their parts of honor or of shame. They see that life is an Indian gantlet, which everyone is bound to run, and through which very few escape without a wound, and most of them never reach the end of the file, but fall dead under the relentless tomahawks of the savages. We inherit the vices of our remote ancestors—the vices of childhood, of youth, of mature life, and of old age. Into these we fall by reason of sheer ignorance how to avoid them. But far better than any Bible or any religion, we hav in these latter days a revelation made to us in the science of physiology, which teaches us how our bodies are constructed, how personal vices saw through the nerves of life, shortening our days and making us miserable and degraded while they last. Now, we Spiritualists hav dethroned the old Jehovah of the Jews and Christians, and hav installed science in his place. To arm our children for the dangerous conflict before them in life, as soon as they are able to comprehend a process of reasoning, we put into their hands treatises on physiology, so that they may see clearly the two paths which open before them—the path of virtue, which leads to honor, to self-respect, to health, and to a long and happy life on the one hand; and on the other, the path of vice, which leads to dishonor, to sickness, and premature death and damnation.

"Now, if you hav been an attentiv observer of human events, you will hav seen that among the divorce cases, the crim. con. cases, the elopement cases, the suicides, murders, and other vagaries growing out of the love instinct, which are reported in the newspapers all over the land, no Spiritualists figure. Remember that, according to Catholic statisticians, we number ten millions. Examin the police courts, and the reports of all the penitentiaries in the land, and you will be struck with the fact that no Spiritualists or Infidels are found among the criminals who hav forfeited their liberty by their crimes. The reason is that these two classes of people, better than any other, understand the laws of life and health, and obey them. They know from their study of practical physiology that personal vices, and especially those which are sexual, revenge themselvs upon those who commit them; and that if they wish to enjoy life, and fulfil their mission here, they must find out the secret of ruling themselvs, instead of being ruled by their vices. Modern Spiritualism is not yet forty years old, and yet if you would attend our meetings and look round at the old men who in part compose them, you would be impressed by their hale and healthy look. As old Adam said to Orlando in the play, our old men could say to you, if you asked them the cause of their youthful looks:

> Though I look old, yet am I strong and lusty;
> For in my youth I never did apply
> Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood;
> Nor did not with unbashful forehead woo
> The means of weakness and debility.
> Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
> Frosty, but kindly.

"I do not say it boastingly, but because there is a profound philosophy in the fact, which all the church people ought to study, that no class of persons are so chaste in their love relations as the Spiritualists, if we may judge of the condition of society by the press. Here and there, now and then, there may be—though I hav heard of none—a divorce between married people, who find out that they are mismated, and feel that it would be a crime against true marriage and humanity to bring children into the world under the curse of inharmonious relations between the parents; but such are as rare as angel's visits. Marriage, like the old Jewish Sabbath, was made for man—not man for marriage. The church reverses the rule, the Catholics making it a sacrament, and existing only by the authority and for the good of the church; the Protestants making it a divine ordinance. But France, England, and the United States all make it a mere civil contract, but with this anomalous feature in its character, that whereas it is of the essence of a civil contract that the parties to it may dissolve it for reasons satisfactory to themselvs, in the civil contract of marriage the parties cannot do so. I firmly believe in the conservativ influence of liberty, intellectual, personal, and political. You may feel shocked at my saying it, but after much observation and reflection I am inclined to think that the abolition of the marriage oath, and allowing men and women to manage their love matters to suit themselvs, under the strict meaning of the law that marriage is a civil contract alone, there would be much greater permanence in the relation, and vastly fewer divorces. When married persons quarrel, and feel that they are bound together with an iron chain which they cannot sever, the consciousness that they are in bonds aggravates the evil. But if they hold each other by the stronger tie of love and respect, and both feel that they are at liberty to go, the sentiment of honor will come to the rescue, and restore the old love and confidence which the iron chain could not. Many people are suspicious of all freedom. It is the result of the church's doctrin of total depravity, that men cannot be trusted unless loaded down with chains.

"But there is another reason why Spiritualists walk perpendicularly through life and deserve the reputation which the press givs them of remarkable exemption from the sexual scandals which occupy so much public attention in England and this country. You never would do an act unworthy of yourself in the presence of your mother or daughter. Nine-tenths of the crime committed is done privately, in the dark. Bring the actors out into broad daylight, and they would not dare to perpetrate crime as they do. We all exercise by our presence a restraining influence on each other, and this is one of the good things resulting from society. Now, we Spiritualists hold that our departed friends still liv, and like a cloud of witnesses take cognizance of us and sympathize with us in the struggles we put forth on the theater of life. We feel both encouraged and restrained by a consciousness of this fact; encouraged to make a brave and persevering fight, and restrained from doing anything unmanly or unwomanly, although tempted to do so.

"Hav you ever seen a book published every now and then by a Colonel Billings, of Iowa, containing a list of the names of clergymen who attain the unenviable distinction of being religious criminals? We hav not got the book on our shelves, but if you would like to see the names, crimes, day, and date of nearly a thousand clergymen committed within ten years, I will send an errand-boy round to the news depot and get it." "Don't put yourself to the trouble, my dear madam," said I, "for I saw the book at THE TRUTH SEEKER office in New York, and felt on reading it pretty much as I suppose Sir John Falstaff felt when he was carried in Mistress Ford's buck-basket to Datchet's-lane, and tumbled into the river Thames." "Well," continued she, "you observe that the offenses are generally sexual, and in law worthy of the penitentiary. The only real model saint of antiquity, Joseph, is immortalized in the Bible for resisting the fascinations of Potiphar's wife. He was controled by his belief in the omnipresence of God—'How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?' But the gay Lotharios of the pulpit who figure in Mr. Billings's book, although they denounce the Spiritualists and Infidels because they do not believe in the orthodox God, giv the most indubitable proof that they themselvs are either out-and-out Atheists, or worship and serve a God whom they can mesmerize and put to sleep, as Professor Cadwell does his subjects, so that he can not see when they go out to practice their amours. One of our Boston editors, who had read and studied Colonel Billings's book, thunderstruck his subscribers and made mad the preacher-worshiping women, especially of the Downs school, by declaring that in proportion to their numbers there was no class in society so criminal as the clergy, and that in regard to chastity, the lawyers, the doctors, the tradesmen, and the politicians were all celibate Shakers in comparison with them. Now, these clerical delinquents evidently believe that God's eyes are constructed like ours, and that he cannot see in the dark. But the Spiritualists believe and, what is much more, they know that departed spirits are only separated from us by a thin veil, and that they see and cheer us as we run the gantlet of life, and feel ashamed and sorry when we fall. Hence we hav a present and powerful motiv to well-doing."

"But what hav you to say," I asked the lady clerk, "about those fraudulent manifestations of departed spirits which are so frequently noticed and censured by the newspapers?" "Well," said she, "I admit there hav been instances of the kind you mention. But as the circulation of counterfeit money in business transactions proves in itself the reality of the good money which it counterfeits so every fraudful device to counterfeit spiritual phenomena proves conclusivly that there are real phenomena which are thus simulated. I deeply regret that any Spiritualistic medium should bring reproach upon the cause, and upon his or her own character, by ever practicing a trick upon the credulity of the people for the mean and miserable purpose of making money. But mediums are only human beings, and hav all the infirmities of humanity like other people. There are hundreds of them, known as such, all over the country, and many who are not known to the public; and if some of them practice fraud, the rest who are honest should not be condemned on that account. Besides, mediumship is a natural gift, like a talent for music, painting, or poetry, and has no necessary connection with good morals. Some musicians, painters, and poets of eminence hav been people of bad morals, and so may some mediums be. Hence we must 'try the spirits,' and never implicitly surrender either our judgments or consciences to any communication simply because it purports to come from the world of spirits. The process of dying makes no sudden change in the character of a liar, transforming him immediately into a winged angel, playing on a golden harp, as the church teaches. He carries with him across the river of death all the attributes which marked his character here, and has to begin his new career of intellectual and moral improvement in the other world at the lowest rung of the ladder. Such bad, undeveloped spirits often speak through mediums whom they control, tell lies, and play tricks, as they did here. Mediums are not, as such, infallible expounders of truth. They are the mere mouthpieces of those who control them. All phenomena are natural, not supernatural, and all that Spiritualism proves beyond doubt is the mere fact that death does not destroy the personality and individuality of a man, but that both survive the event. If we wish to know more than this we must wait till we die, and find it out by experience. But around this great fact of a future life, as a nucleus, may be built, and is being built, a philosophy which is benign in its influence upon all who accept it. A man who has no longer any fear of an angry God and a burning hell-fire, who has not the least particle of the fear of death, can afford to take things as they come and be happy; and remembering that his future condition, at least at the start, depends in a great measure upon the character he forms here, he has another and exceedingly powerful motiv to well-doing."

"You present your case very strongly, madam," I observed. "But it seems to me that if you abolish hell, as a motiv, you must abolish all oaths in courts of justice too; and then, what inducement can you present to the common run of men to speak the truth, be faithful to their word, and trustworthy in all emergencies?" To which she replied: "I think I could show you from the history of all ages, if I had the time, that the church idea of making men do their duty by the hopes of heaven, and the fear of hell, betrays a disgraceful ignorance of human nature, and reflects great dishonor on the God who is supposed to hav made man in his own image and likeness. When two armies are in sight of each other, and preparing for battle the next day, and they want to put on guard at night, and intrust with the countersign, men in whom implicit confidence can be placed, what steps do they take to secure the object? Do they lead each man up to the quarters of the proper officer, and swear him to the faithful performance of his duty as a sentinel, and make him kiss a greasy old Bible, as they do in our civil courts; and which means that he is willing to go to hell, and burn there forever, if he break his oath? No. What has in all ages been found to be infinitly better in making a man true to his promis is, to put him on his parole of honor. You appeal to his manliness, and his sense of honor and rectitude, and are seldom disappointed in the result. During our late civil war, of all the thousands of men, on both sides, who were taken prisoners, and liberated on their parole of honor, that they would not take up arms again, unless duly exchanged, I never heard of but one who broke his word, and he was the son of a Presbyterian minister, and was scornfully rejected and reproached by his Southern commander to whom he had offered his services.

"This is the reason why I believe that if you would abolish all religious oaths in courts of justice, and elsewhere, and put witnesses and contractors on their word of honor as men, it would be a wise plan to bring out the truth, and make men faithful. Christ showed himself to be a philosopher, if he were not a god, when he said to his disciples, 'Swear not at all; but let your communication be yea, yea; and nay, nay.' He knew where to find the leverage in human nature in order to speaking the truth, which is so important in society. The only treaty in history that was honestly kept, and never broken, was the one William Penn made with the Indians in Pennsylvania, which was confirmed, not by oath, but by yea and nay."

"Taking it as a whole, my dear madam, with some exceptions, I must admit," said I, "that your theory is very beautiful, and very plausible; but I observe that the majority of the most eminent scientists of the day, in this country and in England, treat it as a mere pitiable delusion. You do not place your Spiritual phenomena where we Christians place the divine mysteries of our religion—above the grasp of reason, and therefore to be accepted, if at all, by faith alone, based on the authority of holy men of God who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. If you appeal unto Cæsar in defense of your cause, unto Cæsar you must go, and abide by the consequences." To which the lady clerk replied: "Why, my dear sir, that is exactly the thing we constantly desire to accomplish, to bring our case into a court where the decisions of the judge, and the verdict of the jury, shall be governed by the testimony of witnesses, who, in point of character, are unimpeached and unimpeachable. But pooh-poohing is neither the scientific nor the legal method of disposing of a natural phenomenon called a fact. It is, however, the very way adopted by the majority of so called scientific men in treating the facts of Spiritualism. There are thousands of persons whose word would be taken in any court of justice without question, who testify that the personality and individuality of a man are not destroyed by death, and giv as proof what their eyes hav seen, and their ears heard. It is not a question of philosophy at all, but simply a fact on which a philosophy is based, to be decided by the testimony of witnesses. The scientists would not dare, in so many words, to impeach those witnesses, either with falsehood, imbecility, or childish credulity, but they virtually do so when they refuse to investigate a question in their own domain of nature, and dismiss it with a contemptuous pooh-pooh. The Spiritualists stoutly maintain that the phenomena which occur at their seances, and which are not new, but as old as the race, are natural, and not miracles. But in the face and teeth of this allegation, repeated a thousand times, the scientists persist in calling them supernatural and religious, and therefore incapable of scientific investigation. If they were compelled to go through the form of investigation, as was the case at Philadelphia, where a fund of money was at stake, it would be as if the plaintiff's attorney, with his fee in his pocket, would investigate the defendant's side of the question. This is not investigation at all, which implies that both sides of the question are considered. It is a mere paid attorneyship, which, if it had been adopted by scientists on other subjects of inquiry, in deference to a bribe-giving church, would hav surrounded the nineteenth century with the gloom of the Middle Ages. It is the office of the judge in courts of law and justice to gather the facts in the case, and present them to the jury as the basis of their verdict. How anxious an honest juror often is, when his mind has been obfuscated by the sophistical pleas of the lawyers, to hear the court calmly, and in an unprejudiced way, cite in detail the facts in evidence, pro and con, and dwell upon them in the interest of justice between man and man. Hence, the opinions of Tyndall and other scientists who hav never investigated in the department of science called Spiritualism, as they hav in other departments, hav not the weight of a feather on the minds of those who feel interest enough in the subject to giv it a fair and thorough examination.

"But, while the subject is in their own realm of inquiry, and out of the realm of the theologian and religionist, I will make an excuse for the scientists for ignoring the phenomena of Spiritualism for which, I suppose, they will not thank me, but which I honestly make because I hav gone through the same experience up to the point where they turned away in disgust, but where I continued the investigation till I finished it. If it be true, in defiance of all argument to the contrary, that a person survives the change called death, and continues to liv on under the law of progressiv development, the fact is so momentous in its character and consequences that it is almost impossible to believe it. How often, on the announcement of good tidings, do we hear the exclamation of the person interested, 'Oh, I cannot believe it; it is too good news to be true!' When one suddenly learns that an absent and beloved friend whom his soul long and intensely yearned to see is unexpectedly in the neighborhood, he is so glad that he actually becomes incredulous to the fact. In like manner, when a man who has the fire of love for a departed friend burning on the altar of his heart hears that the spirit of that friend is near and wishes to speak to him, he feels that the privilege of listening and of being assured of the truth of such a possibility shall be accompanied by extraordinary and marvelous manifestations, and he wonders why the communication is not made to him at his home or some other place of his own choosing. And when he is informed of the natural law that he cannot take a message off this wire between two stations on the line, but must come to the dingy little office called the seance room, where the telegraphic operator called the medium is perhaps a person of imperfect moral character or of no great account, he feels and acts like Naaman the Syrian. The story is in the Bible (2 Kings v). Naaman was a leper who, when he was told by the prophet to go and wash in the Jordan to be recovered from his leprosy, like his illustrious successors, the scientists of the nineteenth century, pooh-poohed the idea, and haughtily said: 'Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters in Israel? May I not wash in them and be clean?' So he turned and went away in a rage. But when his servants came near and expostulated with him, saying: 'If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldst thou not hav done it? How much rather then, when he saith to thee, Wash and be clean? Then went he down and dipped himself seven times in Jordan, and his flesh came again, like unto the flesh of a little child, and he was clean.'

"I know how these scientists feel, for I remember well when I felt toward the whole subject of Spiritualism doubt and distrust. But I was a witness to facts, over and over again, that can never be accounted for in any other way than that death is only a change of the mode of existence, and does not at all extinguish a man's being, but that he livs and acts upon a new theater concerning which we now know little but the bare fact."

Thanking the lady clerk for her courtesy in giving me an insight into Spiritualism as it is understood by the Spiritualists themselvs, I took my leave and hastened, as I did after leaving THE TRUTH SEEKER office, to set down in my journal the substance of what she said. If the Spiritualists were organized they would compose the right wing of the army of unbelief arrayed against the church, while the Indels, if organized, would compose the left. Of the two, we hav vastly more to fear from the former than the latter, for the central idea of Spiritualism is a Christian one, whereas the Infidels generally are Materialists who believe that death ends all. As soon as doubt unsettles the faith of a church-member or a Materialist, he finds a congenial stopping-place in Spiritualism. The safety of the church consists in her complete organization, whereby her heads of departments raise funds, print books, and send their missionaries into all parts of the land. Should the sentiment these two classes are now forming ever be able to marshal their strength it will be a very serious matter. But sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

O'Brien in Canada and Reynolds in New Jersey.

From such communities, good Lord, deliver us.

Canada and New Jersey are at the present time making the most energetic efforts to muzzle free speech and incidentally to encourage mob violence. A New Jersey judge—do not forget that his name is Childs, and that his brain and the verdict which he procured and approved appear to be ample proof that his name could not be changed without doing violence to certain facts. This New Jersey judge and two Canadian mayors hav allowed mob violence to go unpunished, while the victim of the mob in one case is tried for blasphemy and in the other case escapes with his life through no favor of the mayors, simply because these men hav expressed an honest thought. In New Jersey there is no complication. It is a simple case of religious bigotry and phenomenal ignorance, while in Canada politics and religion hav joined forces, as of old, to crush free speech and destroy intellectual liberty.

Of course, neither will succeed. A thought, once born, never dies. The glimpses we hav already had of liberty are too firmly fixed in memory to be forgotten. Canadian mayors may wink at mobs for abusing the person of James O'Brien, but the tide of opinion in favor of Home Rule for Ireland has risen too high to prevent its further spread. The brickbat arguments in favor of tyranny are always the last desperate resort. They are always the final message from defeated ignorance and bigotry to their more enlightened rival.

New Jersey judges may allow mob violence to go unpunished—may impose a fine upon Mr. Reynolds for expressing an opinion which differs from that of the average ignorance of the constituents of this judicial Childs—but all of the judges in the narrow-minded little state will never be able to again imprison thought nor make the honest expression of it an offense against justice. In another New Jersey village one set of religious bigots hav just mobbed another set of religious bigots for the crime of advocating a different phase of theological idiocy from their own, and at the same time expressing the opinion that their opponents were "devils." Both sides talk glibly of what God intends, what he wants, what he wishes them to do, and brag like street bullies of what he has done and will do to confound their particular enemies. And in the mean time it would require omniscience to be able to decide which is the greater set of donkeys, or rather which of these two sets of donkeys has the longer ears. Imagin an almighty God attempting to decide between the degrees of idiocy possessed by two sets of skulls filled with bran! There are some few things which would be impossible to even a supposititious God in the state of New Jersey. Even the being who could make the Red Sea stand on end could not evolve thought out of putty, nor procure justice from brains saturated with superstition. "Thus endeth the first lesson." HELEN H. GARDENER.

Question!

Excessiv wealth, resulting in luxury and idleness on the one hand, and excessiv toil and poverty on the other, lead to intemperance and vice. The measure of reform here demanded will prove to be the scientific solution of the temperance question.—Cincinnati Platform of the New Union Party.

The question before the people of the so-called civilized world is not whether "alcohol is ever necessary for any use," nor is it that "the liquor traffic is the gigantic crime of crimes," nor is it of the slightest consequence what small-minded men like Garfield or Solomon said about it, for neither of them had any sympathy with the producing classes.

There is a whole volume of meaning in the few lines at the top of this paper. "Excessiv wealth," etc. It is a crime and a waste of time to discuss the "liquor traffic" when the homes of millions hav been stolen from them by usury thieves.

While the people liv on food, ninety per cent of which is not fit to take into any stomach, it is useless to think of making the people temperate.

Giv the people their rights, restore to them their stolen homes, lessen the hours of labor at least one-third, increase their wages one-half, abolish a great many wicked laws, take down your barbarous gallows, turn your cruel, inhuman prisons into asylums for the diseased; cure, not punish, the unfortunate; and these, with many other reforms, when tried for a century, more or less, will begin to show what is the best methods to save the inebriate.

It was a truth, no matter who said it: "The son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them." All the laws, customs, and principles on which governments and individuals act are on the destructiv plan. To save mankind, to heal their wounds, to take them by the hand as brother, is not thought of. That worst word that ever disgraced the English language, "punishment" for crime, is all the people think of. I am not surprised that even some Liberalists use it, for the Bible and the pulpit teach it, but a true reformer never ought to use it.

The liquor traffic question will be in order when justice is done the producer, and not before. Force will never stop intemperance. Rum-selling, or the use of alcohol, is not the underlying cause of intemperance. Five thousand years of abuse of the poor and the oppressed is the cause of all the evils.

It is not true that "the liquor traffic is the gigantic cause of crimes." Hav the sale and use of liquor brought the world into the condition where nearly all the wealth is in the possession of a few? No sane person will say it.

Neither is it true that "alcohol causes three-fourths of all chronic illness which the medical man has to treat." To make such a statement is not going to the root of the evil. Alcohol is not a natural drink to quench thirst, yet millions of gallons are drunk. But why will man take into his stomach that which the animal will reject? It is because for thousands of years his stomach has been poisoned by unnatural food, and his physique degenerated by excessiv labor. Tobacco is a thousand times greater curse to the race than liquor, and it is only a question of time for the people to see it. We don't settle the temperance question permanently until we know why people drink liquor instead of water.

When reason takes the place of blind fanaticism, and the mind becomes sane, we may hope to hear the subject of temperance calmly discussed. Outside of the "Heredity" meetings we hear nothing about temperance. Then the questions of how to feed, clothe, and educate the offspring during childhood and after-life will be subjects that will lay the foundation for a solid temperance superstructure.

But before the liquor question is hardly thought of intelligently the people, the wealth-producers, must hav their right restored to them. Every human being born into this world must hav a home of his own, without the vandal hand of a usurer or a murderous mortgage on it. Stop selling the land. It is not yours to sell. Stop collecting rents of those half-starved families. Every family own the house they liv in. Stop taxing the people's homes; it is robbery to do it.

The murderous governments of every nation on earth hav planted their bloody feet on the prostrate forms of the producers, and the guns from every war ship, every fort, navy yard, and from millions of hands are all pointed at the people to keep them from attempting to gain their rights.

Are the men who make the Prohibition laws, Sunday laws, and the many other oppressiv laws men of principle? No, indeed! They are fast preparing the way for the God-in-the-Constitution law.

Temperance has not been discussed in Maine for nearly forty years. From the beginning of the fanatical Maine law crusade there has been an incessant wrangling in the courts, every act of which has been a curse to the cause of temperance.

Law-making in this, as well as all other countries, is fast assuming a dangerous attitude. When men are under sentence of death for free discussion, it is no time to talk about the evil effects of alcohol. The people want to know if they hav any rights, or must governments forever make the people slaves?

Tribute to Henry Ward Beecher.

[The Beecher Memorial volume, which has been compiled and edited by Mr. Edward W. Bok, and of which a limited private edition has been printed, contains a remarkable series of tributes to the great preacher. Among the hundred contributors are Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, President Cleveland, Mr. Gladstone, M. Bartholdi, Sig. Salvini, Duke of Argyll, Senator Sherman, General Sherman, the poet Whittier, Dr. Talmage, Admiral Porter, Canon Farrar, Geo. W. Childs, Roscoe Conkling, Dr. McGlynn, Henry George, Lawrence Barrett, W. W. Corcoran, Washington Gladden, Andrew Carnegie, Charles Dudley Warner, John Burroughs, Julia Ward Howe, Ristori, Miss Cleveland, Mrs. Garfield, and many other names of prominence. The following is Colonel Ingersoll's tribute :]

Henry Ward Beecher was born in a Puritan penitentiary, of which his father was one of the wardens —a prison with very narrow and closely-grated windows. Under its walls were the rayless, hopeless, and measureless dungeons of the damned, and on its roof fell the shadow of God's eternal frown. In this prison the creed and catechism were primers for children, and from a pure sense of duty their loving hearts were stained and scarred with the religion of John Calvin.

In those days the home of an orthodox minister was an inquisition in which babes were tortured for the good of their souls. Children then, as now, rebelled against the infamous absurdities and cruelties of the creed. No Calvinist was ever able, unless with blows, to answer the questions of his child. Children were raised in what was called "the nurture and admonition of the Lord"—that is to say, their wills were broken or subdued, their natures deformed and dwarfed, their desires defeated or destroyed, and their development arrested or perverted. Life was robbed of its spring, its summer, and its autumn. Children stepped from the cradle into the snow. No laughter, no sunshine, no joyous, free, unburdened days. God, an infinit detectiv, watched them from above, and Satan, with malicious leer, was waiting for their souls below. Between these monsters life was passed. Infinit consequences were predicated of the smallest action, and a burden greater than a God could bear was placed upon the heart and brain of every child. To think, to ask questions, to doubt, to investigate, were acts of rebellion. To express pity for the lost, writhing in the dungeons below, was simply to giv evidence that the enemy of souls had been at work within their hearts.

Among all the religions of this world—from the creed of cannibals who devoured flesh to that of Calvinists who polluted souls—there is none, there has been none, there will be none, more utterly heartless and inhuman than was the orthodox Congregationalism of New England in the year of grace 1813. It despised every natural joy, hated pictures, abhorred statues as lewd and lustful things, execrated music, regarded nature as fallen and corrupt, man as totally depraved, and woman as somewhat worse. The theater was the vestibule of perdition, actors the servants of Satan, and Shakspere a trifling wretch, whose words were seeds of death. And yet the virtues found a welcome, cordial and sincere; duty was done as understood; obligations were discharged; truth was told; self-denial was practiced for the sake of others; and hearts were good and true in spite of book and creed.

In this atmosphere of theological miasma, in this hideous dream of superstition, in this penitentiary, moral and austere, this babe first saw the imprisoned gloom.

The natural desires ungratified, the laughter suppressed, the logic brow-beaten by authority, the humor frozen by fear—of many generations—were in this child, a child destined to rend and wreck the prison's walls.

Through the grated windows of his cell this child, this boy, this man, caught glimpses of the outer world, of fields and skies. New thoughts were in his brain, new hopes within his heart. Another heaven bent above his life. There came a revelation of the beautiful and real. Theology grew mean and small.

Nature wooed and won and saved this mighty soul.

Her countless hands were sowing seeds within his tropic brain. All sights and sounds—all colors, forms, and fragments—were stored within the treasury of his mind. His thoughts were molded by the graceful curves of streams, by winding paths in woods, the charm of quiet country roads, and lanes grown indistinct with weeds and grass—by vines that cling and hide with leaf and flower the crumbling wall's decay—by cattle standing in the summer pools like statues of content.

There was within his words the subtle spirit of the season's change—of everything that is, of everything that lies between the slumbering seeds, that, half-awakened by the April rain, hav dreams of heaven's blue, and feel the amorous kisses of the sun, and that strange tomb wherein the alchemist doth giv to death's cold dust the throb and thrill of life again.

He saw with loving eyes the willows of the meadow-streams grow red beneath the glance of spring—the grass along the marsh's edge—the stir of life beneath the withered leaves—the moss below the drift of snow—the flowers that giv their bosoms to the first south wind that woos—the sad and timid violets that only bear the gaze of love from eyes half closed—the ferns, where fancy givs a thousand forms with but a single plan—the green and sunny slopes enriched with daisy's silver and the cowslip's gold.

As in the leafless woods some tree aflame with life stands like a rapt poet in the heedless crowd, so stood this man among his fellow-men.

All there is of leaf and bud, of flower and fruit, of painted insect life, and all the winged and happy children of the air that summer holds beneath her dome of blue, were known and loved by him.

He loved the yellow autumn fields, the golden stacks, the happy homes of men, the orchard's bending boughs, the sumach's flags of flame, the maples with transfigured leaves, the tender yellow of the beech, the wondrous harmonies of brown and gold—the vines where hang the clustered spheres of wit and mirth. He loved the winter days, the whirl and drift of snow—all forms of frost—the rage and fury of the storm, when in the forest, desolate and stripped, the brave old pine towers green and grand—a prophecy of spring. He heard the rhythmic sound of nature's busy strife, the hum of bees, the songs of birds, the eagle's cry, the murmur of the streams, the sighs and lamentations of the winds, and all the voices of the sea. He loved the shores, the vales, the crags and cliffs, the city's busy streets, the introspectiv, silent plain, the solemn splendors of the night, the silver sea of dawn, and evening's clouds of molten gold.

The love of nature freed this loving man.

One by one the fetters fell; the gratings disappeared, the sunshine smote the roof, and on the floors of stone light streamed from open doors. He realized the darkness and despair, the cruelty and hate, the starless blackness of the old, malignant creed. The flower of pity grew and blossomed in his heart. The selfish "consolation" filled his eyes with tears. He saw that what is called the Christian's hope is that, among the countless billions wrecked and lost, a meager few perhaps may reach the eternal shore—a hope that, like the desert rain, givs neither leaf nor bud—a hope that givs no joy, no peace, to any great and loving soul. It is the dust on which the serpent feeds that coils in heartless breasts.

Day by day the wrath and vengeance faded from the sky—the Jewish God grew vague and dim—the threats of torture and eternal pain grew vulgar and absurd, and all the miracles seemed strangely out of place. They clad the infinit in motley garb, and gave to aureoled heads the cap and bells.

Touched by the pathos of all human life, knowing the shadows that fall on every heart—the thorns in every path, the sighs, the sorrows, and the tears that lie between a mother's arms and death's embrace—this great and gifted man denounced, denied, and damned with all his heart the fanged and frightful dogma that souls were made to feed the eternal hunger—ravenous as famin—of a God's revenge.

Take out this fearful, fiendish, heartless lie—compared with which all other lies are true—and the great arch of orthodox religion crumbling falls.

To the average man the Christian hell and heaven are only words. He has no scope of thought. He livs but in a dim, impoverished now. To him the past is dead—the future still unborn. He occupies with downcast eyes that narrow line of barren, shifting sand that lies between the flowing seas. But Genius knows all time. For him the dead all liv, and breathe, and act their countless parts again. All human life is in his now, and every moment feels the thrill of all to be.

No one can overestimate the good accomplished by this marvelous, many-sided man. He helped to slay the heart-devouring monster of the Christian world. He tried to civilize the church, to humanize the creeds, to soften pious breasts of stone, to take the fear from mothers' hearts, the chains of creed from every brain, to put the star of hope in every sky and over every grave.

Attacked on every side, maligned by those who preached the law of love, he wavered not, but fought whole-hearted to the end.

Obstruction is but virtue's foil. From thwarted light leaps color's flame—the stream impeded has a song.

He passed from harsh and cruel creeds to that serene philosophy that has no place for pride or hate, that threatens no revenge, that looks on sin as stumblings of the blind and pities those who fall, knowing that in the souls of all there is a sacred yearning for the light. He ceased to think of man as something thrust upon the world—an exile from some other sphere. He felt at last that men are part of nature's self—kindred of all life—the gradual growth of countless years; that all the sacred books were helps until outgrown, and all religions rough and devious paths that man has worn with weary feet in sad and painful search for truth and peace. To him these paths were wrong, and yet all gave promis of success. He knew that all the streams, no matter how they wander, turn, and curve amid the hills or rocks or linger in the lakes and pools, must some time reach the sea.

These views enlarged his soul and made him patient with the world, and while the wintry snows of age were falling on his head, spring, with all her wealth of bloom, was in his heart.

The memory of this ample man is now a part of nature's wealth. He battled for the rights of men. His heart was with the slave. He stood against the selfish greed of millions banded to protect the pirate's trade. His voice was for the right when freedom's friends were few. He taught the church to think and doubt. He did not fear to stand alone. His brain took counsel of his heart. To every foe he offered reconciliation's hand. He loved this land of ours, and added to its glory through the world. He was the greatest orator that stood within the pulpit's narrow curve. He loved the liberty of speech. There was no trace of bigot in his blood. He was a brave and generous man, and so, with reverent hands, I place this tribute on his tomb.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Dr. York in Ottumwa.

DEAR EUGENE: Our second lecture in Denver drew an audience of about fourteen hundred, showing most clearly that Denver contains a large Liberal element who can be induced from time to time to show their strength on the side of Freethought.

And although our stay was so brief in their beautiful city, we hav abundant proof that the hearts of the Denver people are in the right place.

And our thanks are especially due to Brothers Truss, Jenkins, Shed, Thomas, Clayton, and others of the Secular Union who made our stay pleasant and gave us a helping hand on our way. We wish also to acknowledge the kindness of members of the Secular Union at Canon City, of which John Locke is president, and George Towers the secretary. This Secular branch was planted by our fellow-worker, W. F. Jamieson, and we were made happy in watering his plant, which givs good promis of future usefulness.

Our ride across Nebraska and Iowa was most delightful, and on every hand the corn and grain fields stretch away as far as the eye can reach, and with great promis of a bountiful harvest close at hand; and I could not but think and feel as we sped across these rolling billows and wide sweeps of food-producing lands how great and grand our country is, and only man is vile. At least, I may truly say all such men as Comstock and those who aid him in his most nefarious methods to prevent vice and obscenity; and I can hardly find language sufficiently strong in condemnation of those miserable people who hav trapped our friend, Mrs. Slenker, in the meshes of the law—a law all right in its proper use, but most cruel when so perverted as to convict an innocent and right-minded old lady of crime, when the act for which she is arraigned contains none of the element of crime; and the animus of all these persecutions, from Abner Kneeland to D. M. Bennett, and on down to Reynolds and Mrs. Slenker, takes root in religious prejudice and a determination to crush out free speech and the dissemination of truth among the people. Alas! what won't Christians do for Christ's sake?

Eugene, I am proud of you, and glad to see you stand up bravely for principle and in defense of Mrs. Slenker, whom I regard as a noble, good, motherly, and highly intelligent lady, and whose intentions and motivs were no doubt for the good of suffering humanity.

And to say that I am simply sorry for Mrs. Slenker is too cheap. We are all sorry. But how much are we sorry? I feel that way just five dollars' worth. Place me on her Defense list, and the money will be sent in due time to the TRUTH SEEKER office. Dear friends, sympathy is a golden element and the very crown of the heart's affections, and yet without the helping hand it is as a sounding brass or tinkling cymbal, and I can only hope that a sufficient sum may be realized to place her defense in the hands of Colonel Ingersoll, and that it may be carried to the highest court, and, if possible, break down this infamous use of legal power in the hands of bigots and knaves.

We spoke last night to a fairly numerous audience in the Ottumwa Opera House, with the promis of a big house next Sunday.

We were kindly met at the train by Brother Wm. Lindsey, a true Liberal, and the warm friend of S. P. Putnam, who had kindly by letter commended us to his care.

Brother Putnam has left a good, clean, fresh trail in the minds of the Ottumwa people, and they all like him well.

We were cordially received by Brother and Sister McCaroll, warm-hearted people and old-time workers in our cause; as also by Brother Peck, and many others whose dames we did not learn. And from our reception at Ottumwa, we are bound to say that they are a wide-awake and generous people.

We will be in Michigan during July; at Columbus, Ohio, the 21st and 28th of August; at Pittsburgh, Pa., the 4th, 11th, and 18th of September; at Philadelphia, Sept. 25th and Oct. 2d; at New York,

Oct. 9th; and at Boston, Oct. 16th, 23d, and 30th, the Lord willing.

Our address during July will be Ionia, Mich.

J. L. YORK.

The Jewish Life of Christ.

The editors of the republication of the "Sepher Toldoth Jeshu" (Book of the Generation of Jesus), say that a complete translation was made by a Jew, and published by Richard Carlile in 1823. But it seems that a copy of it was scarcely to be found, and there was none in the British Museum. The first impulse of a Christian would be to destroy such a book, and that probably accounts for its scarcity.

Soon after the publication of "Antichrist's" translation he found in a public library a little book with the following title:

"Jesus of Nazareth," by Isaac Goldstein. New York. Goldstein & Co., 19 Beekman st. 1866.

All efforts to procure a copy of the book failed, and nobody knew anything about the publisher. It was not a translation, but a romance founded on numerous Hebrew documents which were referred to in foot notes, and there were several pretty good wood cuts, as if the book was gotten up for profit, hoping that it would attract many readers. But the failure to find a stray copy of so recent a publication creates a suspicion that the edition was suppressed. Possibly the American Bible or Tract Society were willing to pay the Jew all he could hope to make by the sale of the book.

Two extracts from the book will giv an idea of its character:

Chapter I. It was in the year 3667 [94 B.C.], which was the 47th year of the kingdom of the Hasmonean dynasty [105 B.C.], and 259 years after the building of the second temple [515—259=256 B.C.], and 159 before its destruction [90 B.C.]. Alexander Jannai, the seventh prince of the Maccabean dynasty (called by the rabbis Hyrcan the second), was in the first year of his reign [106 or 105 B.C.], etc.

This is an attempt to fix the date of the birth of Jesus, but some of the dates do not agree with the rest. Two of them, however, agree with each other, to wit, 106 or 105 B.C.

The date of the death of Jesus is likewise confused, but it appears to hav been from 28 to 37 years later:

Chapter XVII. It was in the year 3636 [115 B.C], the 228th after the building of the second temple [515—228=287 B.C.], under the reign of Alexandra, called by the rabbis, Helena [78 to 69 B.C.], the widow of King Jannai, that the delegates waited upon Jesus, etc.

The reader will see, in spite of the confusion of dates, that Jesus was probably born about 106 B.C., and died before the end of the reign of Alexandra, 69 B.C. If the stoning and hanging of Jesus was about the middle of her reign, say 75 B.C., then he would hav been about 31 years of age. Paul became a convert after the death of Jesus, whom he never saw except in a vision, and he was preaching in Damascus a little prior to 62 B.C. If his conversion was just after the stoning of Stephen, it was about 65 or 66 B.C., for that is the date of the murder of Onias as described by Josephus (Ant. xiv, 2). No other martyrdom answering to that of Stephen can be found until A.D. 62, and the name is doubtless a fictitious one, for Stephanos is a Greek word meaning "a crown."

ANTICHRIST.

Police Brutality.

It would seem impossible that an organized effort to arouse public sentiment against the brutality of policemen is necessary to the peaceful existence of the citizens of New York, but such is the fact. Almost every daily paper has been compelled to protest to the police commissioners that their men are too free in the use of the club and hav brought disgrace upon the department; and now a public-spirited citizen, Mr. William Browne, of 26 John street, issues a small pamphlet appealing to the people to create a public sentiment which shall sweep the brutal evil out of existence.

There is no dispute that the actions of the police are often arbitrary and cruel. At least a dozen times within the past two months hav unoffending people been mercilessly clubbed and thrown into a police cell. No crime had been committed; they simply refused to obey the gruff order of some patrolman bloated with "a little brief authority" and poor whisky. The police are recruited from the coarse classes of truck drivers, bartenders, or 'longshoremen; and men of these occupations are apt to be ludicrously pompous and tyrannical when placed in positions of authority, and to compel obedience to their orders with physical force. No class of men are such ardent admirers of the prize-ring as the police, and when a boxing-match occurs the captain of the precinct selected attends in uniform as a sort of official umpire, and invites his friends on the force, who regard a ticket to a fight as a favor to be grateful for. Naturally, the police like to use their fists in emulation of their prize-fighting ideals, and when fists will not "knock a man out" the club is resorted to. The policeman's friends on his beat are the bartenders, and this close sympathy with the saloon brings them into contact with classes of people who are in their appropriate places only when behind iron bars. A gentleman who had been on the police for a score or more years in this city, leaving it as a captain, told us once that about half the policemen were dishonest men, and that it took the other half to watch them. This was a few years ago, but it is not likely that the morals of the force hav greatly improved. "We can't get good men," another person connected with high official police position said lately. "Intelligent men will not take the places, or, if they would, their physique is not up to the standard. Men with brains are not strong enough, and the men who are strong enough possess few brains. That's the reason the intelligence of the police is so low."

Taking these facts into consideration, the wonder is that so few cases of police brutality are reported. The remedy for these few lies with the police commissioners, who are men of brains. If every patrolman who commits an outrage upon a defenseless citizen were promptly dismissed and punished for assault and battery, there would soon be an end to the matter.

An Advertisment.

Advertisments in the reading columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER are not purchasable at any price. But for the information of our readers and the general public weal, we feel it a duty, sometimes, to call attention to meritorious articles. Especially is this true of articles designed to relieve human suffering and banish misery from however small a portion of the world. The sick and helpless are tender charges committed to the care of the well and strong, and must be watched with solicitude and nursed in love. Therefore it is that we take peculiar pleasure in spreading knowledge concerning the medicin advertised in the following circular:

"THE WILL OF GOD OUR DAILY BREAD.

"Help the Sick,
The Bodily Sick,
The Earthly Sick,
The Heavenly Sick.

"For these sufferers Our Holy Father has blessed the miraculous image of Our Lady of Perpetual Help; a wafer made of tissue paper to be taken in water.

"It should not be taken as a trial; that would be trying God. It should be taken every day in a communion with the Will of God until He is pleased to hav wrought in us the cure we are most hoping for.

"While taking, say: My God, attached to the Cross with you, how can I complain! Thy will be done, not mine. Good Mother of Perpetual Succor, obtain me relief and be praised. Amen.

"We sell it at cost price, 50 cents per 100, to help the sick. Address Joseph Gosselin, 198 Grand street, New York."

The discovery of this remedy marks an era as distinctly as the birth of the savior of mankind. Mr. Gosselin should be canonized and sainted. No sordid pedler of a patent medicin he, but a philanthropist of broadest sympathy and open purse. He sells his great discovery to all the world for a paltry sum. One hundred pieces of tissue paper for fifty cents is very cheap, and Mr. Gosselin will, no doubt, in addition pay the postage to forward them to any part of the United States. The medicin combines ease of taking with true piety, and composed as it is of pure papal blessings cannot injure the most delicate of constitutions. Drank in water, it will not blacken the teeth, but stimulates the appetite, strengthens the muscles, and thoroughly invigorates the system. The formula is of itself an infallible remedy for lock-jaw and stuttering. No one who repeats it accurately and rapidly can long remain afflicted with these dreadful complaints. No deleterious drugs are used in its compounding, and no minerals nor acids to destroy the delicate structure of the stomach. Papal blessings, the basis of this wonderful remedy, are purely vegetable in nature, being extract of cabbage-head; and the paper used in the composition of the wafer may be made of rice.

All sicknesses yield alike to to this remedy, and it may be taken for acute disorders as efficaciously as for chronic diseases. Fevers, cuts, burns, sores, broken limbs, scrofula, baldness, in fact, all the ills which afflict mankind, are as one to this medicin, and for making its merits known we shall not charge Mr. Gosselin a penny, conceiving that the gratitude of our readers will be ample recompense for the small space used.

Is Mr. Reynolds a "Fellow?"

From the London Freethinker.

We are sorry to see a letter in the Manchester Guardian, signed by Moncure D. Conway, reflecting severely on Mr. C. B. Reynolds, who has been fined in America for "blasphemy." Mr. Conway calls him "a fellow," which is a curious sequel to a complaint of his "bad taste." Mr. Reynolds is also accused of using "Salvation Army methods." Well, what if he does? Are not those very methods patronized by bishops in England? Is there not a Church Army as well as a Salvation Army, and are not the operations of both remarkably alike? The fact is, Mr. Reynolds simply carries about a tent, which he pitches and lectures in, halls being dear, and in many cases unprocurable for love or money. Jesus Christ and Paul did even without tents, preaching in the open air; yet Mr. Conway regards them as highly respectable characters for all that. Is it because they preached nearly two thousand years ago; and does distance lend such enchantment to the view that what was glorious then is vulgar now?

Mr. Conway also speaks of Mr. Reynolds as "flinging his mud about." It was not mud at all. Several weeks ago we printed the principal passages for which Mr. Reynolds was indicted. Everyone of them was a plain statement of some Bible absurdity, and several were taken verbatim from an article by Mr. Foote in one of our own special numbers. Perhaps Mr. Conway is obliged to make a concession to Bumble when he writes letters in an English journal.

One part of Mr. Conway's letter, however, givs us much pleasure. "As I write," he says, "THE TRUTH SEEKER, of this city, is printing it [Mr. Reynolds's pamphlet] off by thousands for clamorous buyers." So long as "blasphemy" gets disseminated, advanced Freethinkers need not mind being called names.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Remsburg-Lucas debate at Leon, Kansas, did not take place, Dr. Lucas for the second time backing out. The notorious Clark Braden was sent for, but, of course, Mr. Remsburg refused to meet him. No Freethinker should ever suffer himself to be even spoken to by Braden. The miserable scoundrel should be left severely alone.

MRS. E. DEMOTT writes: "The Hempstead, N. Y., Freethought Association held its annual meeting for the election of officers last Sunday afternoon, June 19th, at the residence of Mr. Franklin H. Mollineaux. The president gave an interesting address, reviewing the work of the association during the year past, and considering the best methods of carrying on the work for the next. The following officers were reëlected, viz.: President, C. F. DeMott; vice-presidents, Robert B. Jackson and Elisha Hyatt; treasurer, Franklin H. Mollineaux. The president appointed a committee on grove meetings as follows: Joseph Carman, Elisha Hyatt, and F. H. Mollineaux; executiv committee, C. F. DeMott, Robert B. Jackson, and H. H. Seer."

AN attendant of the Newark Liberal League says: "As soon as a person begins to think and investigate for himself, independently of a priest or the clergy, he will gravitate immediately to Secular philosophy and Liberalism. Floods of light are pouring through the clouds of delusion upon the people, and they are beginning to do their own thinking. Even in such cities as Newark and Orange, N. J., that are said to be the hot-beds of orthodoxy, a large majority of men hav come to the conclusion that they do not need the offices of the clergy or priest. Light is beaming on their minds, and they are coming to a knowledge of the truth. The Newark Liberal League is like a beacon-light in a dark place. But the members do not half realize what a benign influence their little light is shedding through the darkness that surrounds the place. It is a very significant state of things when Jews and gentiles, Infidels and Christians, Materialists and Spiritualists, agree to come on the same platform and reason together. The Newark Liberal League says, 'Come and welcome to our platform, if you can throw any light on the great problems of life.' Recently Sereno E. Todd, a deacon in the Congregational church, addressed a crowded and intellectual audience, under the auspices of the League at Newark, on 'The Scientific Conception of the Soul.' Partition walls are being demolished between religious sects and Freethinkers, and the world is coming to the light of truth. Men are beginning to feel proud of the fact that they are doing their own thinking, and can dispense with priest and clergy. Let Liberals hold up their heads and assume a more manly attitude."

THE pope conferred the title of "Defender of the Faith" upon Henry VIII., and the faith that Queen Victoria defends, says the World, is that of the Roman Catholic church.

JOHN the Baptist's day, June 25th, was celebrated in Burlington, Vt., by the St. John Baptist Society with hurdle races, standing jumps, tugs of war, a married men's race, fat men's race, and so forth. The profits of the games went to the new St. Joseph's church. Thus was recreation and piety pleasantly commingled for the glory of God and the good of the pockets of the priests. The Christian church is a cosmopolitan institution, and it is a very curious denizen of the sea that doesn't make good fish when in her net.

THE Methodist Advocate is made happy by the receipt of a program of Easter services held in Pekin, China. Accompanying the program was the following note, which added immeasurably to the editor's delight. It is from the missionary in charge:

"We had flowers, singing, praying, talking, responsiv readings, scripture selections, and a collection. The latter amounted to only $9, but, in order to raise that amount, a hundred schoolchildren voluntarily went without their dinner."

When Christian missions sink to the depth of meanness of robbing school-children of their dinners that the missionaries may hav money, they earn the contempt of all decent people —and they will get it, too!

THE Jews who become converted to Christianity are, says the New York Sun, "simply brought up at an enormously extravagant price. The London Society for the Conversion of the Jews continues its existence because of a rich endowment and the desire of its officers and missionaries to draw the salaries which it is so amply able to pay. So long as you hav money enough to giv them their price, you can, of course, get converts to any sort of faith; and the small number of Jews whom the society has succeeded in purchasing shows that the people of that race and religion are extraordinarily proof against such pecuniary temptations to abandon their brethren." The Sun is undoubtedly right in this. Converting Hebrews is a business a few hypocrits hav worked up, supported by a few fanatics. It is more senseless than the work of the American Tract Society.

The Parson.

AS HE APPEARS TO THE NAKED EYE OF THE WRITER.

The parson is a party who expounds the scriptures to sinners. Ergo, the parson is not a sinner.

The scriptures are writings which require a great deal of expounding, and more pounding. The parsons who pound the scriptures the heaviest are most in demand.

These theological whang-bangers are the Sullivans of the profession, and draw the biggest crowds. They also draw the biggest salaries. They likewise never fail to draw sharp on time. They never keep the cashier waiting.

The parson pounds and expounds the scriptures according to the tenets of the sect under whose banner he enlists.

These sects, on the Protestant side of theology, are divers and many. Consequently divers and many are the expoundings. Variety, which is said to be the spice of life, is the spice of Protestant theology, it would appear.

On the Catholic side of the house this spice is lacking. There you get B.C. hardtack from one century's end to another. Stale as is the provender, you must take it on or be damned! This seems to be rough, but it is the law of the Medes and Persians of Catholicism.

Had I to choose between the two, I should most certainly choose the Spice Islands of Protestantism. Giv me spiced dishes before stale and flat hardtack of the B.C. brand. I had enough of that brand furnished by Uncle Sam, during the late ruction, to his noble army. I am not in the army now, and don't want either diet.

The Protestant parson is a party of multifarious parts, not individually, but collectivly.

As I before said, he pounds and expounds as he is trained to do. He trots out hell in its brightest red, or passes it by a left oblique, as it were. He may bank the fires, and keep hell on tap, so to speak, or he may declare the fires to be spiritual, minus brimstone.

These theological field-pieces are of multifarious caliber. There are a few big guns, and from these they range down to penny pops.

Their grand field and firing day is Sunday, when they all go off with more or less detonation. A funny thing with these pulpit pops is that it takes those of the smallest caliber the longest to load up, while their explosions are the lightest, of course.

In many instances, these are not sufficiently loud to keep the sinners awake. This is rough on the guns shooting at them, but then these are doing the best they can to thunder and boom, so it can't be helped.

The parson is always cocked and primed for a shot on the fly at sinners, but his grand feu de joie—I guess this should be feu d'enfer—comes off on Sunday, when all nature quakes, as he thinks.

The parson who trains and fires before a rich congregation is generally a gun of some considerable caliber, if not more.

He is mighty careful, however, that he doesn't shoot point-blank at the sinners in front of him who pay his big salary.

Loading with blank cartridges, he aims and fires low, retiring after the firing is over, conscious that he has wounded none of his friends where they liv—not touched them on the raw, you know.

The guerilla parson, of the Sam Jones type, loads up to the muzzle with shrapnel, canister, chain shot, shell, grape, slugs, old spikes, etc., and will let-her-go-Gallagher, slam-bang, point-blank, perfectly regardless as to whether he brings down crows or turkeys, skunks or stags.

He bags more or less game, but as he doesn't stop long in the field, the game, somehow or other, takes to itself wings and mysteriously disappears over yonder, somewhere, nobody knows just where.

The average parson is mighty slim-waisted in the cranium, and wasted is his fragrance on a more or less desert air. He wouldn't make an average cobbler, by a long waxed-end.

A poor parson, a poor congregation, for a sure thing. This parson knows no such word as economy in his dealings with hell. He is a wholesale dealer in brimstone, with fire enough to do an immense deal of grilling.

He has no friends worth mentioning in the congregation to let up on, and as he considers the whole kerboodle his enemies, he plays hell, as his best card, at them for all it is worth. The difference between the salary he gets, and that which he thinks he ought to get, he makes up in giving the sinners hell.

And what do the sinners care for him or his hell? Not a tinker's dam—this is not a cuss-word, but a dam which tinkers make of putty to keep the solder in place—but retire when the fireworks are over and pursue the even tenor of their previous ungodly ways.

The upper-crust parson has a soft snap of it. He draws from five to fifteen thousand dollars salary, deals gingerly with hell—hardly enough to warm his fingers on a cold day, if dealing with it at all—rakes up an old-time cough in June, and in July is packed off to Europe to recuperate for four months, with a fat purse made up for him by his fat-witted congregation.

The parson, take him by and large, is a cold-blooded fish, and doesn't warm up worth a cent to the pleasures which go toward making life worth living—not on his nativ heath he doesn't.

On some other heath he has been known to sail in and harvest about as much fun to the square inch of heath as the next man.

The parson at home and the parson abroad are two very different individuals oftentimes Distance from home lends a great deal of enchantment to the parson's view at times, and the greater the distance the greater the enchantment, not infrequently.

The average parson, when on some foreign stamping ground, is a good deal like a hermit-crab—he comes out of his shell then, and shows up in his true colors and proportions. The trouble is, he gets into his shell when he returns, and becomes the conventional theological crab again.

Though the parson comes high—he is high at the lowest rates—Christians must hav him. They must hav the gospel expounded one day in the week, even though they expound poker, and dally with cussedness in general, the other six days.

There is more or less mixed metaphor in this screed, the parson being held up as a scripture-slugger, shooting-iron, engineer, pot-hunter, crab, fish, etc., but mixed metaphor, being to the straight variety what the cocktail is to straight whisky, is palatable at times—if not this time, some other time.

Verily this is a quisby world, and if there be a quisby character in it, it is the parson, take him by and large. This is simply my unfeltered opinion, that's all. Those who harbor feltered opinions are, of course, contrary minded. SI SLOKUM.

P.S.—Though bearing the same title, this screed is not the story of "The Parson" in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL—not by a long chalk. The parson of that tale was a thoroughbred. Peace to her ashes! S. S.

Our London Letter

The trial of C. B. Reynolds for blasphemy has, I take it, resulted in a virtual victory for the Freethought party, for although the prosecutor obtained a verdict, yet the penalty inflicted was so ridiculous considering the enormity of the crime in the eyes of the orthodox party that it appears to me that Liberalism, as you call it, is felt to be a power that it is scarcely safe to oppose too violently for fear of consequences of a rather unpleasant nature to the "unco guid." The judge who took the chief part in the case was apparently just such another gentle Christian as the one who tried Foote, Ramsey, and Kemp here for their connection with the Freethinker. It was very considerate of Mr. Childs to mitigate the penalty on the supposition that the defendant was ignorant of the law, and no doubt said what he did on the matter to let himself down lightly. It was fortunate Colonel Ingersoll was well enough to appear in court, for although a pliant jury would be only too well pleased to implicitly follow the opinions of the judge, the outside public would be greatly influenced by the speech of a powerful advocate. For the future people will be rather chary of setting obsolete laws in motion, and every such prosecution tends to weaken the party who make and use these iniquitous statutes, while on the other hand the views held by those who are attacked will be studied by many who were previously quite indifferent to anti-theological questions.

Priestcraft always has made, and always will make, itself obnoxious whenever opportunity occurs, and the more it does so in this age the better, for although the majority are more or less in favor of religious institutions, they are little inclined to see assumption carried too far. The old question of the utility or otherwise of church bells is again cropping up, and the matter is being discussed by one or two of the daily papers. To an invalid the horrid discord of a dozen or more bells from as many steeples, all being worked at the same time, must be as great torture as any to be endured in a suppositious hell; but of course this is of no moment to a priest who is anxious for people to come to his show, and for that end acts in the same manner as the showman at a county fair. The reason given by one curate for declining to discontinue the nuisance when urged to do so by a parishioner on account of a sick relativ was that God ordered Moses to hav bells fastened to the tails of the Levites' gowns, and therefore if he stopped his bell he would be liable to everlasting damnation for disobeying God's commands, though what connection there is between Moses and a modern curate, and gown bells and church bells, it would puzzle the curate's God or anyone else to find out. But it will always be so—the arrogance of priests can be extinguished only by abolishing the priests, and the sooner this is done the better for mankind.

There is a great amount of talk about the sympathy shown by the clergy to the suffering in mind or body, and it is quite possible that now and again such may be the case, though I believe such instances of help and guidance in time of trouble are exceedingly rare.

The case of Mrs. Langworthy, as related in the Pall Mall Gazette, shows what a sympathetic race of men priests are. She, it appears, applied to two dignitaries of the church for advice in her hour of need, and hoped one or both would hav been willing to use their influence in helping her to gain a living, but, as might be expected, she found neither of them inclined to do anything beyond enjoining her to trust in Jesus. But as events hav turned out, she has discovered that the outside public were better to trust in than all the gods ever invented. Her experience of clerical assistance is by no means a solitary one. Indeed, it is quite the rule. A priest is always ready to assist a rich believer, but a poor one is voted a nuisance, and may go to the devil as quickly as possible. Wherever there is any plunder to be had, there the priests are gathered together, but poverty in any shape or form is odious and always to be avoided. J. D.

Some Other Absurdities.

The attempt is made continually by the reverends and by the apologists for the Christian superstition to claim all the great men of the past as friends, believers, and moral supporters of the church and its dogmas. The latest now is to claim Lincoln as a Christian believer. This sticks out in a late life of Lincoln by Hay and Nicolay. It is only by assertion. It is all assertion, for they never quote a word of his in support. I hav by me a life of Abraham Lincoln by Charles Maltby, 1884. The author, on page 26, uses these words: "Early in the spring of 1831 Denton Offut, a trader from Kentucky, came to Sangamon county purchasing produce for shipment to New Orleans. . . Soon after the arrival of the boats at New Orleans . . a general stock of merchandise was purchased, with which Offut and Lincoln returned to New Salem. Lincoln was retained in Offut's employ as chief clerk at a salary of $25 per month and board, and the writer of these memoirs, . . who had not attained his majority, was employed as assistant at a salary of $15 per month."

We quote these words to show the reader that Mr. Maltby was necessarily in Lincoln's company very much for fifteen months. Mr. Maltby givs one quotation from Mr. Lincoln's words, and they are as follows: "When any church will inscribe over its altar, as its sole qualification for membership, the savior's condensed statement of the substance of both law and gospel, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and thy neighbor as thyself,' that church I will join with all my heart and all my soul."

The fact that Mr. Lincoln never joined any church is proof that he never found one that used that inscription—nor any one else. By these words it is plain that Lincoln was simply a Deist—that and nothing more. It is absurd to claim Lincoln as a Christian—the only words he uttered were to be interpreted the other way. Mr. Lincoln delivered a speech in Springfield, Ill., June 26, 1857, the theme being an answer to the opinion of the United States Supreme Court, March 6, 1857, in the very celebrated Dred-Scott decision. Mr. Lincoln said that Chief-Justice Taney used language which bore this interpretation: "The public estimate of the black man is more favorable now than it was in the days of the Revolution." Mr. Lincoln, in refutation of the assumption, shows in the following emphatic and burning words what devices, intrigues, and unhallowed means were used to rivet the shackles and tighten the chains of his bondage: "All the powers of earth seem rapidly combining against him. Mammon is after him, ambition follows, philosophy follows, and the theology of the day is fast joining the cry." Mr. Lincoln well knew that the Bible established and upheld slavery, and, as an Abolitionist, did not believe one word of its alleged divinity. This is well known to all who were his intimates. If Mr. Lincoln had been one of those superstitious tenderfoots, he would never hav arrayed "the theology of the day" as one of the upholders of crime. No! they always pass over the glaring absurdities and imperfections of holy writ, and bridge the bloody chasm from Genesis to St. John's hallucination with nice platitudes about the "blessed redeemer," the "love of Christ," and the undying respect that the Lord has for the "cheerful giver." Further, I am intimately acquainted with James Tuttle, an "old-timer"—a real landmark—who, forty years ago, located upon his present lovely farm near Atlanta, Ill., a point midway between Springfield and Bloomington. In early days Mr. Lincoln, before railroads were running, used to stop over-night with Mr. Tuttle, on his trips to court in Bloomington, and on his return. Mr. Tuttle was telling, lately, Mr. Remsburg and myself how it was that Mr. Lincoln and himself used to compare notes in regard to their belief. In those days, Mr. Tuttle says, Freethinkers were scarce, and when he found a soul like Lincoln, who had sense and independence, he made most of his opportunities for enjoyment. He says Lincoln was a free, independent thinker and talker, and, as far as Mr. Tuttle is concerned, it was revealed to him just what Lincoln thought, and he takes pleasure in testifying to the fact.

In the Chicago Times of yesterday, I read an article from the editor, entitled the "New Revision." The attempt made was to show why the new version was almost entirely ignored. I was not a little astonished to find a paper so well up in facts and independence taking the ground it did. The Times says that it is to be attributed, in the main, to the respect the believer has for the musty old volume. It is hallowed with age; the family record is therein; quotations are on the gravestones; it tells when the children were born, married, or died; the chapters and verses are handy. Now it is simply absurd to say that these are the causes. It is generally understood that hell is knocked out by sheol. From this cause the clergy hav refused to recognize it. A Bible without a literal, seething, roaring hell has no charms for a priest. What would the church come to without a live, real, working, sulphur lake for sinners? There must be a veritable hell; the clergy see the need of one; they will not giv it up. The timid must be slaves! Not satisfied with eternal torments after the resurrection, the Catholic church has reared and maintains a half-way house of agony called purgatory, to escape which it is necessary to contribute cash or equivalents—mostly cash—to save souls from torture for that wonderfully indefinit space of time that intervenes between death and the regular judgment. Oh! what fools mankind will be! What slaves ignorance does make! Oh! the terrors of that demon fear. It is not the love of humanity that holds dupes in line, it is a mortal dread. Intelligence is the only hope. As mankind think, and study, and observe, and reason, they become free. It is the only chance to free mankind. If intelligence goes on apace, there is a lively hope that a better day will come. It is coming. If a prayer was ever answered, I would say, Let us pray.

JOHN BUSHEL.

Brotherly Love.

[The following note explains the subjoined poster: "Pittsburgh, June 15, 1887.—Inclosed find document extensively circulated in Ireland by Protestants in 1820 in derision of the practices of the Catholic church. I obtained it from a gentleman who brought it from Ireland many years ago]

THE INFALLIBLE FRATERNITY OF THE TRUE FAITH IN LONDONDERRY AND NEIGHBORHOOD

Are hereby informed, that on the 4th of November last there arrived in London, by the Boulogne steamer, from the Continent (vide papers of that date), a large quantity of Crucifixes, Crosses, Agnus Dei's, Rosaries, Charms, Bleeding Hearts, Images, and Relics of Saints and Martyrs, a Miraculous Case of which has been received at Crab Lane, and will be disposed of to those of the Holy Faith only, who may feel spiritually inclined to purchase the same, commencing on Christmas day next. The whole as described will be offered at the undermentioned low prices:

500 Images of our Holy Mother, from 1s. to 5s. each.
250 Images of our Holy Mother blessed by the Holy Fathers, from 5s. to £5 each.
3,500 Crosses, all blessed at the Vatican, from 1d to 2s. 6d. each.
4,000 Rosaries, from 1s. to 5s. per set.
50 Rosaries, blessed by St. Spencer, from 7s. 6d. to £1 1s.
7,000 Pictures of Bleeding Hearts, beautifully colored to life, at various prices.
10,000 Agnus Dei's, from 1d. to £1 each.
20 Reams of Consecrated Papers, 6d. per sheet (for privy purposes).
500 Gallons of Holy Water, made by the Priests, and blessed in the passage.
3 Wagon loads of fragments of the real Cross, 4d. per cubic inch.
3 Hogsheads of teeth, selected from all the Saints in the calendar, as charms for children teething, and in strings for expectant mothers.
20 Barrels of Soil, from the grave of Father Sheeley, County Tipperary, when boiled in milk will cure all diseases, 4d. per ounce.
An endless quantity of Blushes for young ladies going to confession, 3d. per dozen.
6 Bags of Saints and Holy Fathers' bones, a sure remedy for rot in potatoes.
Any quantity of Plenary Indulgences, brought over by Cardinal Wiseman, for all sins, ranging from sly-looks to murder, prices according to the iniquity.
6 Special Pontifical Indulgences for those who hav doubted the Faith, 100 guineas each.
90,000 Consecrated Wafers, the purchasers of one will be entitled to a week's absolution, and so on in proportion for any greater number.
The last copy of Den's Theology to be sold to the highest bidder.

Purchasers, to the amount of one pound from the above selection, will be entitled to a sight of the following relics, which hav been collected for the express purpose from all the Catholic churches in the world:

St. Michael's Cudgel that bruised the Devil.
The Holy Poker, and a pair of the Pope's Old Shoes.
The Angel Gabriel's Toothpick and brush.
St. Joseph's Spokeshave, Gimlet, and a Nail he intended to drive.
Judas Iscariot's Lantern, (wants glazing).
The Holy Hand from Garswood, a touch from which will cure the Itch.
St. Thomas-a-Becket's Nightcap and Mackintosh.
St. Swithin's Umbrella and Clogs.
A piece of the Bridge of Purgatory, taken when last repaired.
St. Loyola's Strait-Jacket, Fool's Cap, and Cat-o'-nine Tails.
The Dice the Soldiers played with for the Garment.
El perillo del Sacramento (stuffed).
The Skin of the Devil's forehead (tanned).
The end of the Devil's Tail, with sting attached.

Purchasers to the amount of five pounds will be entitled to see the following:

A Crucifix, the timber part of the real Cross.
Three Thigh Bones, proved to be St. Stephen's.
The Boulder Stone that gave him the finisher, 3 cwt.
The Devil's Nose, as pulled off by St. Dunstan.
A Bunch of Keys, supposed to be St. Peter's (rather rusty).
St. Patrick's Wheelbarrow and Hod.
The Skull of St. Dennis, a large crack in it.
The Frock and Bustle of St. Bridget.
St. Anne's Stockings (want darning), and a Lock of her Hair.
The Rope that Judas hanged himself with.
A Walking Stick, made from the Cross of the Good Thief.
Guy Fawkes's Box of Lucifer Matches and Dark Lantern.
A large quantity of preserved Picaninnies from various Nunneries (would hav been young saints D. V.).

Purchasers to the amount of twenty pounds and upwards will be entitled to see the following:

Two Skulls of St. Peter, one when he was a little boy.
A Pair of the Virgin Mary's Garters, to be presented to a Chapel in building.
Pope Joan's Blessed Baby, preserved in spirits.
The Pope's Shirt that he wore when he vacated Rome (rather discolored).
St. Winifred's Head, and a Bottle of her Holy Water.
One of the Tails of Balaam's Ass.
A Sack of Hair from Nebuchadnezzar's Back.
The Virtues of St. R. I. P., of St. Helen's, wrote by himself.

The female faithful are affectionately informed that there will be a raffle in the Confessional for Phelim's Wart and Staff. Early application for shares will be necessary, as a great number are already bespoke.

If all the lots are not disposed of in a few days, the remainder will be put up by Lottery, and to insure sobriety, honesty, and good behavior, the following childless Monks, Nuns, and converted Noviciates, hav been selected to superintend the disposal:

|---|---|
| Monk Oliver | Sister Calimanco |
| " Judas | " Mercy |
| " Busy Bee | " Nancy |
| " Riddle | " Duchess |
| " Worsted | " Postage |
| The Monk of Sutton | " Finger Post |
| Noviciate Bottler | Perverted for Worsted |
| " Auctioneer | " Work |
| " Paregoric | " To Sin no More |
| " Waggonbody | " Filthy Lucre |
| " Thimble | " Love |
| " James | " A Sweet Bibby |

After the distribution of the prizes, the Fraternity will be shown, at the foot of the Altar, a faithful copy of Taylor's Will, with Wiseman's Jesuitical explanation thereof; and then a grand prophetic Emblematic Exhibition by two Priests in Person, of the great battle that is to be fought between the Protestant Bishop of Westminster and Cardinal Wiseman, for the title, when it will be left to Providence and themselvs to fight it out; but it is expected that one of the priests will get rather warm, and he that represents the cardinal will drop in for a sound drubbing (à la St. Collins, of Liverpool), and run off from the contest, to the amazement, consternation, and pity of the faithful; during his flight the organ will play a solemn requiem for the poor cardinal and the rest of the flock.

The foregoing document shows how the Protestants loved their Catholic brethren, and also how careful they were not to injure their feelings. But if the same rules were applied to the distributors of this that the Protestants apply now to Infidels, they should hav been prosecuted for blasphemy. Every Christian paper that we hav seen has applauded the conviction of Mr. Reynolds because he "outraged the sentiment of the community." The circular is as well or better calculated to outrage the sentiments of a Catholic Christian community than anything Mr. Reynolds said or wrote. But to the intolerant Protestant bigots it makes a great deal of difference whose feelings are wounded. No Infidel must shock their pious sentiments, under penalty of the prison; but they can make fun of their religious opponents with impunity. Such are the morals of Protestantism, and such their consistency in maintaining freedom of speech!

The Liberty of Thought and Discussion.

JOHN STUART MILL "ON LIBERTY."

With us heretical opinions do not perceptibly gain, or even lose, ground in each decade or generation; they never blaze out far and wide, but continue to smoulder in the narrow circles of thinking and studious persons among whom they originate, without ever lighting up the general affairs of mankind with either a true or a deceptiv light. And thus is kept up a state of things very satisfactory to some minds, because without the unpleasant process of fining or imprisoning anybody it maintains all prevailing opinions outwardly undisturbed, while it does not absolutely interdict the exercise of reason by dissentients afflicted with the malady of thought.

Unhappily there is no security in the state of the public mind that the suspension of worse forms of legal persecution, which has lasted for about the space of a generation, will continue. In this age the quiet surface of routine is as often ruffled by attempts to resuscitate past evils as to introduce new benefits. What is boasted of at the present time as the revival of religion is always, in narrow and uncultivated minds, at least as much the revival of bigotry; and where there is the strong permanent leaven of intolerance in the feelings of a people, which at all times abides in the middle classes of this country, it needs but little to provoke them into activly persecuting those whom they hav never ceased to think proper objects of persecution.

A convenient plan for having peace in the intellectual world, and keeping all things going on therein very much as they do already. But the price paid for this sort of intellectual pacification is the sacrifice of the entire moral courage of the human mind. A state of things in which a large portion of the most activ and inquiring intellects find it advisable to keep the genuin principles and grounds of their convictions within their own breasts, and attempt in what they address to the public to fit as much as they can of their own conclusions to premises which they hav internally renounced, cannot send forth the open, fearless characters, and logical, consistent intellects who once adorned the thinking world. The sort of men who can be looked for under it are either mere conformers to commonplace, or time-servers for truth, whose arguments on all great subjects are meant for their hearers, and are not those which hav convinced themselvs. Those who avoid this alternativ do so by narrowing their thoughts and interest to things which can be spoken of without venturing within the region of principles, that is, to small practical matters which would come right of themselvs if but the minds of mankind were strengthened and enlarged, and which will never be made effectually right until then; while that which would strengthen and enlarge men's minds, free and daring speculation on the highest subjects, is abandoned.

Truth gains more even by the errors of one who, with due study and preparation, thinks for himself, than by the true opinions of those who only hold them because they do not suffer themselvs to think. Not that it is solely or chiefly to form great thinkers that freedom of thinking is required. On the contrary, it is as much, and even more, indispensable to enable average human beings to attain the mental stature which they are capable of. There hav been, and may again be, great individual thinkers in a general atmosphere of mental slavery. But there never has been, nor ever will be, in that atmosphere an intellectually activ people. Where any people has made a temporary approach to such a character, it has been because the dread of heterodox speculation was for a time suspended.

In respect to all persons but those whose pecuniary circumstances make them independent of the good will of other people, opinion on this subject is as efficacious as law; men might as well be imprisoned as excluded from the means of earning their bread. Those whose bread is already secured, and who desire no favors from men in power, or from bodies of men, or from the public, hav nothing to fear from the open avowal of any opinions but to be ill-thought of and ill-spoken of, and this it ought not to require a very heroic mold to enable them to bear. There is no room for any appeal ad misericordiam in behalf of such persons. But though we do not now inflict so much evil on those who think differently from us as it was formerly our custom to do, it may be that we do ourselvs as much evil as ever by our treatment of them. Socrates was put to death, but the Socratic philosophy rose like the sun in heaven, and spread its illumination over the whole intellectual firmament.

But it is not the minds of heretics that are deteriorated most by the ban placed on all inquiry which does not end in the orthodox conclusions. The greatest harm done is to those who are not heretics, and whose whole mental development is cramped, and their reason cowed by the fear of heresy. Who can compute what the world loses in the multitude of promising intellects combined with timid characters, who dare not follow out any bold, vigorous, independent train of thought lest it should land them in something which would admit of being considered irreligious or immoral? Among them we may occasionally see some man of deep conscientiousness and subtil and refined understanding who spends a life in sophisticating with an intellect which he cannot silence, and exhausts the resources of ingenuity in attempting to reconcile the promptings of his conscience and reason with orthodoxy, which yet he does not, perhaps, to the end succeed in doing. No one can be a great thinker who does not recognize that as a thinker it is his first duty to follow his intellect to whatever conclusions it may lead.

But I must be permitted to observe that it is not the feeling sure of a doctrin (be it what it may) which I call an assumption of infallibility. It is the undertaking to decide that question for others, without allowing them to hear what can be said on the contrary side. And I denounce and reprobate this pretension not the less if put forth on the side of my most solemn convictions. However positiv anyone's persuasion may be, not only of the falsity but of the pernicious consequences—not only of the pernicious consequences, but (to adopt expressions which I altogether condemn) the immorality and impiety of an opinion; yet if, in pursuance of that private judgment, though backed by the public judgment of his country or his contemporaries, he prevents the opinion from being heard in its defense, he assumes infallibility. And so far from the assumption being less objectionable or less dangerous because the opinion is called immoral or impious, this is the case of all others in which it is most fatal. These are exactly the occasions on which the men of one generation commit those dreadful mistakes which excite the astonishment and horror of posterity. It is among such that we find the instances memorable in history, when the arm of the law has been employed to root out the best men and the noblest doctrins; with deplorable success as to the men, though some of the doctrins hav survived to be (as if in mockery) invoked in defense of similar conduct toward those who dissent from them, or from their received interpretation.

A Scientific "Religion."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 16th we shall begin the publication of a series of papers which we know will be most favorably received by the Freethinkers of the country—a series written specially for our columns by Prof. Felix L. Oswald. Professor Oswald's book, "The Secret of the East," has made him known to the Liberals of the country, and his contributions to the Popular Science Monthly, the North American Review, the Forum, etc., hav made him a solid reputation as a scientific thinker. He is also author of the following books published by Appleton and Lippincott: Physical Education, Summerland Sketches, Zoölogical Sketches, Household Remedies, and the Poison Problem.

The title of the series which we shall publish is, "The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism. A Contribution to the Religion of the Future." The purpose of the papers is to demonstrate the natural basis of ethics, and to expose the immoral tendency of the Christian religion in many of its tenets, such as the natural depravity dogma, tending to the suppression of normal instincts; the alleged sinfulness of unbelief, suppressing the spirit of free inquiry; the imaginary duty of blind submission to established authorities, fostering flunkeyism and mental prostitution; and other-worldliness, which encourages the neglect of this world's interests and duties. Against these Christian teachings, so detrimental to humanity, will be set in contrast the safe standards of natural religions, by showing the identity of duty and inclination in normal specimens of our race—adducing the health-protecting instincts of young children, their love of physical exercise, their candor, their inquisitivness—all suppressed by the preposterous methods of our parsonage-plan of education.

Each chapter will be devoted to some special maxim of a code embodying the condition of earthly happiness: health, freedom, truth, order, justice, prudence, self-reliance, knowledge, industry, etc. These papers are replete with anecdote and illustrations from history and the customs of foreign nations, and the author proves his positions by facts. To the critics of Liberalism who ask, "If you explode their nonsense, what are you going to put in its place?" this series will be a complete answer. The papers will continue for several months.

We would respectfully suggest that Liberals make extra effort to induce their Christian friends to read this series, and become converts to The Religion of the Future.

Three New Pamphlets by Colonel Ingersoll.

We hav put in pamphlet form the last three articles by Colonel Ingersoll that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They are

THE TRUTH OF HISTORY. This is a comment by Colonel Ingersoll upon the religious lies that hav been told about himself, and first made its appearance in these columns.

BIBLE IDOLATRY. A letter Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the editor of the London Secular Review.

INGERSOLL ON MCGLYNN. Being the comments and opinions of Mr. Ingersoll upon the fight in the Catholic church between the late pastor of St. Stephen's and his employer, the pope.

The price of each of these little pamphlets is three cents; per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $2.

The Priests of Missouri.

If THE TRUTH SEEKER had published the story that thirty Roman Catholic priests in one diocese had been guilty of all sorts of misconduct, the Catholic press would hav said that we told a falsehood. But Bishop Hogan, of the diocese around Kansas City, Mo., has said that, and it remains to be seen what the church authorities will do to him for telling tales out of school. Mr. Hogan had occasion to suspend a priest by the name of Hynes, at Pierce City, and a business concern sued the priest for a lot of furniture he had purchased. One of the witnesses examined was the bishop, and while upon the stand he admitted the authorship of a letter in which he named thirty priests, giving dates and full details, who had got drunk, got into street fights, got into houses of ill-fame, got into jail, and into trouble of almost all possible kinds. The following is a partial list, which the bishop gave as samples:

"1869. Received in the St. Joseph diocese the Rev. Michael Haley, priest of diocese of Cloyne, tried in diocese of Buffalo and failed, as he had failed in Cloyne. Recommended from diocese of Buffalo to diocese of St. Joseph. In diocese of St. Joseph (Brookfield mission) constantly drunk; once made an assault on a female. Got sick, was taken into Sisters' Hospital, Felix street, St. Joseph, and died there in 1870.

"1869. Received into diocese of St. Joseph, the Rev. Mr. McGinnis (Breckenridge mission), constantly drunk. Belonged to diocese of Dubuque; sent out of diocese of St. Joseph in 1870.

"1869. Received into diocese of St. Joseph, Francis O'Reilley, student, recommended by priests of St. Louis. O'Reilly had been a student in Cleveland. No cause assigned for leaving Cleveland. After ordination had charge of Plattsburg mission. Was constantly drunk. Afterward got permission to go in the Newark, N. J., diocese; there got publicly drunk, and had to be put into a hospital asylum. Is now going round from city to city a drunken wreck.

"1869. Received into diocese of St. Joseph, the Rev. George Turk, from diocese of St. Louis. Got charge of Conception mission. Was constantly drunk. Got the people of his congregation to fighting each other, and going to law with each other, fighting at church on Sundays, and lawing each other the remainder of the week in court.

"I cannot giv you a history of each individual case of misfortune and of crime. The recital would be too long, and often too shameful in detail. I mention names and dates only of a few:

Recounting his experience with these priests, the bishop says:

"I did not know then, as by bitter experience I now know, that priests ordained for and belonging to a diocese do not leave it but through compulsion or expulsion, especially when the change is from a rich to a poor diocese. Such expelled priests are a happy riddance to the bishops they hav grieved and the parishes they hav scandalized, but they are a withering curse to the bishops and the parishes compelled to hav their services. It is true no bishop receives a priest from another diocese without a recommendation from his former bishop, but the former bishops are generally heartsore from scandals, vexations, and troubles, and hav no objection whatever to hav trouble removed from their own doors. In their charity also for erring priests, in their written recommendations of them they giv them honorable mention for every good quality they hav—and the worst men generally hav some good qualities; but they never mention their faults, hoping that priests, when they go to a new place, and get another opportunity to do good, will avoid the faults that brought them into trouble before.

"But, alas! human nature is very weak, and when temptations come again they are yielded to, and thus it is that, in trying to pardon and lift up erring men, we hav only got them into deeper disgrace, and given them opportunity to disgrace themselvs more and more, and to carry and spread disgrace from diocese to diocese, and from parish to parish. In this way priests hav been known to go from Ireland to England, and thence to Australia through the United States, from one diocese to another, pardoned by one bishop, exhorted by another, to no purpose but to spread quarrels, contentions, and scandals through the church.

"The constant shameful public and sacrilegious drunkenness of the last three mentioned priests who were by my side at the cathedral determined me to wipe them and their kind out of my jurisdiction. Herbert, after repeated drunkenness, went into a spree for a week in my house. Was in the house, broke out at night, got into a house of disreputable women in his drunkenness, and was thrown out into the street, picked up drunk, recognized and taken into a house and made sober and put into a carriage and taken to my house. That evening Galvin and Kiley were told by me to prepare for the proper celebration of the feast of the patronage of St. Joseph for Easter Sunday. On Saturday night they stayed up all night drinking, carousing, and shouting. Kiley fell down, blackened and almost broke his face in falling. Of course, the two sacrilegious priests said mass the next day, and Kiley went into the pulpit and preached, with his blackened and bruised face, to the people of the cathedral. This was on the feast of the patron of the diocese and of the universal church. It was time for me to begin a reformation."

This is good testimony in support of the charges made against Roman Catholic priests, and it cannot be said to proceed from an unfriendly source. Everybody who pays attention to the order of the priesthood knows that priests as a class are sensual men, but it is generally impossible to convict them. In New York, for instance, it has come to our knowledge that various priests hav been high livers—eating and drinking riotously, and indulging in other disgraceful excesses—but when we hav asked our informants to put that down in shape for use, they hav invariably declined. It is not often that a priest in this city is arrested, though they hav frequently been seen upon the streets in an intoxicated state; the police are almost to a man Roman Catholics, and a good percentage of the judges and court officials are of that religious faith. And in politics the church is all-powerful, so that the priestly misdemeanants are safe.

Bishop Hogan has done a good deed in exposing the immoralities of the priests of his diocese. The public will be curious, however, to know what his archbishop will do to him for his frankness.

Another Curiosity for Mr. Lamar, of Chicago.

Perhaps the stupidest comment upon the recent blasphemy case is this from the Western Rural, published in Chicago:

"An ex-minister of the gospel in New Jersey has been found guilty of blasphemy. He was a sort of imitator of Bob Ingersoll, but without Ingersoll's polish and genius. Bob is exceedingly blasphemous, but he does it in a good-natured way, and in a style that robs it of a great deal of its harshness. But this New Jersey imitator was as uncouth and rasping as the oath of a boy who is just learning to swear. He made wretched work of it, and so disgusted everybody that he was brought to the bar of justice under a statute of the state that was a hundred years old, and had never before been enforced. Ingersoll was his lawyer, and made a very temperate speech. Mr. Ingersoll himself makes the mistake of seeming to think that bold declaration and ridicule are argument. This New Jerseyman appears to also hav thought that calling God 'names' was sound and convincing argument. He did not convince, and could not convince, any intelligent man by such a course of anything except that he was a low-bred, vulgar-mouthed person. If a man does not believe that there is a God, that is his business. If he chooses to say that he does not believe it, that is his business. But when he delivers himself of a flood of obscene language, that is a matter that his neighbors hav something to say about. He is indecent when he uses improper language even to a gate-post, and the law that brings him to account is a good law. Nothing is gained by blaspemous or other indecent language, and in such a case as this one under consideration the only purpose of its use is to wound somebody's feelings, and that is not gentlemanly. We ardently wish that there was law enough to shut up every vulgar mouth in all the world, whatever may be the occasion of its belchings. We hav a great deal of sympathy for the weakness of men, but we hav not the slightest patience with a man whose tongue delights in obscenity or blasphemy. It is unmanly, and Colonel Ingersoll to the contrary notwithstanding, nobody has any right in this free country to be unmanly."

Profounder ignorance of his subject is seldom shown, even by a squash-and-potato editor. And a narrower spirit than this writer possesses we hope never to observe. The New Jerseyites would hav felt very good if they could hav found Mr. Reynolds's language to be even indecent, much more obscene; but our country friend from Chicago has no difficulty at all in convicting him off-hand of the vilest obscenity. And the ease with which he runs blasphemy into obscenity ought to earn him a place in Comstock's society, for the agent of the John-street soap-boiler has torn his hair many times and oft because he could not reach all heretics through his obscenity laws.

His solicitude for the morals of a gate-post shows that our agricultural editor's heart is in his business, and reflects credit upon his Christian training. We agree with him that any man who corrupts a gate-post by blasphemous language ought to be shut up; indeed, the rack and dungeon would be lenient punishment. Every legislature should at once pass a law protecting Christian gate-posts from heretical contamination, and the National Reform party might well ask for a constitutional amendment compelling decency to gate-posts as the measure of a citizen's fitness for voting.

And then again, what a broad party platform would that be which should demand that "nobody has any right to be unmanly!" If it were properly called to its attention, there is no doubt the Women's Christian Temperance Union would embody this idea in its organic documents, even though it might be considered rather oppressiv upon the female sex.

The editor of the Western Rural is in the wrong place. His great abilities hav not sufficient scope. Let him apply to Mr. Lamar, of his city, who will undoubtedly giv him an engagement at his dime museum, in lieu of the Reynolds jurors whom he failed to secure.

Features of the Queen's Jubilee.

Fifty years ago, counting backward from June 21, 1887, Victoria Alexandrina became queen of England. Last week Tuesday, the fiftieth anniversary of that event was celebrated by her loyal subjects and others, and commemorativ services were continued throughout the week. In London one of the biggest crowds the world ever saw lined the streets through which she passed from Buckingham Palace to Westminster Abbey, within whose sacred and expensiv walls she was originally crowned.

The queen of England occupies the position of a medium between the Almighty and the British people. She is their sovereign by divine right, transmitted to her from the deity through the offices of his ministers. At least, such is the theory; though it must be said that the theory is hardly a scientific one, and by many is considered idiotic in the extreme. There are those, however, who believe in it, some of whom are alive.

At Westminster Abbey the proceedings were of a so-called religious character, and were afforded by the queen's loyal subjects, through taxation collected by the sheriff, at an expense of $85,000. It is a matter to take pride in that they eclipsed in grandeur even those which marked her coronation fifty years previously. The services were composed of the mummery which passes for worship in Episcopal churches, and when they were over the procession moved back to Buckingham Palace, incidentally passing over a small child and killing it. It is doubtful if the parents of the child duly appreciated the honor thus bestowed upon their unworthy offspring. It is also safe to say that there was one mother in London who did not enjoy the queen's jubilee.

In Ireland the day was observed by fights between Catholics and Protestants. A number of Irish women contributed a purse of $18,500 to the queen as a jubilee gift, which, no doubt, her majesty transferred to her stocking with such alacrity as her age would permit. As her income is reckoned at less than $2,000,000 per annum, the sum donated by the women of Ireland will help keep the wolf from the door for another year.

In New York the Catholics said mass in their churches for the souls of the ten million victims of misrule who hav died of hunger or in dungeons, on the scaffold or on the battle-field, or hav been evicted or expatriated during Victoria's beneficent reign.

Our loyal Englishmen and Anglomaniacs hired the Metropolitan Opera House and made speeches and sent an address to her majesty extending assurances of their distinguished consideration.

Erastus Wiman, an Englishman who owns the boats and railroads connecting New York with Staten Island, got up a celebration at Erastina and St. George's Park, and by advertising tremendous attractions induced about fifteen thousand people to patronize his boats and to drink the beer which he provided. From a financial point of view, his patriotism had its reward.

From Washington President Cleveland took it upon himself to send Victoria word that he but uttered the general voice of his fellow-countrymen in wishing the prolongation of her reign; which is well enough by way of courtesy, but which in point of fact is untrue. If the American people wished for the continuance of monarchy in England, they were very inconsistent in fighting against it in this country.

This jubilee affords the thoughtful person an opportunity to indulge one cheerful reflection, namely that the reign of divinely appointed kings and queens is a half century nearer its end than it was fifty years ago when Victoria was crowned in Westminster Abbey.

One Ecclesiastical Thumbscrew.

The New York Herald assures the public that it is in possession of certain knowledge that the parishioners of Dr. McGlynn's parish who do not contribute to the support of St. Stephen's church are being refused absolution at the confessional. The Herald prints the following:

"The reporter was told of the following occurrence in the German church of St. Francis of Assisi, in West Thirty-first street, a sample, his informant said, of what takes place in other parishes: A lady went to confession last Saturday night in the above church. She was a parishioner of St. Stephen's. After she had told her little tale her confessor asked her where she lived. Friends of hers had been asked the same question and she knew what it meant.

"'I don't feel bound to tell you that, father,' she answered.

"'Do you belong to the Committee of Thirty-five?' (This is the executiv committee of the McGlynnites of St. Stephen's.)

"'If I did, father,' answered the fair penitent, 'it is not a mortal sin, nor yet a venial one.'

"'Are you a sympathizer with Dr. McGlynn?' persisted the priest.

"'Yes, father, and I will continue to be.'

"'Then I will not giv you absolution,' said the confessor so loudly that, says the lady, he attracted the attention of other waiting penitents.

"'Well, father,' said the lady, rising from her knees, 'I will never again ask you, or any other priest, to giv me absolution,' and she left the confessional almost in tears.

"The priest quickly saw he had made a mistake, hastily called her back, and after a few words gave her absolution. In future the lady will attend another church Her name is in the possession of the Herald, but cannot be published."

The priests are acting under orders, of course, from Archbishop Corrigan, and this step indicates the church's determination to enforce obedience to its authority, so far as it can.

As long ago as last January, THE TRUTH SEEKER said: "We are much mistaken if even the most devoted of Dr. McGlynn's parishioners does not weaken in his allegiance when the authorities put the ecclesiastical screw upon the lay thumb. A refusal of church privileges—confession, absolution, sacraments, burial rites—to be followed by excommunication, will bring most of the Catholics of St. Stephen's parish to their knees." One of the measures that we mentioned is now being tried, though, we are glad to say, without success in the one instance that has become public. In how many instances it has succeeded, who can say? It is generally reported and believed that Dr. McGlynn has been threatened with excommunication should he not reach Rome by July 2d, to explain away his contumacious conduct, and he has publicly said that he will not go. When he has suffered the extreme penalty that the church can now inflict, when his old parishioners hav been boycotted by the church, and all his Catholic friends hav become religious outcasts, what will he and they think of "holy church?" Will they still cling to her as the possessor of all truth, the protector of the poor, the giver of eternal pain or pleasure, or will they denounce her for what she is, an arrogant tyrant, a stupendous fraud, and the worst punishment the human race has ever inflicted upon itself through ignorant superstition?

A few score years ago Edward McGlynn would hav been burnt at the stake, and his followers put in dungeons. To-day, in America, they can believe what they please without fear of bodily harm. It will be a glorious triumph for freedom if they hav the manhood and womanhood to throw off all other fear?

Editorial Notes.

IN answer to a question from a subscriber we may state—for about the fiftieth time—that D. M. Bennett was a Spiritualist and Atheist. That is, his faith was strong that the phenomena of Spiritualism proved another existence for mortals, and he had no idea whatever that a personal God existed. Sometimes Mr. Bennett expounded a philosophy akin to Pantheism, but on straight theological lines he would properly be put down as an Atheist.

MR. CHARLES ECKHARD, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published the Nine Demands in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper 24x19 inches are the cabinet-sized likenesses of Jefferson, Washington, and Paine, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are Franklin and John Adams, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are Lafayette, Girard, and Ingersoll, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 upon application to Mr. Eckhard or to this office.

THE Alabama Sentinel, an official organ of the Knights of Labor, published at Birmingham, Ala., has a shrewd appreciation of New Jersey. It says: "The imported Pinkerton detectivs who, during the recent coal-handlers' strike in New Jersey, fired into a crowd of Jersey City children, killing one, were acquitted of the charge of murder by the jury last week. Some of the local newspapers are inquiring for the lost, strayed, or stolen Jersey justice. It was busy at Morristown at that time prosecuting C. B. Beynolds for blasphemy under a statute two hundred years old. Just giv Jersey justice time and it will get there."

OUR Episcopalian citizens are gradually backsliding into Romanism. The pastoral letter issued last year was almost a Catholic document; and the plan to erect a cathedral is copying the mother church. Now at the Long Island diocesan convention just held, a Rev. Mr. Geer "vigorously denounced public schools as being worthless so far as regarded their efficacy in teaching the truths of Christianity," and said the schools "are becoming worse as the days go on." Mr. Geer should be reminded that the public schools are not supported for the purpose of teaching religion, and then he should get him to a monastery.

THE New York World makes the discovery that "the last two-thirds of Robert Ingersoll's tribute to the memory of Beecher is a fine specimen of blank verse." "Moreover," adds the World, "it is a contribution to our literature which will do much to raise the average of American poetry. It is a master-stroke, and there is no good reason why it should not appear in its appropriate garb in type." This is all true enough, but a lily is not improved by painting, and it is not necessary to use art to place one of Colonel Ingersoll's compositions at the top of English literature. The World should study the sentiment of the tribute, not its dress.

THE Cape Fear Advocate is published by a colored man in Wilmington, Del., for and in the interests of the colored people. Negro preachers, in his opinion, are much like their white brethren, and he warns his race against them. He says: "There is nothing that does more to injure the negro race than the ignorant jackass preachers who prey upon the pockets of the colored people. On Sunday these Bible-smashers can be seen after their pulpit harang is over sitting around some of their members' houses, with another man's wife, waiting for the last old hen to be put on the table that they may stuff their hypocritical hide. They, as a rule, are always wanting to build a church, and therefore can be found with a little book collecting money for that purpose, and when it has been built it would not make a good-sized coal-house. Generally these pulpit gymnasts know as much about preaching as a Tennessee mule knows about probation after death."

WHEN the Perfectionists at Walnut Hills, Ohio, were exposed about a year ago, and forced by public opinion to discontinue their peculiar worship, which their religious opponents called scandalous, they joined the Methodist church of the place. Recently the authorities of the church found they had renewed in secret the practice of their rites, and at once put them on trial on the following four specifications:

"First. The claiming and teaching that Mrs. Martin was God the Father, and Mrs. Brooke the Christ.

"Second. That Jesus of Nazareth, after the flesh, was the son of Joseph as really as of Mary.

"Third. That the church of to-day is the Babylon, as recorded in Revelation, and is the mother of harlots and the abomination of the whole earth.

"Fourth. Power to work miracles under certain conditions."

The committee before whom they were tried found them guilty, and unanimously recommended that they be expelled from the church. This treatment of the Perfectionists shows how the orthodox people regard any other superstition than their own. They keep the only genuin gods—do the orthodox.

THE queen of England's jubilee, celebrated June 21st, was not allowed to pass without the religious row usual when large numbers of people get together. In Belfast, Ireland, jubilee bands were attacked by Catholics, and stones flew thick and heavy until the police appeared. After a hard fight, in which many policemen as well as rioters were injured, the mob was dispersed. In Cork about fifty persons were disabled by Catholic rioters, and a newspaper office was raided. In Boston, Mass., U. S. A., because the city granted the use of Faneuil Hall to a British society for a banquet, the Irish Catholics surrounded the building and yelled and fought vigorously. It took three hundred policemen to prevent the good Irish Catholic citizens from mobbing the banqueting society. The rioters nearly killed several Englishmen, the policemen nearly killed several rioters, and the militia were put in readiness to defend the city from a furious uprising of patriotic Irish Catholics. In New York the Catholics held funeral services in various churches to mourn for the "Irishmen who fell in holy Ireland's fight." If our good Irish Catholic citizens would keep their quarrels to themselvs, they would appear to better advantage. Englishmen in this country hav the same right to celebrate the queen's jubilee that the Irish hav to hold Home Rule meetings, and the Irishmen should remember it.

Letters from Friends.

WHITE CHURCH, KAN., June 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I don't know when I hav been more shocked than since I hav learned of Elmina's incarceration in a filthy jail. How long is it to be the case that Liberals are to be treated in this manner? Is it not astonishing to know that so pure and philanthropic a person as she can hav such indignities heaped upon them? I hope you will make it hot for her base persecutors. I am old and sick, but I say, Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, and may your lives be spared to battle for the right. My regards to Heston. I. P. MARTIN.

LEON, IOWA, May 24, 287.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals had their first regular meeting last Sunday, and adopted that constitution you suggested some time ago of an Illinois society, and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, namely, moral, social, and industrial basis. The names of the officers of the Leon Secular Union are: A. E. Hall, president; W. E. Gammon, vice-president; Mrs. A. B. Hall, treasurer; and Mrs. J. W. Long, secretary. We were assembled for a pic-nic last Sunday, as well as for general work, and just as we had our fishing-tackle ready, and swing hung, a much-needed and welcome shower drove us to the house of our worthy president, on the banks of Weldon Creek, where we listened to speeches, readings, essays, recitations, music, etc. Everyone resorted to some favorit amusement after dinner, and over fifty persons did all in their power to act natural, human, and to sustain a Secular Sabbath. We meet again at the same place the third Sunday in June. JOHN W. LONG.

ORANGE, N. J., June 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: My residence is near far-famed Morristown, the place where Brother Reynolds was hauled up and fined $25 for expressing an honest opinion in regard to certain words and phrases. The result of that farcical trial may be set down as a grand triumph of Freethought over orthodoxy. Although friend Reynolds was required to pay a fine, the verdict of the people was in his favor. Reynolds was not on trial. The case simply hinged on an insignificant technicality, viz., "Had that old obsolete law been violated?" That old law, which had been a dead letter for two hundred years, was revived and put in force. Of course, honest urymen had to admit that the old law had been violated, which gave a wooden-headed judge a show of authority to impose a nominal fine. But they are all sick of it. You will see that such a miserable law will be repealed next winter. The people of Boonton and Morristown are just as sick of and ashamed of the whole affair as they can be. That $25 has made more proselytes to the cause of Freethought than thousands of dollars would make if expended in any other way. We cannot compute the grand influence of that little sum by way of bringing indifferent thinkers to a knowledge of the truth. ESS E. TEE.

OKETO, KAN., May 29, 287.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav not seen anything from this part of the moral vinyard for some time, I thought it proper to let the friends know how the cause was progressing in this part of the great Sunflower state. The cause of Freethought is being pushed in quiet but effectiv manner. The Cone brothers, of Axtell, and others are scattering Liberal literature all over the county, and its effects are being felt. By the way, Mr. Cone has been carrying on a religious discussion through one of the county papers with one of the pope's hired men, named Hurley; but alas! like others of his kidney, all Hurley could do was to call names and make faces. His scurrilous replies, for they cannot be dignified by the name of arguments, even disgusted the better class of his own people. Mr. J. E. Remsburg gave a course of lectures at Turner Hall, Marysville, a few weeks ago, and on account of continuous rains the attendance was not as large as was desired, but the lectures were well received, and a good impression made. Mr. Remsburg, besides being a good speaker, is a courteous and affable gentleman, which qualities soon destroy that prejudice which many Christians hav against Freethinkers.

As so many hav their say on the Anarchy question, I shall briefly express my views on the matter. While I bitterly detest the principles of Anarchy, I do say that the Chicago farce would disgrace the autocracy of Russia, and I am proud to see the editor of the greatest Freethought journal in the world stand up, not for Anarchy, but for the eternal right. JOHN A. MAYHEW.

WEST TROY, N. Y., June 8, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Let those who admire tyranny and superstition date from Cæsar or Christ, but we who profess better things should use any other chronology, and I can think of none better than the Bruno calendar. Although there were nominal sciences even ages before the Mosaic Adam, yet until Bruno showed that natural laws are universal, there was no comprehensiv and positiv science. As regards the time of his death, a few days need make no dispute about our era. The Christian era does not coincide with any time given for the birth of its supposed hero by several years, whilst it is not really the year 1 of Bruno's era until Feb. 18, 1601, of the era of superstition. So far as convenience and unity are concerned, there are other calendars than the Christian one which are used by more people than that.

How long do intelligent Americans intend to submit to the muzzlement of the press? The latest development of bigotry is the boycotting of a local paper by a West Troy police judge, who assaulted three news-boys and deprived them of their wares because his judgeship thought the Truth not fit for distribution. Truth is a fierce West Troy political paper with sound sense, and no love for the drunken magistrate. The publishers, so says an extra, propose to proceed against him for highway robbery. The editor has since been brutally assaulted. It is an inter-Irish war. When Liberals enough hav been fined, imprisoned, and legally murdered, the great silent host of thinkers will make themselvs heard in legislativ halls and secure the freedom to speak their own minds.

A Christian has just asked me what we want of laws if there be no God. I answer: "We do not want laws for the sake of God, but for the good of man, and most of all we need laws to protect honest Freethinkers from Christian cowards and cutthroats. If there were no Christian nations, the United States would need no navy. There is always danger that a god man will get an inspiration and Guiteau you." JOHN P. GUILD.

WEST GROVE, PA., June 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As I was visiting with old friends and relativs in the neighborhood of Longwood, I thought I would drop in here and see how they were coming on, as my habit in former years has been to do so when I was in this particular neighborhood.

It is now nearly forty years since this yearly meeting of the Progressiv Friends was inaugurated, to fill what seemed to be a want of the more Liberal members of the Society of Friends (Hicksite), with Oliver Johnson at their head. But little by little its usefulness as a free and Liberal organization has dwindled away. Their presiding officer on this occasion was from Rhode Island, and I judge belonged to the Free Religious school, of which the Index was the organ. His right-hand supporter was G. B. Stebbins, of Detroit, who was there to represent Spiritualism, to get subscribers for the Religio, to circulate copies of that paper among the audience, and to make flings at Materialism and the great Secular movement of the age. So that with these two classes of minds that the Progressiv Friends of Pennsylvania hav got set over them, it is no wonder that the more free, intelligent thinkers hav been withdrawing their material aid to the support of these meetings, so that the subject of their discontinuance was brought up for consideration. When the vote was taken, some six or eight voted to discontinue, and about twice the number to continue the meetings. One of the leaders of these meetings, a capitalist who had paid out his money with a liberal hand for their support, and who had voted for their discontinuance, rose and remarked that unless they could hav the names of thirty or forty to their subscription paper for a sum of money from each one (not to exceed five dollars), to sustain these meetings, they would hav to be discontinued. So it would seem as though the continuance of these Progressiv Friends' meetings of Chester county, Pa., hangs on the finance question, and as I hav been an attender of these meetings, more or less, for the last twenty-seven years, I am not at all surprised that the intelligent Freethinkers of Chester county, Pa., hav got tired of paying out their money to support this bogus Free Progressiv Friends' yearly meeting, now run in the interest of cliques and parties. S. D. MOORE.

MYRTLE CREEK, OR., June 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not written any for THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, but hav been doing something for our valuable cause through the columns of a local journal. I am glad that S. P Putnam is lecturing in this country. If I had means, I would circulate our literature from one end of the country to the other.

The clerical drones of Southern Methodism hav made their appearance in our little town. The Baptists were here a short time ago. The Presbyterians officiate once a month. It is seldom that any of them get any proselytes. These preachers will not meet us in open, free public discussion, so they are afraid to slander us. They claim to reply to some of our argument (in the hearing of those who never read it) when the author is in another country.

The Bible must be peculiar to justify so many creeds and names of parties. Its ignorant votaries will not attempt to defend it, because they are unable, while its enlightened ones will not by fair means, because they know better.

They know that their premises are false, and therefore their conclusion must be false also. They know that the only way to perpetuate their claims and authority over mankind is by force—by force of law, by force of arms, and by force of superstition. But this they find cannot be accomplished in Protestant countries. They find that they are losing control of the people; that whatever is intolerable and intolerant in Protestantism must be vanquished, so that what there is of real Protestantism will soon display itself in the form of Freethought, Liberalism, and humanity. But what there is of Romanism must return to the old dragon that gave it birth. It is obvious that many so-called Protestants will go to Rome. Shall Rome ever rule America? Perhaps in a few short years we will hear the cry of "Rally round the flag, boys." Many patriots will say when they hav read this, "Giv me liberty or giv me death."

L. C. HILL.

MR. EDITOR: As the result of thought and investigation into the why and wherefore of things being as they are to-day, I had arrived at the conclusion that they are so as the result of natural law, which we hav not had the power to control. Take the human race, for instance. We all are just what we are as the result of circumstances not at our command. None of us had any choice as to our parentage, birth, or country in which we should be born; are not responsible for the traits of character in our organizations, nor for the influences operating upon us from the time of our birth to the present time. As we are to-day, we are the product of cause and effect.

If one person has been more fortunate than another in his organism, and has been surrounded by more favorable influences to make him a more moral and intellectual character, the credit is in no way due to him, it was his fortune; and the more ignorant and idiotic are not deserving of blame; it was their misfortune in having been born and placed under less favorable circumstances. No rational being would prefer being foolish or idiotic; those who are so in any degree are not so by choice, but as the result of circumstances over which they had no choice or control.

This view of things may not meet the views of many, but that does not make it less true. It will be indorsed by those whose minds hav become more enlightened, and consequently better able to view things in their true light.

What control hav we over the physical body, whether we shall be tall or short, weigh three hundred or one hundred and fifty pounds, hav black or red hair, inherit from our parentage some bodily or mental disorder? We hav no choice whatever. We hav not been made to order, but by natural law, and are as much the product of natural law a the tree that has grown in the forest.

"Oh, well," you say, "that may be all true enough with regard to the body, but the mind is different." Yes, the mind is different, but governed by laws equally as strict.

If you are born of parents who bequeath to you a good organism, and instil into your youthful mind good moral principles, giv you a good school education, laying the foundation for a scientific one, the chances will be favorable to your becoming an honorable and intellectual person. But, on the other hand, you are born with faulty organism, inherited from parentage, and in infancy and youth your surroundings are of an immoral character; your school and general education defectiv. You will be found to be mentally as well as physically what circumstances made you. If you should prove better than your surroundings, it will be, as it were, by accident that some favorable influence had reached you, and operated favorably on some good trait in your moral or mental organism so as to lead you to pursue a course better calculated to develop the moral and intellectual traits of character that may be in you, which otherwise might hav lain dormant. It is not uncommon to see such cases. So, after all, whatever we may be physically, mentally, or morally, we are the result of circumstances. Hence the necessity of trying to introduce better influences.

If what I hav said be true, where does our individual moral responsibility come in—responsibility for being where and what we are, and not better than we are? As well hold a poor man responsible for not being rich, a silly man for not being wiser, a short man for not being tall, or a tree for having grown crooked. All are the effect of causes which, under the circumstances, they were unable to avoid or reverse. JOHN RAY.

A. B. PIKARD TO D. LOUIS BODGE (POLITENESS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER).

FRIEND BODGE: I hav just read your letter to me in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hasten to reciprocate the favor. And first, I will say that the papers containing your letter to me, and mine to you, I hav given away, and therefore shall need to rely on memory, and misrepresentation is not my name. To be short, and as fair as short, the gist of the matter is this: You professed to be a friend of the spelling reform, and then when THE TRUTH SEEKER illustrated the nature of the reform by dropping off a useless letter from a few simple words which even children could not be mistaken in, you ridiculed it by calling those words bobtailed—the very simplest method that could be employed to let the people see that the reform would not change our language, as some people suppose, but simplify its spelling, so that every child and foreigner knowing the alphabet can read. How you could reconcile the two positions I couldn't see, and so I illustrated accordingly. If you had always been accustomed to hav your photograph taken with three eyes in them, however blind the third one might be, and I should make you one without the third eye, you wouldn't know yourself, nor pay me for it, it would look so much like those bobtail words.

My friend, your words imply that those who spell giv, hav, liv, and nolej are spelling deformers. Well, I am in good company. Mr. Webster and Mr. Smalley in their spelling, to show the correct speech, spell those words just as I do, and that is what spelling is for; and I spell the first three as everybody else does, for everybody knows that the only object of the invention of letters was to spell or represent the sounds that constitute words, as figures were invented to spell or represent numbers. Everybody knows that silent letters don't spell anything, and for that reason in elementary books are printed in italic. And now Mr. Bodge thinks those words are not spelled right because their useless caudal appendage is left off. I wish Mr. Bodge had told us what right spelling is. If he means that the customary spelling is right spelling, how can he be a friend to or in favor of reformed spelling?

One author says, "Spelling is representing a word by its proper letters." If this definition is correct, then we hav it that spelling is representation, and hence I say that a letter spells a sound. Letters were never designed to be grouped or clustered together to signify words, but simply to represent to the eye the elements of speech. With Mr. Bodge would reformed spelling be correct spelling if the common way is correct? He should hav given us some example of correct spelling of "nolej," for instance. He has given us the common alphabet, and the names of the letters—thanks for so much—without any reference to whether the sounds are simple or diphthongal, which shows that my friend is not an expert in the science of sounds. He must know that the names of letters amount to nothing; his eyes are offended when a useless letter is left off; his ears would be offended to hear it sounded on. It is evident that Mr. Bodge takes the names of letters for their sounds, for he says of Mr. Pikard, "It seems a trifle strange for a man who has been a spelling reformer for thirty-five years to giv the sound of o and e in this word [nolej], sounds which are not heard in it at all, omitting the sounds which are really heard, and then triumphantly remark, 'I hav spelt all the sounds in it.'" Mr. Bodge says, "You hav done nothing of the kind." There are but five sounds in the word, and I spelled it with five letters. Now, how many sounds do I spell? Mr. Bodge says, "Mr. Pikard don't spell as many sounds as there are in the word." Mr. Bodge, how many sounds are there in the word nolej? Mr. Bodge says, "Correctly spelled, the word must be nalej"—a pronounced as in far. Does he spell any more sounds than Pikard? Again, Mr. Bodge says to me, "You spelled have and give "hav" and "giv," whereas correctly spelled they would be hav and giv." Taking his own alphabet for it, we spell the words just alike, and this shows that he takes the name of a letter for its sound, instead of taking the sound of a letter for its name. Spelling reformers are governed by the sounds they wish to represent, and not by the names of letters.

I presume Mr. Bodge would write living, livid, etc., without any tail to the first syllable; hence it would be a bobtailed syllable. We learn the properties of sounds by ear, and the properties of letters by the eye, and then the relation between them. Mr. Bodge says my spelling of hav, giv, and liv is spurious reform spelling, and yet he spells them just as I do. The only difference between us is, he goes by the old names of the letters, and I by the sounds they signify. He says, Be-oh-de-gee-ee, and then pronounces his name; and I say, B-o-j, and then pronounce his name. When Mr. Bodge comes to understand the subject, we shall think alike.

The whole may be summed up as follows: The number of simple elements of speech in the English language cannot exceed thirty-seven, and I shall be satisfied with thirty-four. There are three intermediate sounds, that are called shaded sounds, which I judge not essential to the meaning of any word, and therefore I do not represent them.

I use thirty-five letters, thirty-four for simple sounds, and i as a diphthongal letter; but even i is not essential. Now, friend Bodge, suppose you and I put a little money together and buy THE TRUTH SEEKER a small font of type of twelve or thirteen letters of the same size as those your letter was printed with, so they will work right in with those letters it has without difficulty, including a little plate containing the alphabet, to be put into a corner of the paper for everybody to see, and then we can illustrate and demonstrate to the eyes of all that wish to know.

Then you could furnish some of your nice poetry, and I some plain and home-made talk or story, and so establish an alphabet that cannot be faulted, if the editor will agree to it. What do you say to it? A. B. PIKARD.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., June 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I was induced to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER on assurance that it is not a strictly partisan organ, but its columns are open to discussion from all sides of every question presented. But I note that the rule is objected to, apparently with some effect, on questions of the most vital and general importance to the human race. Having been a Freethinker from my earliest recollection, I hav become aware that intolerant partisan prejudice is incompatible with Freethought. Moreover, though we think our best thoughts to-day, perchance we shall hav better to-morrow. It were oft a pity if we do not. For we often meet thoughts in books and periodicals that, unless they serve to suggest better, which they sometimes do, should hav been written in the sands upon the sea-shore and obliterated by the incoming tide. Having been a free reader of everything that comes to hand, I hav often noted a wide discrepancy between theories and the logical import of facts. Hence the need of free investigation, Freethought, and free expression.

The modus operandi of creation, and the age of our planet and it populations, are questions of no practical use or importance to anybody, and it is well they are not, for we can get no reliable solution of them. The existence of our planet and its population, and that the general condition of the human race on this planet is anything but satisfactory, appear to be generally well-known and admitted facts that should call for no further comment or explanation. Then what are the possibilities of the future, and how can they best be realized? appear to be the only questions of special importance to the human race that present themselvs for solution. The theologist promises a happy future in a spirit-world or in a physical resurrection on the conditions that we submit, without protest, to the inequities that are practiced upon us, which indicates that Christianity has greatly degenerated since the days of its reputed founder, or a spurious article is imposed upon us. The Spiritualist is more liberal, and promises all a happy future in a spirit-world unconditionally, for which we should be duly grateful if he were duly authorized to make such promis, of which there appears to be a reasonable doubt. The Agnostic promises nothing, for he knows he don't know, and will not venture to guess, but thinks it best to "eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die." By which it appears that the preacher of Ecclesiastics has a few disciples left to keep his lamp trimmed and burning.

It being obvious that neither of the foregoing theories presents a reliable solution of the social problem, I think it advisable to direct attention to known facts and their logical import; for unless we hav an intelligent knowledge of these we shall likely be hoodwinked with impudent flattery and subtle sophistry. Justice can never reign where ignorance and knavery prevail. Hence ignorance, except when hypocritically assumed as a false pretense, should be regarded as a misfortune rather than a crime. It being desirable that everybody should rightly understand the proper purpose and sphere of government, and to protest against any invasion of individual rights, it should be equally desirable that everybody hav a correct understanding of what should constitute individual rights. The law of our being appears to be the only just and reliable standard by which to judge of individual rights. That law distinctly indicates that every individual should hav an equal right to liv, and that right logically involves an equal right to the means of living; hence an equal distribution or ownership of all wealth. For what purpose should government exist at all unless to secure to everyone the means of living? I am aware that governments were evidently organized to secure a monopoly of all wealth to a comparativly few, and hav evidently served that purpose well and no other. Hence the need of reform.

Transportation being but an integral branch or part of a general system of distribution and exchange of products that division of labor has made an absolute public necessity, if there can hardly be any question of the justice and utility of the national government having absolute control of transportation, there should hardly be any question of the justice and utility of the national government having absolute control of the entire system of production and exchange. That would enable us to secure an intelligent distribution of work on the basis of the physical and intellectual ability of the workman, and an equitable distribution of products to all who need them. That being virtually admitted to be a just principle, calling it Socialism will be a virtual admission that Socialism is a just principle, and is denounced simply and solely because it is a just principle. Nevertheless, I shall fail to see how it can possibly be the final goal of human destiny on this planet, but is an indispensable first movement toward that goal. For private ownership of wealth is the only known incentiv to all the violence, fraud, and usurpation that has been committed on this planet for the acquisition of wealth, power, and dominion. Hence it is incontrovertibly the mother of all abominations and the root of all evil, and must be abolished before any reform will be possible; hence, "no remedy is worthy of consideration that does not strike at the very root of the evil." I think Mr. Denslow is making that fact appear clear enough, though it does not appear to hav been his intention to do so. Therefore I am well pleased with your giving liberal space to the advocates of private monopoly of wealth. If it is your purpose to be equally liberal with those who advocate the equal right of every individual to liv, and to the means of living, I shall renew my subscription with pleasure, but not otherwise. J. A. TUTTLE.

CANON CITY, COL., June 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As I seldom see a letter from this place, I will attempt to inform the friends of intellectual liberty who read THE TRUTH SEEKER how Freethought is progressing here. Mr. Jamieson was here the latter part of December, and delivered four good lectures, which roused the people somewhat. The largest audience was about seventy-five, which we considered good for this priest-ridden town. It might be considered extremely good when we take into consideration that there were from one to four churches in this town from twelve to fifteen years before the building of the first school-house.

It will be naturally inferred that there is quite a prejudice in the minds of the Christians of this vicinity against Freethinkers and our Freethought organization. Immediately following this organization, and during the religious excitement of last winter, my brother and sister were suspended from school for persisting in speaking their sentiments, claiming equal rights with our Christian friends, the account of which my sister Orella will giv in the Children's Corner.

The last evening Mr. Jamieson organized a Secular Union, getting only thirteen names. Since then we hav met every other Sunday.

Occasionally others than the members would come in, but very seldom and very few. The Christians are afraid, apparently, in spite of the fact that we are surrounded by churches—seven in a town of three thousand inhabitants.

For the first six or seven weeks of this year, a perfect cyclone of religious excitement swept over here. They brandished their fire and brimstone at everybody, but got no Liberals. There were a very few who were "on the fence," and claimed to get down on the other side, but now don't know which side they are on.

The Methodist Episcopal church, the largest in town, was filled night after night for three weeks with a throng, many of whom were seeking salvation by faith. My sister and I went six or seven evenings. At first we went for mere curiosity, as we had never been to a revival before. We also wanted to hear how the evangelist would abuse and misrepresent Infidels. He is no speaker; he would sing exciting songs, and recite death-bed scenes, and tell how he was saved, and how it rejoiced him that he and his family would all meet in heaven—all calculated to rouse the people's feelings and create excitement.

The first evening we were there, he came to us and said to each, "Sister, are you a Christian?" "No, sir." "Don't you want to be a Christian?" "No, sir." "Oh, sisters, I am afraid God will think you are bantering him and take you at your word and strike you dead!" We said, "We hav no evidence there is such a being." "Do you mean to say the Bible is a lie, and all of your friends liars?" "We do not believe the Bible, but we think most of the Christians believe what they claim to." "Hav you a mother?" "Yes, sir." "Is she living?" "Yes, sir." "Is she a Christian?" "No, sir. She was once, but reason taught her better." "Do you read your Bible?" "Yes, sir; and find it contradicts itself. Therefore we cannot believe it." He said, "I will giv anyone ten dollars who will show me a contradiction." I was on the point of repeating texts to him, but he hadn't time to stop then, but went and talked to some Christian brothers and sisters, whom he told he would stay for another hour if they wished it, and talk to and pray with them. The next evening we handed him a letter containing contradictory texts, also claiming the ten dollars. The third evening, instead of answering or paying, he abused the Infidels, saying they were thieves, liars, and drunkards, and he could see no reason for their claiming unbelief unless for a screen for their meanness.

He claims to hav been a saloon-keeper fifteen years, "but now he is going to glory, thank God!" One evening he told how once, when he was riding on a train going around the foot of a hill at the top of which a cabin stood, several dogs came barking at the train, but one little puppy kept barking and bowwowing and rolling over and over down-hill, but couldn't make the train stop. He said that reminded him of little puppy Infidels who kept barking at the great train, the church, but it, like the other, paid no attention, but kept moving on.

I had the letter and texts, and two other letters, published in the city paper. In one letter I answered the above story as follows: "I admit that the propriety, as a minister of the gospel, of your staking a ten-dollar note on the reputation of the word of God is, to say the least, questionable; but, after having done so and fairly lost, then to sneak like a whipped 'puppy' behind the pulpit, is, in my judgment, even more censurable. The Infidel 'puppy,' according to your comparison, has the courage to bark, but you, after having boasted that one could put a thousand, and two ten thousand, to flight, do not even dare to bark."

The reverend didn't ask us again to become Christians, and I never heard him mention, or heard of his mentioning, Infidels or Infidelity during his stay of two weeks after the publication of my first letter.

Dr. J. L. York has just been here and delivered two good, rousing lectures to houses of about two hundred each. Sunday evening, May 29th, his subject was, "Evolution and Creation; or, How God Made the World." May 31st, his subject was, "Individuality—What It Costs; and the Unburied Dead." Several hav said that he put entirely new ideas into their heads. If so, the doctor deserves great credit. Sunday evening, several young men went forward to inquire of the doctor where they could get books on that subject. Four more names added to our list. One of the most pious brothers was there the last evening, and said he thought the lecture splendid. The doctor thinks he will be back this way in November. We hope so. We also hope to see and hear Mr. Putnam in September.

Mrs. York is accompanying the doctor on his lecture tour to Boston. They stopped with us while here, and were visited by, and visited, several of the Liberal friends, all of whom were very much pleased to make their acquaintance.

If the doctor is not, as represented, "the Ingersoll of the Pacific," they certainly hav some giants over there.

Yours for truth, CARRIE LOOKE.

STONEHAM, MASS., June 20, 1887.

TO MRS. E. D. SLENKER, Dear Sister: I hav read with sorrow and indignation the story of your arrest. I hav also read your letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 18th. It seems to me you hav the right to use whatever terms you see fit in private and under sacred letter seal. Whatever anyone may think of the terms chosen, I cannot see that it is any of their concern. Comstock must be more than prying and impertinent to meddle with private letters. With the fact before us that a sealed envelope has no rights that he is bound to respect, I cannot see that you or I or anyone else should be obliged to pay letter postage. If suppressing vice is interfering with private letters, then there should be other men and methods used. Granted you hav gone too far, in what way does it affect me? The law does not compel me to read your letters or write to you. If it compels the letters to be read in open court when they are not considered fit for the private ear, I think it is time the court was suppressed, or the law or Comstock. We are nearly all of us victims to the law of inheritance and the curse of ignorance. I believe that each one should strive in their own way to understand this, and help others to knowledge. Knowledge of facts, not prayers of faith, is our salvation.

Brother Macdonald's "String of Whens" was simply splendid—a magnificent sermon of ages in less than half a column. I couldn't help thinking of another little when—several of them, in fact, but this special one ran thus: When Mrs. Slenker wrote letters, she was childish enough to suppose she had as much right to private conversation with her pen as with her tongue; that she was surrounded by male protectors who represented (at election times) the dignity and manliness of true government, and that a woman should be interested in all that made the woe or bliss, the health or agony, of the human race. When a few more years pass away, her accusers will bear the same relation to moral history that King George and Benedict Arnold bear to the history of the United States.

Take courage, sister. One with right is a majority. We who suffer for the sins of our ignorant ancestors will help the future to unstained love and an inheritance of health of mind and body. Sympathy is cheap, I know, but it represents the thoughts that shall pave the way to deeds:

> Triumph and toil are twins: and aye
> Joy suns the clouds of sorrow;
> And 'tis the martyrdom to-day
> Brings victory to-morrow.

I almost wish you were a man, and had run away with someone's wife or daughter, or had victimized some sweet young girl, or had grown rich by cheating or living off of the toil of others. The law and Comstock would hav been innocent and ignorant of your deeds. It would be so much easier to be rascally than honest—easier to be vice in silk and broadcloth than virtue in honest calico. Between you and me, I don't wish any such thing. I am glad you are a brave, humanity-loving woman. It will be better for you and the coming generations. C. FANNIE ALLYN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Noisy Fourth.

Once again the Fourth is glorious,
And the youngsters are victorious,
As they shout
Bright and early in the morning,
Thoughts of sleep and breakfast scorning,
They are out,
And the noise
Of the boys,
Busy hosts whom none can number, drives from weary eyes of slumber
Of the morn,
While of rest the yells bereave us, and the early crackers leave us
All forlorn.

Now farewell to peace and quiet!
For the youngsters' licensed riot
Has begun,
And the nervous must be fretting,
From the rising to the setting
Of the sun,
Sturdy men
Tremble then,
While the women, sorely frightened, with their windows closed and tightened,
Stay at home,
Lest the serpents should caress them and the bursting bombs distress them
As they roam.

Men and women, madly rushing,
Panting, squeezing, jamming, pushing,
Pack the trains,
And the steamers, where the madding
Crowd is resolutely adding
To their pains,
Wild and high,
As they fly,
Fiendish yells the youth are rising, and the bonfires still are blazing Everywhere;
Crackers everywhere are popping, and the rocket sticks are dropping
Through the air.

Memory Gems.

From the Works of Thomas Paine. To be learned and recited by The Truth Seeker children.

A right reckoning makes long friends.

It is from our enemies that we often gain excellent maxims.

When man ceases to be, his power and his wants cease with him.

Society is produced by our wants, and governments by our wickedness.

Youth is the seed-time of good habits, as well in nations as individuals.

He who takes nature for his guide is not easily beaten out of his argument.

Men who look upon themselvs born to reign, and others to obey, soon grow insolent.

The nearer any government approaches to a republic, the less business there is for a king.

Immediate necessity makes many things convenient which, if continued, would grow into oppressions.

Man has no property in man; neither has any generation a property in the generations which are to follow.

Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence; the palaces of kings are built on the ruins of the bowers of paradise.

When the tongue or the pen is let loose in a phrenzy of passion, it is the man and not the subject that becomes exhausted.

That which may be thought right and found convenient in one age, may be thought wrong and found inconvenient in another.

Politics and self-interest hav been so uniformly connected that the world, from being so often deceived, has a right to be suspicious of public characters.

Those who hav quitted the world, and those who hav not yet arrived in it, are as remote from each other as the utmost stretch of mortal imagination can conceive.

Ceremony, and even silence, from whatever motivs they may arise, hav a hurtful tendency when they giv the least degree of countenance to base and wicked performances.

Every age and generation must be as free to act for itself, in all cases, as the ages and generations which preceded it. The vanity and presumption of governing beyond the grave is the most ridiculous and insolent of all tyrannies.

A Wonderful Remedy.

Any young folks who are suffering from the same complaint as the little prince in the accompanying anecdote are recommended to try the same medicin. It costs very little, and is sure to effect a cure.

Once on a time there was a king who had a little boy whom he loved very much. So he took a great deal of pains to make him happy.

He gave him beautiful rooms to liv in, and pictures and toys, and books without number. He gave him a graceful, gentle pony, that he might ride when he pleased, and a a rowboat on a lovely lake, and servants to wait upon him wherever he went. He also provided teachers who were to giv him the knowledge of things that would make him good and great.

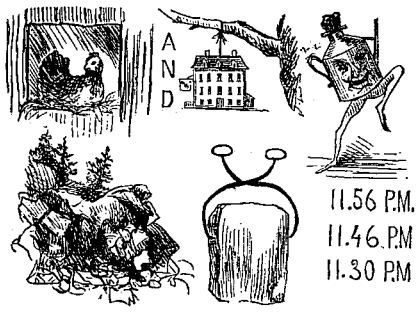
But for all this the young prince was not happy. He wore a frown wherever he went, and was always wishing for something that he did not hav.

At length one day a magician came to the court. He saw the scowl on the boy's face, and said to the king:

"I can make your son happy and turn his frown into smiles. But you must pay me a good price for telling him the secret."

"All right," said the king; "whatever you ask I will giv."

So the price was agreed upon and paid, and then the magician took the boy into a private room. He wrote something with a white substance upon a piece of white paper. Next he gave the boy a candle and told him to light it and hold it under the paper, and then see what he could read. Then he went away.



The boy did as he had been told, and the white letters on the paper turned into a beautiful blue.

They formed these words:

"Do a kindness to some one every day."

Our Puzzle Box.

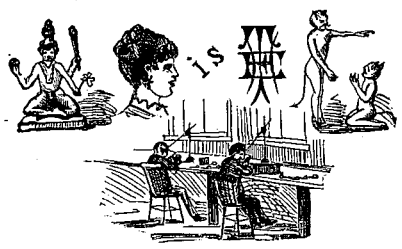
1.—REBUS.



Wanted.

2.—THE BEGGING FRIAR.

A friar of a begging order
Came across my garden border.
No professional alms-taker
Ever got a cent from Baker.
But advice I gave unstinted,
And of several things I hinted:
"Why not work and by your labor,
Earn your living like your neighbor?
Why not mend at once your way, sir,
Answer me! What do you say, sir."
"To name my order is my answer,"
'What is that?" "'Tis ——— ———, sir."
"Then I'll decapitate, curtail you,
For no such cunning shall avail you.
Can I not end it by this plan, sir?
Take this answer, ——— ———, sir!"
Then he tarried not to cavil,
But at once began to travel,
While the dog ran barking after
With a sort of canine laughter.

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN CHILDREN'S CORNER JUNE 18, 1887.

1.–Plum-bag-o. 2.–Catastrophe.

Correspondence.

June 5, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I saw so many boys and girls writing to the Corner, I thought I would write a letter, too. We hav 166 chickens and 12 turkeys. My little sister and I hav a little wagon. I hav a set of little dishes. As this is my first letter, I will close. I am a little girl five years of age.

Your little Freethinker,
SARA ESTHER STICE.

A SPRINGFIELD Sunday-school boy caused a momentary sensation last week because of this speech, which he made as he tendered his usual contribution: "Here's my penny. Father hadn't any, and mother hadn't, and so I took this out of the yeast cup. I was bound to bring one, even if we had to go without yeast."

Two little boys were talking together about a lesson they had been receiving from their grandmother on the subject of Elijah's going to heaven in a chariot of fire. "I say, Charley," said George, "but would you not be afraid to ride on such a chariot?" "Why, no," replied Charley, "I should not be afraid if I knew that the Lord was driving!"

LITTLE four-year-old had heard in Sunday-school, for the first time, of the omnipresence of deity, and, like many an older head, was puzzled. "But, mamma," queried she, wonderingly, "is he everywhere? Is he in this room?" "Yes, my child, God is everywhere, even in this room," answered the mother. The little one's face assumed its company expression as she smilingly said, "Take a seat, God!" She wanted him to feel at home.

A LITERARY gentleman who has just seen "The Story Hour" for the first time writes of it thus: "I was so delighted with it that I read it entirely through, and, amid smiles and tears, became a boy again. The style is just my ideal of what reading, or rather writing, should be for children. There is so much written and printed for the young at the present time that is simply trash and nonsense of a low, silly, and disgusting type that a perusal of 'The Story Hour' is delightfully refreshing, and my interest was increased by the reference to localities with which I was familiar. I hope it will be the happy fortune of tens of thousands of our American youth to read so invaluable a book and thus be refined and elevated by the truthful stories contained therein."

Poetry.

What I Know.

I know the summer's day is sweet,
I know that love is sweeter still,
I know that bliss is ne'er complete,
I know of no perpetual ill.

I know that life has many sides,
That some things here seem hardly meet;
I know that baseness often rides,
While virtue walks with weary feet.

Yet often want and wealth, I know,
But for each other's mask hav stood;
And men, I know, where'er we go,
Are mostly happy when they're good.

I know that life, upon the whole,
Is well worth all we hav to giv;
And that the grander is the goal,
So much the grander 'tis to liv.

I know that death is very nigh,
That evil shrinks before his breath;
That only goodness givs "good-bye"
A rainbow in the cloud of death.

—Wilfred B. Woollam.

Books.

THE CREMATION OF THE DEAD. Considered from an Esthetic, Sanitary, Religious, Historical, Medico-Legal, and Economical Standpoint. By Hugo Erichsen, M.D. With an Introductory Note by Sir T. Spencer Wells, F. R. S. Detroit: D. O. Haynes & Co.

This work is a thorough and convincing argument in favor of cremation. It would seem strange that the disposal of the dead by a method in every way so much superior to burying should require more than to be mentioned in order to be adopted, but the fact is clear enough that there is a great deal of prejudice against it. All possible objections are made, the noisiest one, of course, coming from the church. No reform was ever heard of that did not find enemies in the pulpit. Perhaps the silliest objection offered is that the incineration of the dead would so destroy the mortal frame as to make resurrection of the body impossible on the last day. Lord Shaftesbury has answered this by asking what in that case would become of the early Christian martyrs who perished at the stake, but it is well known that a reply to a religious argument never has the slightest effect upon the maker of the argument; so the resurrection plea is still and will probably continue to be urged as long as it can hav an effect upon the unthinking. The writer of the present work holds that the dissolution of the body is as complete by the process of gradual dissolution as by that of incineration, and that therefore the resurrection will be miraculous in its character any way; and if this is so, the miracle might as well be a good one.

The only objection to cremation worthy of serious treatment is that the incineration of the body destroys all evidence of crime in cases where there is suspicion of poisoning or violence. This is true, but the number of cases is so small and the results of exhumation for forensic purposes are usually so unsatisfactory, that there is not really so much force in the objection as might at first be supposed.

Dr. Erichsen has treated the subject from all the points of view indicated by the title of the book, and while he has devoted more space to the religious aspects than they are worthy of, perhaps he has taken the best course, as an advocate for an unpopular cause, to do away with the prejudice against cremation.

The history of incineration and the illustrations of the different crematory establishments throughout the world, ancient and modern, form interesting and instructiv features of Dr. Erichsen's work, the price of which by mail is $2.

COLUMBUS; or, a Hero of the New World. A Historical Play, by D. S. Preston. New York and London, G. P. Putnam's Sons.

This pathetic poem, which has been highly praised by Lowell and Edwin Booth, tells how the brave explorer proved the falsity of the old Bible view of the flatness of the earth, set up by Spanish priests against his search for truth, and thus made possible our country's greatness, visions of which are brought in to help him disarm the mutineers who would hav turned his vessels back. The magnanimous generosity with which Queen Isabella offers her jewels to equip him for this voyage, and then vindicates his innocence after he has been sent home in chains, is depicted with great dramatic power. Never has the discoverer of America been portrayed more nobly. F. M. H.

"Lucifer Radical Tracts No. 5" is entitled, "Thomas Jefferson," being a lecture by Gen. M. M. Trumbull, of Chicago. It is very good reading indeed. Price 6 cents.

"The Plague and Peril of Monopoly" is a lecture by the veteran reformer, Parker Pillsbury, now published in pamphlet at 15 cents per copy. In it Mr. Pillsbury, with vigorous language, sets forth his views on the dominant subject of labor and capital. Some of his statements are startling, though true, and all his advice is good.

A series of letters on "Humanism versus Theism; or, Solipsism [Egoism]=Atheism," addressed to "C. N.," hav been printed by the London Freethought Publishing Company, 63 Fleet street, E. C. It deals with abstruse questions of sensation and perception, and sells for an English sixpence, which in America is increased to a quarter of a dollar.

The Freethinkers' Magazine for July will be a Fourth of July number. It will contain Colonel Ingersoll's great centennial address entitled, "The Declaration of Independence," also "The Declaration of Independence;" a poem entitled, "Land of Liberty," and an editorial by each of the editors on the same subject, besides very much other interesting matter. The number will be for sale at this office for 25 cents.

"The God of the Bible" is a small but meaty pamphlet on the cruelty, inconsistency, and absurdity of the Jehovah of the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. It was written by a man who, up to an advanced age, had been a believer in the Christian religion, but whose own researches hav made him a pronounced Freethinker. His analysis of the ark story is one of the most thorough we hav seen. Address Geo. K. Donnelly, M.D., 212 North 11th street, St. Joseph, Mo.

Dr. Broughton, the astrologer, is going to issue a pamphlet entitled, "Why I am an Astrologer," the Introductory to which he has already printed as a sort of herald of the forthcoming larger work. The doctor thinks he has reason to believe that the planets hav an influence on the destinies of human beings, and that those who do not agree with him are ignorant of the subject. The Introductory pamphlet contains Professor Proctor's remarks on astrologers in general. Dr. Broughton's address is 66 West Fourth street, New York.

The Esoteric Publishing Company of Boston issues a magazine called the Esoteric, No. 1 of which is at hand. The longest article is entitled, "The Ultimate for Which We are Laboring," being a lecture by Hiram E. Butler. It attempts to put a significance into the Garden of Eden story, the visions of John, and other things which we take no stock in. Still, it advocates a doctrin, or philosophy, that contains a good many of the humanities. Subscription price, $1.50 per annum; samples, 15 cents. Address the Esoteric Publishing Company, 478 Shawmut ave., Boston.

Miss Susan H. Wixon spends the summer months at the seaside resort at the head of Buzzard's bay, on the coast of Massachusetts, called Onset. This is where the Spiritualists hold camp-meetings, but a good many other people go there to enjoy the climate and scenery. Miss Wixon is so well pleased with the locality that she has written a book on "Summer Days at Onset," in which nearly everything connected with that resort is described with a glowing and eloquent pen, and many interesting legends and anecdotes are added. The book leaves the impression that life at Onset is a pleasant dream.

J. D. Shaw, editor of the Independent Pulpit, has found it necessary to print a small pamphlet, "A Myth Exposed," to defend himself against the false charge that he left the Methodist church because the conference did not make him a bishop. Mr. Shaw explains that he quit the church because he had ceased to believe what it taught, and that the episcopacy had nothing whatever to do with it. He has successfully refuted and killed this lie, but religious lies, like those who tell them, generally die in the hope of a glorious resurrection, and no doubt the resurrection of this one will come before the present generation has tasted death. Man cometh forth as a flower, and is cut down; he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not; but the pious falsehood is from everlasting unto everlasting.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. Mottoes for Freethinkers
We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.
For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

THE CREDIT FONCIER OF SINALOA.
Published at Hammonton, N. J. Marie Howland and Eduard Howland, Editors; Jos. Burgher and F. L. Browne, Printers. This paper is devoted specially to the interests of our colonization enterprise, the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa, and generally to the practical solution of the problem of Integral Co-operation. Price, $1 a year; 50 cents for six months. 25 cents for three months.

Practical Experience with Poultry.
By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

A PREACHER and hymn-singer named Dwight was arrested in this city last week while conducting religious services at the Florence street mission. He had embezzled money and spent it on drink and riotous living. Dwight is from Boston.

OTTO, king of Bavaria, has been officially declared to be insane.

THE Rev. Thomas P. Miller, Methodist, of Philadelphia, is under arrest for procuring an abortion.

THE mayor of Cork, Ireland, hoisted a black flag on the queen's jubilee day, and the authorities hav suspended him.

A FIRE in the stock-yards of the Chicago Packing and Provision Company last Sunday caused a loss of $1,250,000, and 600 hogs were burnt.

AN ex-alderman and distinguished citizen of Racine, Wis., has bought $50 worth of fireworks and invited 150 persons to help him celebrate the anniversary of his wife's death. He is supposed to be insane.

THE court having decided that hotels may sell liquor to guests with their meals on Sunday, it is now only necessary in many places in this city to buy a sandwich or a pretzel in order to evade the law. In other places it isn't necessary to buy anything but the drink.

THE Sharp trial has been going on for a fortnight. The evidence so far is considered damaging to the defendant.

FATHER DENT, of Little Valley, N. Y., is under indictment for writing letters charging a brother priest with gross immorality.

THE Rev. John T. Maxwell, Methodist, of Irondale, Ala., on the 22d inst. shot and killed a man whom he accused of having assaulted Mrs. Maxwell.

MISS GRACE HOWARD, daughter of Joseph Howard, Jr., the journalist, has gone to Crow Creek, Dak., with a collection of $2,000 to build a schoolhouse for the Indians.

THE question who shall be Beecher's successor in Plymouth church remains unsettled. The names of Mr. Stowe, his nephew, and of Mr. Scoville, his son-in-law, are mentioned.

JOHN PRYOR, aged 18, is a negro painfully deformed and near-sighted, but he carried off the honors at Grammar School 26, in this city, last week, and received the gold medal of the valedictorian.

THE Fidelity bank of Cincinnati, O., has failed. Appearances indicate that the bank's officers stole all its money. The liabilities reach high into the millions. New York banks lose $700,000 by the failure.

CAPT. JACK HUSSEY, who used to work as 'longshoreman around the New York docks, and who had rescued about forty people from drowning, was shot a few weeks ago by a drunken policeman, and died on the 21st. He was an Irishman and a man of remarkable strength and courage.

THE jury in the case of Cora Lee, on trial at Springfield, Ill., charged with the murder of Sarah Graham, has been discharged, having failed to agree. Cora Lee lived with Graham, a notorious revivalist, as his wife. Graham's legal wife lived with him at the same time, and both women assisted him as evangelists.

A SHORT time ago the Rev. Richard C. Stivers was shot and killed at Grenada, Tenn., by a parishioner named Towler. The cause of the shooting was a mystery until lately it has transpired that Stivers entered the room of Mrs. Towler while she was asleep and alone, and pulled the clothes off her bed. She screamed and he fled. When Towler learned of the fact he sought out the clergyman, who met him with a drawn pistol. In the shooting which followed the Rev. Mr. Stivers was fatally wounded, but before he died he exonerated Towler from all blame.

Gems of Thought.

All gods and religions hav been based upon the great untruth of supernaturalism; all hav been composed largely of the same gross falsehoods, and hav been inimical to the human race; all hav fallen short in affording to man the truths he needed; all produced darkness instead of light; all proved an incubus instead of an aid; all augmented the evils of ignorance instead of increasing knowledge.—D. M. Bennett.

PERSONAL relations constitute the prior conditions and the very matter itself of morality, and in their absence it has no room to be. An absolutely solitary individual, if invested with power of various action and disposition, might affect himself for better or worse by what he did, but would be subject to no obligation and incur no guilt. The harm he occasioned would be a blunder, and not a sin. The good which he earned would prove his wisdom, not his virtue.—Dr. James Martineau.

"LET me send for a clergyman," said Hermione to her dying husband. His calm face looked into hers steadily, but with inexpressible tenderness. "Belief in the creed founded on a lie and maintained by craft and cruelty? Where the fiction of a god-man, because of God's love for the earth, is made the weapon which destroys human happiness and love. No! I am what I hav been, dear wife, an Agnostic—knowing nothing, and refusing to affirm what I cannot prove." "But when we die, Richard!" "We go into the light of knowledge or into the darkness of annihilation," he answered calmly. "It must be one or the other, and the laws of the universe will not be altered because one man believes in immortality and another is content with doubt."—Under Which Lord? by Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

ABRAHAM BRINGETH HOME A NEW WIFE.

Then again Abraham took a wife, and her name was Keturah —Gen. xxv, 1.

Odds and Ends.

WOMAN may be a puzzle, but man is not willing to giv her up.

NEW YORK'S Sunday relations with water nowa days are not as strained as they were.

SOME of the profits made by Jay Gould last year are quite ahead of anything mentioned in sacred history.

IT is said that a department is to be established in the public schools in New Jersey which will be devoted to teaching the young idea of that foreign country not to blow out the gas.

PORTLAND, Me., has a bank cashier who has been in one bank fifty-three straight years. People who ask why he hasn't made a grab and run away are informed that the money in that bank is counted every night.

"PA," said little Jimmie, "I was very near going to the head of my class to-day." "How is that my son?" "Why, a big word came all the way down to me, and if I only could hav spelled it I should hav gone clear up."

"DID you see my picture in the paper, to-day dear?" inquired a young merchant who had just been made a town-councillor. "Yes, I did—and—and"— Here his wife burst into tears. "Why, what's the matter? Why does it make you cry?" "Why, Jack, I'm so disappointed. If I had known you looked like that I'd never hav married you."

"GAZE upon that pure, beautiful evening star, and swear to be true while its light shall shine! Swear, my love! Swear by Venus!" exclaimed a youth in impassioned accents. "How stupid you are!" answered the Girton girl. "That is not Venus. The right ascension of Venus this month is 15h. 9m.; her declination is 17 degrees, 25 minutes South, and her diameter is 10.2."

HOW SHE MIGHT PRAY.

A California woman who had $30,000 up as margins on stocks went to her pastor and asked:

"Do you think it would be wrong for me to pray for stocks to go up?"

"Certainly I do," was his reply.

"Well, what shall I do?"

"You might pray that they shouldn't go down, ma'am."

DURING the course of a sermon in a Dakota town last Sunday a harsh creaking was heard to proceed from under the church. After some time a movement was felt in the building and several members of the congregation started out, fearing that an earthquake was coming. "Friends," said the minister, as he stopped his sermon and leaned over the pulpit, "pray be seated; there is no danger." "But the church is moving and there's something wrong," replied a lady who was very much agitated. "Oh, that's all right, Sister Brown. You see, there are some workmen under the building with jack-screws, and now they hav hitched onto the back end with ten yoke of oxen and are snaking the edifice over onto a back street. In the morning, God willing, work will commence on this lot on the finest opera house west of Chicago. I tell you, the boom in this town is only just nicely started."

A PROVIDENTIAL CORPORATION.

South-Sea Islander: "So you came out here to save me?"

Missionary: "Yes."

South-Sea Islander: "And if you had not come I could not hav been saved?"

Missionary: "No."

South-Sea Islander: "What a lucky thing it was for me that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company was organized."

A TEACHER was endeavoring to find out the proficiency of her little friends in mental arithmetic, and took the following method of ascertaining what she desired to know: "Now, children," she said, "suppose I hav two squash pies, and divide one of them in ten pieces and the other into 100 pieces, which would you rather hav, a piece of the pie that was divided into ten pieces or of that cut into 100 pieces?" There was an absolute hush for a moment, and then a little girl answered timidly: "One of the 100 pieces!" "Why so?" "Well, please, ma'am, I don't like squash pie."

AT a Friday evening prayer-meeting in a fashionable uptown church recently the brethren observed that a stranger was among them. He was a tall, lank, sorrowful looking man with large feet and a three days' growth of beard. After the opening exercises the pastor requested any who might feel so disposed to rise and state their experiences for the benefit of their fellow-sinners. The stranger immediately sprang to his feet and began as follows: "I feel that it is good to be here to-night." ("Amen," from several of the brethren.) "As I look around me I find it difficult to analyze the emotions with which I am filled. You are all strangers to me, yet I feel as though I had known you for years. I am surrounded by an atmosphere of congeniality. I believe that I may speak freely and frankly, and that I need hav no hesitation in saying to you all that I long to say." ("Go on—go on!" from an enthusiastic deacon.) "Thank you, brother, I will go on. I am introducing a work in this neighborhood which is certain to find a ready sale as soon as its merits are understood—a work which every one of the intelligent men and women to whom I am speaking to-night ought to possess. Its price is nominal, being but twenty-five cents per copy, and it will be completed in fifty parts. The work to which I refer, my dear brethren and sisters, is——" There was a brief intermission, during which the stranger made a hasty and somewhat ungraceful exit, assisted by the janitor. Then a hymn was sung, and the assembled throng soon forgot the sad-eyed man, who stood outside gazing pensivly at the silent stars and murmuring: "It was a daisy scheme, and blame me if I can see why it didn't work."

A SONG.

Fold white arms about me,
Cling, sweet lips, to mine;
Sweetest sweet, without thee,
I but waste and pine.

Lean, dear face, above me,
Soft hands, hold mine close;
Let me look and love thee,
Oh, my very Rose!

Comfort me with kisses
That your soul comes through;
Let the old dead blisses
Breathe and burn anew.

O my sweet one, sweetest!
Love of loves supreme!
This has been the fleetest,
Dearest, maddest dream.

—Philip Bourke Marsten.

THE choice lay before me between dereliction of a supreme duty and loss of eyesight. In such a case I could not listen to the physician, not if Æsculapius himself had spoken from his sanctuary; I could not but obey that inward monitor, I know not what, that spoke to me from heaven. I considered with myself that many had purchased less good with worse ill, as they who gave their lives to reap only glory, and I thereupon concluded to employ the little remaining eyesight I was to enjoy in doing this, the greatest service to the common weal it was in my power to render.—Milton.

Is it, O man, with such discordant noises,
With such accursed noises as these
Thou drownest nature's sweet and kindly voices,
And jarrest the celestial harmonies?

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals or forts.

The warrior's name would be a name abhorred,
And every nation that should lift again
Its hand against a brother, on its forehead
Would wear forever the curse of Cain.

—Longfellow's Arsenal at Springfield.

THOSE hymns which are most immortal in the hymn-books are often those which the churches borrowed from poets whom they left outside. Who wrote "While thee I seek, protecting power"—that perfect utterance of the last triumph of religious trust? Helen Maria Williams, the friend and imitator of Mary Wollstoncraft. You will still find her branded as a heretic in the biographical dictionaries. Who wrote "Nearer, my God, to thee?" It was Sarah Flower Adams, the friend and disciple of W. J. Fox. In her lifetime she would hav been disowned by the very churches which now cannot draw near to God without borrowing her wings to fly with.—T. W. Higginson.

JESUS had defects and imperfections like all other men, and it is but simple justice to him and all other men that these defects should be dispassionately pointed out so that mankind may know the truth and be free—free from the thraldom of ancient superstition, free from the absurd idea that Jesus was a perfect man. He was a simple Jewish enthusiast and religious reformer foolishly supposing himself the Messiah, thereby coming to an untimely death.—W. E. Coleman.

"Religion! but for thee, prolific fiend, who peoplest earth with demons, hell with men, and heaven with slaves!—Shelley.

Notes and Clippings.

On the queen's jubilee day Mayor Hewitt caused the American flag to be hoisted on the City Hall, and spoke at a meeting in honor of Victoria. He has also vetoed the aldermanic ordinance permitting fireworks on the Fourth. For these acts he is accused of a lack of patriotism.

The Chinese census of 1875 gave the population of the empire at 435,000,000. Among no people with any degree of civilization is the birth-rate so high as in China, and, although the death-rate in the densely crowded districts is very great, there is every reason to presume, says the San Francisco Chronicle, that there are now 450,000,000 people in China. These figures represent more than one-third of the population of the globe. It is a greater population than that of all Europe, and three times the number of people on the Western continent.

W. H. Burr writes to the New York Sun concerning the Episcopalians and the Fourth of July: "After the inauguration of Jefferson there was a revival of the celebration of the Fourth of July. For some years the anniversary had not been observed in Philadelphia, and in 1790 the feelings of patriotic Americans were outraged by the ringing of the bell of the Episcopal church on the fourth of June in honor of the birthday of George III. But in 1801 there was a grand celebration of the Fourth of July by the Republicans. And though the charter of the aforesaid Episcopal church required its incorporators to furnish a round of bells from sunrise to sunset on the national anniversary, no sound was heard from its steeple until twelve o'clock, when an order came from the governor to ring that bell."

It is said that a great proportion of the wine drunk by Americans is manufactured from cider, mixed with acids and coloring materials; while much of the wine made from grapes is sent to Europe and brought back as imported wine, decorated with fancy labels and sold at fancy prices.

Lo Bengula, king of a South African tribe, does not accept unqualifiedly the doctrins of Christianity. A correspondent relates that one day a missionary was preaching to a large crowd, among whom the king was an attentiv listener. The white man remarked that all men were alike in the sight of God, who would listen as readily to the petition of the humblest man as to that of the greatest king. "That's a lie!" shouted the king at the top of his voice. Everything the king says is echoed by his loyal subjects, so everybody shouted, "That's a lie!" The missionary found it necessary to change the subject of his discourse.

The absurd extremes to which aristocratic ideas often go in Europe are well illustrated in the case of Princess Henrietta, of Schleswig-Holstein, etc. She married Professor Esmark, one of Germany's greatest surgeons, and was henceforth snubbed and avoided by her family. And now the services of Esmark are wanted in regard to the illness of the crown prince, and the haughty family of the Princess Henrietta hav changed their demeanor, and hav begun to show a marked cordiality toward the wife of the great scientist. The physical condition of the aristocracy of Europe is such that the haughty descendants of blood as impure as it is blue cannot afford to snub the medical profession. Modern science wields a scepter before which the heads of kings must bow.—World.

Following is the constitutional amendment to be voted on in Texas in August: "The manufacture, sale, and exchange of intoxicating liquors, except for medical, mechanical, sacramental, and scientific purposes, is hereby prohibited in the state of Texas. The legislature shall at the first session held after the adoption of this amendment, enact necessary laws to put this provision into effect." The adoption of this amendment will, no doubt, lead to an unprecedented demand for alcoholic liquors for other use than as a beverage, and the words medical, mechanical, sacramental, and scientific are liable to somewhat strained definitions.

It would be a curious piece of history that would record the manner of raising the vast sum of money involved in church-building. Yesterday we were in the court room one hour and thirty minutes and in that time two beggars, one for a church at Hollis and another for the Home of the Friendless at Leavenworth, importuned the county officers. The latter was a lady and they, of course, came down gracefully, but the former was a red-faced, licentious-looking individual, and some of the officials wouldn't consent to being bled, and one of those was told in our presence and hearing that, "he might want some political support from his section some time, which he would not get if he did not giv to the church fund." We hav often been told by officials drawing good salaries that they are bled, and bled, and bled by those beggars, and that it takes a considerable portion of their salaries to appease them. We heard one officer name over $150 that he had given to these beggars in the last year.—Kansas Blade.

Dr. McGlynn has finally said publicly that he will not go to Rome. "In the good old days of Galileo," he says, "they could take a layman to Rome in chains for what they think I am guilty of. The Roman authorities will ultimately learn by bitter experience their own spiritual business at home and to interfere less with politics in Ireland, America, and other countries. Few know, as I do, the merciless and obstinate consistency of the Roman ecclesiastical machine in sticking to errors of policy and politics when they are in the interest and ambition of temporal power. I am not so foolish or presumptuous as to suppose that arguments can diminish the stupidity, enlighten the gross ignorance, or bend the obstinacy of that relentless machine. The Roman machine is anxious to hav an accredited embassador at Washington, who would be in the Italian ring, and his presence would be a fruitful source of corruption and enslavement to the Catholic church of this country. The policy of the church now is to toady to the proud and wealthy, and kick the lowly in the mouth. At Rome they are laughing in their sleeves to us for our excessiv submissivness to their power and for our excessiv generosity in contributing the Peter's pence to the support of the whole army of lackeys and flunkies, both lay and clerical, who surround the pope with a barbaric pomp scarcely equaled by that of any imperial despotic court."

Tales Told Out of School.

THE REMEDY FOR THIS WIDESPREAD DEFECTION.

PHILADELPHIA, 13th of Sixth Month, 1887.

FRIEND MACDONALD: I send thee another and the last instalment of Dr. Jones's report, for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Debby bids me giv thy workmen a word of praise for the accuracy with which they hav printed the parts already published. When she undertook the big job of transcribing the document she felt in honor bound to hav it printed as it was written, so that no injustice would be done to the author. She thinks that when Friend Jones reads over the report in print, and remembers how hard it must hav been for her to decipher his chirography, and make a fair copy for the printer, he will be pleased with the performance of her part of the work, although she strongly suspects that he will grate his teeth a little at the way you hav told tales out of school.

Respectfully thy friend and the friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, AMOS TOWNSEND.

After giving you a bird's-eye view of the real situation of things as it appears to me, I approach the most important part of my report, to wit: The means we must resort to in order to restore to the church her former prestige and power, only remnants of which are now visible. History teaches us that in the fifth century of the Christian era, while the church had converted the mass of pagans to Christianity, paganism had converted Christianity by introducing into its belief and practice pagan doctrins and modes of worship, though under Christian names and with Christian permission. Shall we make such a compromise as this with Infidelity, and attempt the impossible feat of mingling oil and fire with water? or shall we fall back in our contention to the ground our fathers occupied in the day of their glorious achievements—the gospel of Jesus Christ, the whole gospel, and nothing but the gospel? Shall we listen or shall we turn a deaf ear to the sirens who would lure our ship upon the rocks and wreck the hopes of the world by mixing up with the sincere milk of the word these poisonous adulterations of science, falsely so called, that please the taste of the people, but essentially damage their souls? In our warfare with Infidelity, what agencies hav we? In the first place, we hav Moody and Sankey, both of them extremely illiterate men and of no education either in literature or theology; Joseph Cook, setting himself up as a scientific expounder of religion to the common run of New England preachers, who retail in their sermons what he givs them in his weekly lectures, but pronounced by German scholars to be a conceited bungler in handling the very tools he is ambitious to use; Sam Jones and Sam Small, and the class of preachers who ape their methods in the pulpit; a lot of shrieking women-preachers and a large handful of women reformers, so called, who, being debarred from the pulpit by most self-respecting denominations, are determined to make themselvs heard as public teachers on the platforms of voluntary associations. As respectfully as they can, all these push aside the regular ministry and make the impression upon the public mind that the clergy hav become more or less useless in the plan of salvation, and should go into innocuous desuetude or otium cum dignitate. The tribe of revivalists, of which those above mentioned are the most conspicuous, hav met with great success in saving souls, according to their own showing. But as a merchant cannot tell whether he is making money, or is even solvent or not, till he takes an account of stock and compares his income with his outgo, so, in contemplating these emotional religious effervescences, we must estimate their value by looking at the general, and not the particular, local results. There is a striking resemblance between the cause of the church and that of the Prohibitionists. Thousands of money are constantly used to get up meetings, to publish papers, and to send out lecturers for advancing the cause of total abstinence, and it looks to some sanguin and superficial observers as if the whole nation was about to be converted to the Prohibition policy. But when we examin the official documents of the states and general government, we find that, with all this outlay of money and moral effort, there is more liquor made and consumed every year than there was the year before; so that while we see bright spots here and there on the map of the country indicating local progress, all the rest is dark and drunken, proving that the Prohibitionists, as practical reformers, with all their honest zeal, are not on the right track, and therefore must inevitably fail to accomplish their benevolent purposes.

It is precisely so with the revivalists. To hear their boastings the gullible would suppose that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, and that Satan's kingdom was tottering to its fall. It reminds me of the excitement produced all over this country by the labors of the missionary Gützlaff in China, who made us believe that the hundreds of millions of the Chinese empire would be soon converted to God. But the zeal of the missionary soon cooled when he saw what uphill work it was to convert a Chinaman, and after having mastered the language he accepted the post of interpreter on board of an English opium ship at a large salary, and devoted his abilities to the ruination of the Chinamen's bodies, since he made such slow work at saving their souls. The agents and secretaries whose functions are to collect and disburse funds, point to the immense amount of money raised every year for church extension purposes, and if the religious income from this vast expenditure at all corresponded with the outlay, there would be ground for rejoicing. But that such is not the case we hav only to look at the statistics, which, it has been charged by the secular press, hav been "doctored," as they call it, by the officers who make their living by handling the money. The church, in all its denominations except the Catholics, so far from making an advance corresponding with the population, is, and has been for years, losing ground. The Catholics themselvs admit that of the foreign immigration thousands of their faith who leave Europe never report themselvs to the church in this country, but are lost in our population. The fact is so glaring and so pregnant with results that the priesthood compel the people to erect church schools so as to segregate the Catholic children and avoid a ruinous contact with American children in school and on the street. There is lamentation all over the land among Protestants that the number of pious and educated young men who enter the ministry of the gospel as a vocation, and are qualified by talents for the positions they seek, is by no means in proportion to our needs. Hundreds of churches in our own denomination are vacant, while crowds of unemployed ministers are going about in search of settlements but not finding them. When the settled pastor of a wealthy church dies it would be amusing, if it were not so bad a sign, to see the numbers who offer themselvs on trial as candidates for the vacant pulpit, and how many are turned away as having no qualifications for the place.

All these things are signboards pointing unerringly to the anomalous fact that with all the amazing wealth of the church, and the generosity of her members in contributing to propagandist enterprises of all kinds, she reaps no such rich harvest of souls as we might expect from such sowing. Our home missionaries in the West, numerous as they are, and very expensiv, seem to make little impression on the public mind. The Infidels, although unorganized, and in advancing their cause not spending one dollar to a hundred thousand of church expenditure, giv infinit trouble to the missionaries and pastors, who complain that Infidelity springs up all around them like mush rooms after a wet night. The very atmosphere itself seems laden with its miasmatic influence. I heard in New York, from a Western brother, of the case of a very intelligent and excellent young man of family who was an elder of the church in the East, but who, after migrating to the West, became a thorough Infidel. The seeds had been sown in his heart in the East by his having unfortunately read several of Ingersoll's lectures, and his environments changing by his coming to the West, he and his family all conformed thereto, and were thus lost to the church. The term Infidel, which was one of reproach in the East, had lost its stigma in the West, and when applied to a man there seemed rather to indicate that he had both brains and gumption, and was honorable and successful in his business relations. The public sentiment of the West having changed from that of the East, and the fact that a man does not lose caste in society by repudiating the church and her religion, seem to act upon the seeds of Infidelity, which lie latent in the rank soil of the human heart, pretty much as a warm rain in June does on a newly-planted field of corn.

Now, in our conflict with such causes and their effects, what we want is to restore to its place in the hearts of the people the old respect which our fathers had for the ordained ministry of the church, as the embassadors of Jesus Christ, whose function in the plan of salvation is to convince and convert sinners by the regular appointed means of grace, and then by suitable instruction to build them up as living stones in the temple of God. Moody and Sankey and Cook are not ministers of the gospel. They are self-appointed, unauthorized, and irresponsible evangelists, and the very fact of their existence in the church is the bitterest reflection on the Christian ministry as God's appointed agency from bringing a lost world to Christ. It is as much as to say that our savior, in establishing the church as an organization, and in appointing the ministry of reconciliation and the means of grace to be the convicting and converting power, made a grand mistake, which the revivalists hav discovered in this advanced age of the world, and propose in their superior wisdom to correct. The New Testament makes it as clear as the noonday sun that women should avoid all unnecessary publicity, be keepers at home, their feet abiding in their own houses; that they should not open their mouths, but only their ears, in the sanctuary of God, keeping quiet all the time, and getting their husbands at home to giv them any information they need, and to resolve any doubts that may hav arisen in their minds by the preaching; that they should be modestly appareled at all times, and especially during their attendance at church on the Sabbath, diffident and unpretentious, constantly remembering the solemn truth that it was woman who, by fatally tempting Adam in the Garden of Eden to eat the forbidden fruit, brought death and all our woes into the world. But, as if Paul had never written his epistles, or never was inspired by the Holy Ghost to do so, these women preachers and evangelists, with their brazen faces and their squeaking voices, enter the pulpit, and, when not permitted to do so, crowd on the platform, appear before legislativ bodies, state and national, and undertake to do the work which they are expressly forbidden and utterly incapacitated to do. The scriptures teach us that the pains of parturition were appointed by God as a curse, and as a standing memorial through all ages of his anger at woman for having seduced Adam from his allegiance, and introduced sin and its consequent misery into a world that else might hav remained forever a paradise of joy and contentment. This curse was not only intended to be a constant reminder to her of her guilt in that great transaction in Eden, but to keep her in a modest and submissiv frame of mind at home and abroad, as becoming women professing godliness. But some of them hav gone so far as to publish essays and books, one of which I saw in New York, entitled, "Parturition without Pain," which professes to lift the God-appointed curse from the mothers of children, thus giving the lie direct to the divine teaching, and bidding defiance to the divine arrangement. Such books, I am told, are found everywhere, even among the most intelligent women, and all the zeal of the medical profession cannot drive them out of circulation!

The same criticism I hav made on revivalism I must offer on the YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS.

They are voluntary, unauthorized organizations, utterly unknown to primitiv Christianity, running without being sent, virtually setting aside the regular ministry, and consigning them to the position of foot-boys to the chariot of salvation, and undertaking the work of saving souls and building up Christians in their most holy faith by the patented methods of billiard rooms, athletics, and other games, which were never practiced formerly in this dying world except in taverns and other places of sinful amusement. What would the fathers of the church hav thought seventy years ago if a body of illiterate young men, puffed up with zeal and spiritual pride, would nullify their vocation, retire them from the pulpit, and take upon themselvs, without the least semblance of authority, the work which was delegated expressly and exclusivly to them as embassadors of Christ, and to which their lives and learning were devoted? I must express to you my honest convictions, come to after a great deal of observation and reflection, that they are hindrances, instead of helps, to the gospel. They are a compromise between the world and religion, and like all compromises in which Christ and Satan are parties, in the end Satan is the gainer and Christ the loser. Can we wonder that the blight and mildew of a universal Infidelity has settled upon society, permeated the literature which is forming the intellectual character of our youth, and that it has scared the timorous clergy away from their function of preaching the doctrins of the cross, when the church herself has lost faith in the wisdom of her great head, and the institutions appointed by him, and allows callow young men, clerks in stores and shops, and upstart, self-appointed evangelists, to do the work of an ordained ministry? To me the progress of Infidelity in this age, when the armory of the church is full of weapons able to destroy it if only wielded aright, is explicable only on the theory that since the church herself has put dishonor on the appointed means of grace, God in anger has given her up, for the time being at least, to suffer from her own treasonable and cowardly devices.

with a prophet's ken, in his great work entitled, "Footprints of the Creator," written nearly forty years ago, foresaw the present times clearly, sounded the alarm, and warned the churches of Christendom of what was coming, and how to meet the emergency. Before quoting his words, we must bear in mind that at the time he lived the Development hypothesis, which he regarded as Antichrist, lay couched like a tiger's cub in the beautiful and captivating language of the "Vestiges of Creation," the reading of which, I well remember, was confined to but a few, even among what we call the cultivated classes. But the keen-sighted Scotchman, with a mind illuminated by the Holy Ghost, saw the animal, knew its natural instinct, that it was thoroughly, and only, antagonistic to Christianity, and aimed a death-blow at it in its cub state. What would he think, and how would he feel, now, if he were among us, when that hypothesis has been hammered out into a system by Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, and others; and when the books of these authors, simplified, to suit the capacities of youth, are in the public libraries, and on the very center-tables of the members of the church; and the full-grown tiger slinking around among the printing-offices, the colleges, and even the pulpits of the country? Darwin, until the last year or two of his life, never was suspected of being an Infidel and Atheist. Like so many other scientists and philosophers, he simply ignored the whole subject of religion. But for more than a quarter of a century, without seeming to know it, he was constantly engaged in undermining the foundations of the church; and when he died the clergy sang him to his rest in Westminster Abbey, as if he had been a Christian! Does not this look like judicial blindness inflicted by an angry God?

Hugh Miller says: "The danger from the Development hypothesis to an ingenious order of minds has been underestimated. . . . . The antagonistic points in the array of the opposit lines are simply the law of development versus the miracle of creation. . . . The clergy as a class suffer themselvs to linger far in the rear of an intelligent and accomplished laity—a full age behind the requirements of the time. Let them not shut their eyes to the danger which is coming. The battle of the Evidences will hav as certainly to be fought on the field of physical science, as it was contested in the last age on that of the metaphysics. And on this new arena the combatants will hav to employ new weapons, which it will be the privilege of the challenger to choose. The evangelistic churches cannot slight or overlook a form of error at once exceedingly plausible and consummately dangerous, and which is telling so widely on society that one can scarce travel by railway, or on a steamboat, or encounter a group of intelligent mechanics, without finding decided trace of its ravages." Thus spoke Hugh Miller nearly forty years ago.

But notwithstanding this warning, our theological seminaries continue to send out every year to preach the gospel, at such a time as this, young men who are ignorant of the very rudiments of the controversy now raging. One of them makes some rash speech in the pulpit, betraying his ignorance, and the next day some college sophomore, or high school student, calls him to account, and shows him that he knows little, and that little inaccurately, about the subject on which he spoke so dogmatically. No one can doubt Hugh Miller's orthodoxy and high Christian character. He made the science of geology a handmaid to religion. And yet, our theological professors, cloistered in their seminaries, holding converse with the past, instead of the present, and ignorant altogether of the world they liv in, go on, year after year, unaware of the fact that the old arguments in behalf of Christianity amount to nothing now, when the common mind, sharpened by education, and stimulated by what is called the scientific spirit, hav made all men feel that doubt, instead of the fear of God, is the beginning of all wisdom. If our pulpits were now filled by such men as Chalmers, John Pye Smith, and others like them, would the youth of our churches, with the mark of baptism and parental consecration on their foreheads, leave the house of God on the Sabbath, and flock in troops to hear Ingersoll? I trow not.

I know, my dear brethren, that the views expressed in this report would be disliked by many of our people who lay the flattering unction to their souls that the church is in no danger, being founded on the rock, Christ, and delivered from all fear by the unconditional promis that "the gates of hell shall not prevail against her." But this does not warrant supineness and compromise. See what a sheer simulacrum the Protestant church has become in the land of Luther! Look at Massachusetts, the land planted and consecrated by the Puritans of the Mayflower, flanked on the one side by the Catholics and on the other by the Unitarians, who are as near to Infidelity as zero is to nothing! Look at Andover, and the Congregationalists of New England, who hav the face to denounce the Unitarians as a robber sect, stealing the funds of Harvard devoted to Christo et ecclesiæ, and prostituting them to the advancement of a baptized Infidelity; while they themselvs are going over, with bag and baggage, to the babyish heresy of a second probation! The descendants of the Puritan fathers, now on the stage, are not as sagacious, clear-sighted, and loyal to God as Balaam's ass was; for when the prophet traitorously went off with the princes of Moab to curse the chosen people, the ass saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and refused to go forward. But from present signs the rank and file of the New England Congregationalists hav lost their eyesight, and cannot see the inconsistency of the reverend Balaams of Andover consorting and agreeing with the messengers of Balak, king of Moab. The age of miracles is past, and asses no longer see the angel of the Lord standing in the way of a prophet's defection. The promis of Christ that the gates of hell should not prevail against the church, went upon the presumption that the ministers of Christ would be loyal to their chief, and listen to no proposals of compromise with the devil. But if treason takes possession of the hearts of the ministry, and the enemy can furnish motiv enough to surrender, I see no reason why the cause of the church should not be lost, as the cause of political freedom has often been.

Pioneering.

FRIENDS: I wonder if you realize what it means to be a pioneer—to push into prominence and respectability an unwelcome cause. All reforms begin by crowding themselvs in where they are undesired, and their representativs are usually maligned and anathematized.

As an Abolitionist in antislavery times, as a believer in the Washingtonian movement for temperance in the long ago, and as a worker for equality of sex, I hav always been in the fore front of the battle. So also was I the first woman Atheist I ever saw, and the first anyone ever saw in any place where I hav ever lived.

We had not been settled here very long when a little boy was reproached for doing me a favor, and was told that I did not believe in a God. "Yes, she does," said the little fellow with strong emphasis, "she believes in two gods." And all along through life I hav thus needed and found apologists and defenders. Needed them because I was a pioneer in radical reforms, working among the pious conservativs; found them because I made truth, right, and good conduct my motto.

When we came here some fifteen years ago the people of Pulaski denied there was a real Atheist in the world. When it was noised around that there were two of them in their midst, curiosity was rife. Those who became acquainted with us were asked the most ridiculous questions imaginable, such as how we looked, what we ate, how we conversed among ourselvs, and once, when I furnished a debater with some arguments in favor of alcoholic temperance, the public was astounded at learning that an Infidel could believe in any good thing. We were invited to visit a friend twelve miles from here, and this friend was asked by his neighbors to notify them of the time of our arrival, as they were all eager to see "the awful Infidels." All this we lived down and conquered, and for many years I hav been president of the Woman's Reading Club, though it had three preacher's wives as members. When it became know I was selling "Diana" a rumpus was kicked up, but I convinced them that the main "fault" of the book was it required men and women to be more temperate sexually than they felt it possible or desirable for them to be. It asked them to practice on earth the virtues they expected to liv out in heaven.

Then came another fuss because I sold "Leaves of Grass," but by promising not to lend it hereabouts I got out of that, and yet, if the book was laid on the desk and counter of every public place in town, not half a dozen people would read half a dozen pages of it, because it is above the taste of the average reader.

Then came the arrest for obscenity. That was the last feather, the unpardonable sin, the gulf that could not be passed, and I was shut out from the club I had been one of the foremost in organizing and sustaining. Still, had the members given free vote, I should probably hav retained my place. But church and creed were too much for them, and so they remained on the conservativ side. At first, after my return home from jail, only a stray neighbor or so ventured to call on me, and these seemed to feel as if they were braving public opinion. But one by one they hav dropped into the ruts again, till nearly all the old habituates are seemingly as cordial and friendly as before. Terrible things are said of me by gossiping tongues, and believed by those who are not well acquainted personally.

In spite of the seriousness of the situation, I hav to smile at some of the charges made against me, one of which is that I hav ruined the health of all the married women here by giving them medicin to produce abortions, while the fact is, I've given the strongest kind of testimony against this very thing, because it is injurious to the health of the mother, and if unsuccessful may injure the child mentally and physically; and then, too, the very women they point out as being so injured were fully as feeble before I came here as they are now, and some more so. I merely tell all this as showing just a few of the thorns in the pathway of a pioneer.

There is a bright side to it all. It is grand to conquer prejudice and prove one's good words by good deeds, and win grace and glory, despite old opinions inherited and rooted deeply in the mind. It is enthusing and encouraging to meet with the support of press and people to such an extent as I hav done, and under so terrible a charge as has been launched at me. I hav received over seven hundred letters from everywhere. Even across the "big pond" come words of cheer and approbation, sympathy and help.

I only wish I were better able to respond to them all in "thoughts that breathe and words that burn," and giv back ringing sentiments that should sow seed for the centuries.

How often I think of Bennett's remark during his time of trial, that he had "so many of the very best friends in the world, and some of the very meanest enemies," for I, too, hav a multitude of splendid friends, and a few bitter and venomous enemies. No radical writer who has pronounced opinions and a fair share of popularity can hope to escape making enemies. It's an old, old adage that says, "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you." So we must be grateful even to our enemies, as they do show us some faults that our friends are either blind to or fail to inform us of.

The more my case is studied up, the more you will see it is but history repeating itself, only with the added accumulations of the intervening time.

Bennett saw the animus of the Comstock law as soon as it was enacted, and was one of the first to sound the warning cry against it, and also one of the first to suffer persecution under it.

In 1877 a spy was sent to his office to see if something unmailable could not be found. Two or three little pamphlets were taken, but though he was arrested, nothing was deemed strong enough to make out a case against him. At Watkin's Glen, in 1878, he was again arrested for selling "Cupid's Yokes," and then and there he got so indignant at the spirit of persecution which thus invaded personal rights, that he declared he would publish in his TRUTH SEEKER a notice that he would "sell that pamphlet in the regular course of his business if it cost him his life." He did sell it, and was decoyed, just as I was, into sending directly to an agent of the vice society just what he wanted. He was tried, condemned, and sentenced. Bravely he served out his term, making friends every day, doing good work every day, and crippling the enemy every day. It was for selling a book teaching sexology that he was imprisoned, and yet had he had a fair trial, and a just judge, he would hav escaped conviction. Judge Benedict will be remembered in history as "the unjust judge," than which no greater stigma can be fastened upon one who holds so impartial an office.

Heywood was afterward indicted for the same offense, but with a fair trial and an honest judge he was acquitted.

A few days more, and I, too, may be judged—I hope by no Benedict biased by prejudice and preconceived opinions. I hav, like Bennett and Heywood, helped in a small way to pioneer the work of sexual reform, which it is hoped will some day culminate in giving to the world a science of sexual physiology, than which no book is more needed, or would be more conduciv to a true and pure morality.

June 26, 287. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Indignant.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Since Mrs. Slenker's arrest, I hav made it my business to present her case to my friends, and to try to interest them in her, and so obtain for her moral and financial support in this her hour of persecution and prosecution. And I wish to say through your paper that the spirit evinced in some of the editorials in publications supposed to be Liberal upon the case of Elmina is more discouraging than all the opposition from Christian sources that I hav as yet met. Because Mrs. Slenker's way of work is not my way, and because she has found her duty in work distasteful to me, and has used language somewhat obsolete, shall Liberal editors speak of her as "acknowledging guilt," and call her a "crank?" (I wish the word "crank" was obsolete) and throw cold water upon the effort to raise money for her defense?

I suppose if Liberal papers were careful never to say anything against "the established usages of society," they would not find it necessary to send out yearly circulars for help to enable them to continue their publications. Let us all try to help those who work for humanity, especially when their work brings them such suffering as Elmina has been called to endure.

I hav no doubt that my way of work is very distasteful to others who are in the Liberal field, but I cannot change my way. I must be myself, and surely a woman of sixty years, whose life has been without a blemish, even letting the "established" respectable society be the judge, should not be criticised at this time. When the Comstock law shall let go its clutches of this, in my estimation, grand, brave woman, it will be time enough for critical censure.

I hav just received a letter from Massachusetts, from a cousin of mine, Mrs. E. H. Lincolm, in which she says: "I am willing my name should be published as one who believes not only in Elmina, but in her work. Women are much better judges of the need of knowledge on sexual physiology, I think, than men." Faithfully, LUCY N. COLMAN.

June 27, 1887.

FOR it is this—it is the opinions men entertain, and the feelings they cherish respecting those who disown the beliefs they deem important—which makes this country not a place of mental freedom. For a long time past, the chief mischief of the legal penalties is that they strengthen the social stigma. It is that stigma which is really effectiv, and so effectiv is it that the profession of opinions which are under the ban of society is much less common in England than is in many other countries the avowal of those which incur risk of judicial punishment.—John Stuart Mill.

News and Notes.

Saturday evening and Sunday morning at Talent, and Sunday afternoon at Ashland, I gave my closing lectures in Rogue River valley, and although the usual Oregon rain was present, the attendance was large. So memory and hope shine together amid the rainbows and clouds and sunshine of this beautiful valley. I hav seen nothing more enchanting than these sweet sceneries of blending hill and dale, and rolling mists that glitter in gorgeous ranks, and the sky over whose varied face a thousand pictures come and go. I shall not forget our splendid host, that from point to point are making things lively for the orthodox camp. The forces are so evenly divided that there is plenty of fun amid the clash of arms. The little hall at Talent, with its Universal Mental Liberty Club, is a kind of burning focus for the restless fires of progress. A thousand such over the land would giv a new era to the world.

The music furnished by Mr. and Mrs. Breese and Miss Waters, and the band of little children, was an inspiration and delight. The old songs were made living with hope, and the melodies never born of orthodoxy were made to do service for the free spirit of Liberalism.

I was obliged to hurry up, and amid the driving rainstorm reached the cars just as the iron horse was puffing the signal of departure. Sunday midnight I reached Rosebury. Early on Monday morning I was aroused by the cheery voice of my friend, James Laird, who came to pilot me through the big hills and mighty forests of Coos county to the outermost verge of the world, to the jumping-off place, where one can almost leap into the palace of the setting sun. There was a sixty-mile horseback ride before me, for the roads were so uneven that even a buckboard might drop to pieces and disappear amid the abysses of a western turnpike, whose ways, like those of God, are sometimes past finding out. Off we started in the clear and brilliant morning. My steed was one of the best in the county, and for the first few miles I quite enjoyed his quick and invigorating step. About noon we reached Looking Glass, a beautiful little valley amid the bosom of the hills. Beyond this there was a twenty-four mile ride yet to my night's lodgings, and there was no time to stop for rations. We were obliged to take our noonday lunch as we went "marching on." Up over the Coast Range we took our circuitous path. The scenery was delightful and magnificent. Amid the tall trees we could glance far away over the variegated landscape. Blue hills were in the distance, around which rolled the seas of forests, with green isles of cultivated lands here and there. The trees that overhung our pathway were of enormous growth. Some of them, fir and cedar, were ten feet in diameter, and from two hundred to three hundred feet in hight, shooting almost straight as an arrow. Climbing over the mountain, we struck the head waters of the east fork of the Coquille, which went dancing down the enormous crags with its fluttering white banners, making music in the deep and solemn aisles of the endless woods. At times it went merrily along, close by our feet, and we could stoop and drink of its sparkling current. Then in a minute almost it seemed to be down hundreds of feet below, and we could scarcely hear its murmurs as the crested waves dashed on. In the very bosom of the crags and trees we came to a school-house, remote from any habitation. Where the children came from I could not tell, but there were a dozen playing about, and the bright school-mistress was just ringing the bell, for the recess was over. I would gladly hav dismounted and rested my weary bones for an hour or two studying a b c's. We rode up, and friend Laird introduced the majority of the troop of boys and girls as his children or grandchildren. This is a great country for children. Mr. Laird has a family of ten, and all Freethinkers, and still they come. There is plenty of room. Mr. Laird's son has the ranch nearest the schoolhouse, but we could not stop, for still we had sixteen miles of travel to his own home. It seemed an interminable journey. However, we pressed on. Mr. Laird is a jolly companion, and by telling stories and occasionally quoting from THE TRUTH SEEKER, of which he is a constant reader, I was able to forget the aches and pains of my body. Now and then a scene of surpassing beauty would appear amid the dense foliage, the stream bursting into a brilliant cataract, alongside precipitous banks, with flowers and green moss, and the golden evening sunshine flowing in mellow splendor from mass to mass of rocks and fallen trunks, some of which arched the roadway, and we passed beneath them. These pictures would revive me with a shock of delight, as if an exhilarating cup were at my lips, and for awhile there was pure enjoyment. But the aches and pains would come back, and it was with a kind of despairing joy that at the close of every twelve or fifteen minutes I heard friend Laird cry out as we passed a landmark, "Only five miles more," "Four miles more," etc., until at last, at half-past seven o'clock, his white dwelling, solitary in the forest, hove in view. Slowly we meandered to that haven of rest. I could hardly dismount. It seemed as if I had no feeling in my bones. I was a kind of a jelly-fish out of water. However, there was a warm welcome, a comfortable chair, big fireplace, and a crackling blaze, and although it was the month of June, the fiery columns were as pleasant as in winter's weather, and the bright heat, like a charm, dispelled the weariness. Miss Emma Laird, the daughter of mine host, was the gentle housekeeper of this remote caravansary, and soon a delightful supper was ready for the hungry pilgrims. Early to bed was my motto for that night, and soon I was sound asleep, with no dreams to haunt me. At five o'clock in the morning, however, friend Laird said, "Awake—arise," and I obeyed the summons. I was quite refreshed and ready for the day's journey, when the coffee and breakfast had been disposed of, and the sun was flooding the beautiful forest and the birds were singing.

Mr. Laird could not accompany me on my second day's journey, but was to meet me on the morrow at Coquille City. So I bade good-bye to hospitable friends, to the boys and the maiden, to Mr. Cox, who keeps up the tug of war with friend Laird in the wilderness, and off I plunged into the grand old woods, nature's cathedral, filled with music and wondrous pictures. A delicious joy it was to be miles away from any human being, with no voices save that of the swaying branches, the rippling, shining waters, and the invisible birds. Occasionally I would meet a traveler, or pass some out-of-the-way farm, and wonder how in the world anybody ever came to locate in such corners of this vast wilderness. Along in the afternoon I came to Myrtle Point, where about fifty houses are clustered together, and here I was to giv my first lecture in Coos county. Slowly I rode into the little village, wondering what kind of a reception I should hav in this distant place. A pleasant-faced, patriarchal-looking man accosted me and inquired my name and if he could render any service. I did not know but he might be the bishop of the diocese and the mortal foe of the Infidel lecturer. However, I ventured to giv my name. Instantly he said, "Follow me." I knew then by the Masonry of Freethought that I was in the right hands, and I followed. This was C. Lehnherr, and he took me at once to his home, Pioneer Hotel, and here was rest and a good, square meal, and plenty of friends—his wife, Mrs. Lehnherr, a gentle believer in the Catholic faith; his daughter, Mrs. Miller, an ardent Freethinker; the grandchildren, etc. Soon other friends came dropping in—G. W. Ramsdell, a kind of a world-wandering Infidel, with five children, each one born in a different state; and Mrs. Ramsdell, a genial companion of his artist life. The first thing I did after supper was to hav my picture taken. Mr. Ramsdell was the one who suggested the Coos county campaign. He reads THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so keeps on the alert. Among other allies here are Charles Wilkins, who presided at the evening meeting; Edward Bender, leader of the band which discoursed music for the occasion, every member of which is a stanch Infidel—Chas. E. Diets, Henry Schroeder, C. E. Schroeder, Wm. Rohm; and from Arago, A. J. Smith, A. L. Allen, Jas. McNaughton, John Lindebeck, Fred. Schroeder, J. Henry Schroeder, Augustus H. Schroeder, F. M. Kronenberg, Wm. H. Schroeder, George W. Schroeder, Wm. Warner, of Rowland Prairie, and others coming from many miles about to attend the opening lecture. The hall was crowded in the evening with an enthusiastic audience. The band poured forth its inspiring strains, and I felt well rewarded for all the labors of my journey with so cordial a reception, and I did the best I could for "The New Heaven and Earth." The next morning I went to Arago, a part of the way by wagon, and then by boat. They hav all sorts of conveyances in this country—saddle-horses, boats, wagons, buckboards, steamers, schooners, rafts, etc. I came to the handsome farm of J. Henry Schroeder. Close by are the fair grounds of the county, in the big building of which I gave a lecture in the afternoon. Mr. Schroeder chartered a steamer for the special accommodation of the Infidels, and a large number were present from up and down the river and the lumber camps. The Schroeders, I find, are a multitudinous family. Henry Schroeder is the patriarch of them all. He came to this country in 1859. He is now over seventy years of age, and his golden wedding will come in 1889. He has grandchildren and great-grandchildren by the score. I asked him how many he had. He said he didn't know; he hadn't counted them lately. Somewhere between fifty and sixty is the number of his descendants, and they are all in the Freethought ranks, to the third and fourth generation. This is a good record. J. Henry Schroeder, his son, has ten children. He is the captain of our forces here, and his energy and persistence are indomitable. He has written scores of letters, raised the sinews of war, chartered steamers, etc., in order to make the campaign a success, and under his leadership I find everything in splendid condition. All the friends are interested, and the wheels of progress roll smoothly on. I was pleased to meet with his wife, and his daughters, Miss Ella and Mrs. Kribs and Mrs. Hanly, and his sons, George and Augustus—all enlisted in the Liberal ranks. Mrs. Schroeder is the daughter of Mr. Perry, one of the old campaigners of this country. Her two sisters married two other Schroeder brothers, and there are about ten children to each family, and so under this name a regiment might be mustered into service. Thus may all good citizens flourish. With the Schroeders also are the Smiths, the Lowes, the Garfields, the Nichols, the Danielsons, etc.; and I really think Coos county is the banner county of the States for its stalwart Liberalism.

After the Arago meeting we went by the steamboat Ceres, Capt. John Yeager, to Coquille City. Here are also some good friends—E. S. Spurgeon, V. N. Perry, A. G. Aiken, Andrew Forsness, C. W. Allen, S. N. A. Downing, Mr. and Mrs. Harrington, etc., and R. L. Blackburn, brother to our Utah campaigner, Prof. Charles Blackburn. I guess everybody in the city came to the lecture in the evening, for the hall was filled to its utmost capacity. They don't hav very big cities in Coos county, for the whole population of this sea-board is only about four thousand. But the people are full of life.

The next day, in the bright morning, we embark for Bandon on the steamer Myrtle, Capt. Levi Snyder. The Coquille river is one of the most crooked in the world. It is forty miles by the stream to the ocean, and yet in a straight line by land it is only twelve miles. However, the turnings in and out afford delightful sceneries. We pass by the farm of our stanch friend, Judge A. J. Lowe, who is one of the old settlers of this county, one of the "'Forty-niners" of California. He is a prominent citizen, and his Infidelity is never kept in the background. He has two brothers, Robert Lowe, of Empire City, and R. M. Lowe, of "Beaver Slew," and all three are Liberals, and surrender nothing for the sake of popularity. At Parkersburg, along the route, I am pleased to meet David and Frank Lowe, Wm. Hammersberg, etc.; at Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. Walcott, and others, and all along the river the Liberals seem to congregate. At about noon we arrive at Bandon, and this, with the exception of Cape Blanco, eighteen miles below, is the extremest western point in the United States; and so it has been my fortune to giv a lecture in America nearer to the setting sun than any other pioneer. I can't get any farther without tumbling into the Pacific. I was glad indeed to greet the broad waters flinging their banners against the glistening sun. Immediately after dinner I rush to the shores and climb the big rock called Gibraltar Rock, which is about a hundred feet high, and a lonely rock it is, for there is none like it anywhere up and down the coast, and the geologists affirm that it came all the way to this land from Montana, where its kindred tower to the skies. From this rock there is a magnificent view of the shores and ocean. To the north is Cape Arago, and to the south Cape Blanco, and the Portland steamers can be seen as they speed over the blue Pacific. Hundreds of sea-lions were disporting on the rocks, and thousands of birds skimming the air, and the thundering breakers in glorious music were dashing for miles along the beach; gorgeously, amid a pavilion of clouds, the sun sank beneath that burnished sea.

Among our friends at Bandon are John Hambloch, P. H. Rosa, Robert Walker, T. N. Nichols, Jerry Hines, L. L. Simpson, J. W. Dobbins, Judge G. W. Dyer, etc. P. O. Chilstrom, who presided at the evening meeting, and J. M. Upton, editors of the Bandon Recorder, are fearless exponents of Liberalism, and they are exceptions to the majority of editors, and speak their minds without fear or favor. It was a pleasure to meet with such radical and able advocates of our cause, so bold and chivalrous in their defense of liberty and justice. One of their recent leading editorials is worthy of a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is so pronounced and vigorous in its enunciation of reform.

I was pleased to meet W. V. Cope, of Denmark, Or., formerly of Eureka, Cal., a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and now and then a contributor to its pages.

Over three hundred were present at the evening meeting. They came from all parts—Coquille City, Parkersbury, Randolph, the mills, logging-camps, etc. Captain Floyd, of the tug-boat Katie Cook, brought thirty-two, and it will thus be seen that there was quite an interest in the Freethought gathering. I gave a lecture on "American Democracy." At the close the Coquille Secular Union was formed, with J. Henry Schroeder for president, and J. M. Upton for secretary. There will be a grand gathering on the Fourth of July of the Liberals along Coquille river, and without doubt hundreds of friends will join in this united movement.

Early on Friday we return to Coquille City on the steamer Antelope, Captain Reed. Here we meet a delegation from Marshfield—S. B. Cathcart, J. D. Garfield, R. M. Hutchinson, Wm. Hall, T. G. Owen, F. Mark, and E. A. Anderson. In the afternoon a twenty-five-mile drive brings us to Marshfield. We lectured here Friday and Saturday evening to full houses, and we lecture again this afternoon, and at Empire City this evening. We will report progress next week. Everything so far has been favorable, and we hav a stanch Liberal host. I hav been kept so busy lecturing and traveling that I hav not had time until to-day to write these "News and Notes," and I am so far West, with the railroad seventy-five miles off, that I don't know whether I can get them to THE TRUTH SEEKER in time. But I trust to luck. I hav enjoyed every minute in this wild and almost unbroken country.

June 22d, 23d, and 24th there is a grand rally at Silverton. I shall be at Salem, June 26th; at Molalla, June 28th, 29th, and 30th; at Portland, July 3d; McMinnville, July 5th, 6th, and 7th; at Corvallis, July 10; at Forest Grove, July 17th; at Seattle, Wash. T., July 24th. I shall be at Port Angeles, Port Townsend, Colfax, Pendleton, Baker City, but the dates are not yet fixed.

Liberal Enthusiasm in Oregon.

From the Bandon Recorder.

In accordance with announcements made through these columns, Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the American Secular Union, and one of the ablest Freethought writers and speakers in the United States, delivered a lecture in our little Bandon on Thursday evening, the 16th. He was greeted by an intelligent and appreciativ audience of at least three hundred people. Mr. P. O. Chilstrom introduced the speaker by saying that we of the coast counties of Oregon, being practically shut out from the great centers of intelligent thought, by reason of locality and natural barriers, seldom had the opportunity we were about to enjoy on this occasion, that of listening to so noted a speaker as Mr. Putnam. The lecturer's subject was "American Democracy." The time occupied was a little over an hour and a half, and there was not one in the audience with whom we spoke after the lecture but that expressed a regret that the speaker did not keep right on talking indefinitly. Never in the history of Coos county has there been so able, so logical, so eloquent a defining made as to what constitutes American Democracy, as to what are the the sacred and inalienable rights and privileges of an American citizen to liberty of conscience, to free speech, the pursuit of happiness, and the enjoyment of all that is good and desirable in this world. The Nine Demands of Liberalism, as read and explained by Mr. Putnam, were reduced to simple axioms such as no sound, fair, rational thinker can possibly gainsay or reject. To do justice to the subject at all, in the space at our command at this time, just before going to press, is simply impossible. Even though we could giv space, word for word, to every thought uttered, there would still be something lacking, something unconveyed and unpictured—the style, the look, the earnest expression, the honest ringing tone. The speaker was greeted again and again by most hearty applause as he made point after point, telling and forcible. It was Bandon's intellectual feast, and right well did she partake and enjoy.

At the conclusion of the meeting a temporary organization of an auxiliary Secular society was effected under the name of the Coquille Secular Union. J. Henry Schroeder was elected temporary chairman, and J. M. Upton, secretary. A charter list of membership was prepared and numerously signed by the ladies and gentlemen who had remained for the purpose, when, on motion, the chairman appointed as a committee to secure additional names, C. Lehnherr, of Myrtle Point; A. J. Smith, of Arago; Mrs. Harrington, of Coquille City; D. J. Lowe, of Parkersburg; A. D. Wolcott, of Randolph, and J. M. Upton, of Bandon. It was decided that a permanent organization should be effected at Bandon, July 4th. Messrs. Jere Haynes, P. O. Chilstrom, T. V. Nichols, and J. M. Upton were appointed a committee on constitution and by-laws, to report at the next meeting of the Union.

MR. ANDREW D. WHITE will publish in the July Popular Science Monthly the second of a series of articles, begun some time ago, under the title of "New Chapters in the Warfare of Science." The forthcoming article will treat of the progress of human enlightenment in the domain of meteorology.

Human Morality.

The assertion often made by the advocates of Christianity that man's conduct here is influenced for the better by belief in a hereafter is contrary to fact. Most men's religion is purely theoretical. In practice they are guided by their own interests, or natural sense of what is right. When faith is really their leading principle, it becomes their object not so much to do good as to escape the consequences of doing ill. Most believers would willingly barter their hopes of heaven for certain deliverance from the possibility of hell.

Among theoretical Christians there are many who are temperate, upright, and honorable. This is not on account of their belief that in another world such conduct will meet with reward, or a contrary course receive punishment. In their hours of prayer they say, "Thy kingdom come," and, "Deliver us from evil," but in their social and business relations they act from the same motivs as Infidels. They do right because it is their nature to do so, and avoid wrong because they know that its consequences would be prejudicial to their interests in this life.

The practical Christian whose actions are regulated by a consideration of reward or punishment hereafter is a dangerous character. He does no good for its own sake, but from a selfish desire for future remuneration. He shuns no evil because it is evil, but from fear of punishment. In the time of temptation he is the first to yield and the last to be suspected. The first to yield because the master he serves offers equal payment to the laborer who commences work at the eleventh hour and to him who has borne the burden and heat of the day. The last to be suspected because his religious character conceals the evil in his nature from the eyes of those who imagin good morals accompany religious faith. His duties to others are performed for his own sake, or abandoned altogether if he thinks thereby to win a larger crown, or escape with greater ease from wrath to come. When practical Christianity was a power in communities, it peopled deserts and monasteries with men and women who cast off their obligations to their fellow-creatures. Now that it is a power only in individuals, it makes them impediments to the progress of their race. Gazing on visions of another world, they block the path along which others are pressing to the improvement of this. If as time advances we see Christians striving more and more, as we do ourselvs, to make the best of this existence, and letting the next wait till it comes, it is because the extinction of Christianity by the absorption of its followers into the religion of humanity is a process constantly going on. It is the effect of the same law that causes progress in all things, the survival of the fittest.

Finite intelligence could make no improvement in and pass no judgment upon a revelation from infinit wisdom and love. Yet a constantly increasing number of religious teachers endeavor to adapt what they call the word of God to the modern discoveries of man. They decide by the test of such discoveries whether passages shall be retained or rejected. They discard verbal inspiration of scripture, and substitute a general superintendence of divine intelligence, limited to the prevention of spiritual error. They try God's teaching by their own reason, and pronounce some of it to be sound and some unsound. Their actions are inconsistent with their professed belief, but they are helping our work. They speak our truths from the pulpits of the churches where our voices cannot be heard. They call themselvs preachers of Christianity, but they are eradicating its doctrins from the minds of their hearers, and teaching a grander and purer morality than Jesus ever knew. They are priests of humanity, and are promulgating the great rule that an evil deed is that which adds to human suffering, and a virtuous action that which increases human happiness.

The mind of the Infidel, freed from the rubbish of old beliefs and theological moralities, is in a condition to accept a code of ethics founded upon reason and utility. While men were seeking knowledge of God's will from those who knew no more of it than themselvs, they were losing sight of man's needs. Now they are acquiring information on which a true system of morality, a human rule of life, is being constructed. Human conscience defines moral actions to be those advantageous to human interests. Human understanding interprets the rule by the light of experience. Human will conforms to it unrestrained by imaginary wills of visionary deities. Human interest reaps the reward of this conformity in the greater share the increased stock of common goods furnishes to each.

Humanity has its temple. It is not in Jerusalem, nor in Rome, nor in Constantinople. Its vast dome shelters the earth. From its pulpits its priests expound human thoughts, and at its altars sacrifice false gods and inhuman ideas. Its choirs, singing of earth's beauties and man's love, cheer us in this our dwelling-place, the only home we know. Its saints who hav passed away are lamps to our feet, and those still remaining with us staves in our hands. Its martyrs are men and women who hav suffered for proclaiming its rights. Its confessors, when tyrants threaten in the cause of God, boldly stand forth in the interests of man. The pure lives of its virgins hav never been prostituted to the love of mock divinities, but ever faithful to real men; their lips never polluted by prayer, their knees never bent to the degradation of adoring a feared unknown. They follow not the Lamb of God whithersoever he goeth, but the good of man whencesoever it cometh. And its glorious company of widows, once wedded to a God that is dead, are devoted from henceforth to mankind that livs.

Humanity has its paradise. It is not an Eden with its untasted fruit of the tree of knowledge, for the feast of knowledge is spread upon its tables, and to all who will the invitation is sent, "Come and eat." It is not a new Jerusalem, where all interests are lost but that in a God, for in it our own interests and those of our fellow-beings are alike objects of culture. It is not a place for the indulgence of eternal sloth and sensuality, such as the followers of Mohammed seek. It is not a Nirvana of self-annihilation and destruction of individuality, for which the Buddhist longs. It is a condition here in which evil is subdued and good triumphant. It is not a divine gift, but the price of human labor.

Humanity has a true morality. No god-made religion ever had. The law of Moses, which won outward obedience through terror, had none. The teachings of Jesus had none, except inasmuch as Jesus himself had drunk somewhat of the fountain of humanity and blended some of its principles with those of his Jewish theology. Since his day his followers hav blended more and more until the nature of Christianity has become so disguised that men are often called good Christians for ignoring their faith and acting by human rules. It is the process of absorption by which the religion of humanity attracts men to itself and from the errors resulting from belief in divinities. It is the survival of the fittest by which codes of ethics founded upon blind faith are doomed to perish, and will be supplanted by a higher morality built upon utility, which is already becoming recognized as our proper guide in life.

For Mrs. Slenker's Defense.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Many of your subscribers and readers are responding to the calls made for the Elmina defense fund, and every day brings in one or more subscriptions, some large, some small, but every little counts, so that now I estimate that the total fund amounts to about $400. I see the Investigator has acknowledged about $125. Mrs. Slenker has sent us names and amounts which foot up $170. The moneys sent to us we hav already acknowledged in the Health Monthly in part, but up to date we hav received about $85. In the Health Monthly we shall publish every item and send copies of the paper to those who hav sent with their remittance their names and address. Probably it is unnecessary to ask you to burden your crowded columns with these items. Mrs. Slenker is in constant communication with the members of the Defense Association, and already local counsel has been engaged, and we hav reason to expect will serve satisfactorily in the case. The case is put down to be called early in July (the 12th), but there may be reasons why the prosecution will prefer to lay the case over until fall, or if the prosecution is ready it may be that the defense will ask for some delay. Uncle Sam's appropriations for the court proceedings seem to hav run low, and just now it would appear that the defense is financially better prepared to go on than the government. It is, of course, impossible as yet to make a fair estimate of what sum will be required to make a good defense, but it is certainly important that a considerable sum should be insured early in order that nothing shall be left undone that ought to be done, for lack of means.

Christianity, Positivism, and Socialism.

From the Commonweal.

The "essential thought" of Christianity lies in the notion of "holiness"—i. e., a special relation between the individual soul and "God." This has as its correlate what is sometimes known as the "ethics of inwardness"—that is, a morality which centers in the personality and the attainment of this quasi-mystical relation with the divinity—or, in other words, "salvation." As a consequence, Christianity, though retaining elements of barbaric ferocity in its theology, in its moral sentiment invariably tends to become maudlin, and its practice commonly to hypocrisy.

Now, Positivism, while abandoning the theological side of Christianity, retains its introspectiv and individualistic attitude in ethics. The ethical aim of Positivism, like that of Christianity, is the perfecting of the individual character, and according to what is virtually the same standard, as is proved by the retention of so many Christian forms in the Comtean cultus, and still more in the adoption of the introspectiv and mystical Imitatio Christi of Thomas à Kempis as a text-book of life and conduct.

Socialism alone, in effect, definitivly abandons this old ethical standard, and the code of morality growing out of it, by proclaiming the great modern truth, that social happiness, in its plain sense, is the one object of all moral conduct, and in refusing to be turned aside from this principle by specious attempts to reintroduce the rags and tags of a theological morality under another name. ## Mr. Denslow on the Labor Question.

The capitalists and monopolists are fortunate in having secured the services of so able an advocate as Mr. Van Buren Denslow, whose articles on Adam Smith and "Wealth" in his "Modern Thinkers" hav already proved his capacity to plead their cause. I use these expressions without scruple, for the polemical purpose of Mr. Denslow's article on "Protection to Labor" is transparent, from the exordium where he classes labor agitators with fever and ague to the argument ad hominem which closes his first article under the above head.

Mr. Denslow's figures are interesting and instructiv, but his inferences are altogether of the forensic, not the scientific type.

"The cause of the demand for labor," says Mr. Denslow, "is the profit which capital can earn in employing labor." This is the exploded dogma of that most dogmatical among economists, J. R. MacCulloch. I hope to be pardoned for calling it exploded, for, though continually reproduced by capitalistic writers of pamphlets, newspaper articles, etc., it is utterly rejected by all who hav gone below the surface of the question, e.g., by James Bonar in his recent work on Malthus. "Even Mrs. Marcet, a docil Ricardion," he observes, "put the case more carefully. Work to be performed is the immediate cause of the demand for labor" (p. 155, Harper's edition, 1885). That is the point. The cause of the demand for labor is the want of the things which labor produces. Ricardo contended that the amount of the supply was limited by the capital which stood ready to furnish employment for labor, and MacCulloch, as we see, went further. But both of them overlooked the fact that a very large class of laborers are not "employed" by capitalists at all, and the still more significant fact that, in every case, a last analysis shows it to be labor which employs labor, capital standing only in the relation of a middle man.

How, then, does capital get into this position? Denslow, following Adam Smith, maintains that the profits of capital are the "reward of abstinence"—as he puts it, "a day's work already done and embodied in the form of capital is as well entitled to compensation as a day's work not yet done, which we call labor." Now, if I deny, and every "professional labor parasite, prophet, agitator, and economic quack" does utterly deny, that the compensation of a day's work done and embodied in the form of capital is anything else than the capital itself, Mr. Denslow's whole system stands on a shaky foundation. Which of us is right? To cite an illustration of which capitalists are rather fond. If a savage, a member of a tribe who liv by digging clams, constructs a spade with which he can dig ten times as many clams as with his hands, is not the possession of the spade an abundant compensation for his past labor? How does he get a lien on the labor of all the other savages who dig clams? This question Mr. Denslow avoids, and, since his purpose is polemical, not scientific, he is mighty right to avoid it.

But as "the Lord turned the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness," so all Mr. Denslow's talents hav not prevented him from selecting a singularly unhappy instance. "Working a farm on equal shares, where one person finds the land, improvments, buildings, seeds, fruit-trees, implements, and, perhaps, cattle, and flocks, and poultry, while the other brings only the labor power of himself, his family, and those he may hire, is a fair bargain. . . . This is the metayer system of Europe. . . . Its equity still remains to be questioned." The devil it does! Mr. Denslow simply presumes on the ignorance of your readers when he supposes them not to know that the metayer system is a mere relic of serfdom, and has always been considered in the highest degree tyrannical and pernicious by all but a few conservativ French and Italian writers, among whom Sismondi is the best known. He deserves thanks, however, for showing that it is just like all other arrangements between laborer and capitalist, the more so since this very metayer system is becoming alarmingly common in the United States.

And now, bidding farewell to Mr. Denslow for the present, let us consider how the capitalist gets his lien on labor? I answer, Through the action of the legislature. As the powers of a landlord under the metayer system are conferred in Europe on an aristocracy, in America on syndicates, as slaves are made slaves, and serfs serfs by the concerted action of the victorious or dominant element in any state, so railroads are chartered and the other corporations to which Mr. Denslow alludes created by the power of the government—that is, of organized physical force. It is a system of barefaced robbery.

Now, I will not only admit, but insist on what seems at first sight an argument against my theory. Undoubtedly every machine, from the savage's spade for digging clams to the Union Pacific Railroad, every accumulation of wealth, from the first basket of clams to the millions of a Rothschild, makes it harder for the man who has nothing to liv, except as the employee of the man who has something. Here, then, would seem to be a natural cause for the relation of laborer and capitalist. But it is a maxim of political economy that competition reduces prices to the cost of production, which, of course, include the the capitalist's own wages as a contributor to the work by superintending, etc. What is it that interferes with the operation of this equitable principle and enables the capitalist to collect a revenue in excess of his own wages of superintendence? I answer again, it is the law. Take away that, and his profits would fall to the wages of superintendence instantly. Mr. Denslow's demonstration that the products are divided about equally between laborers and capitalists, even if it were sound, is immaterial. The question is, How can capitalists get anything but those wages of superintendence which they very commonly dispense with in hiring factors, overseers, and stewards? I defy Mr. Denslow to show any other how than that they hav the law on their side and the power.

But Mr. Denslow lets another cat out of the bag in admitting that his proportion is true only for some trades, and that the share of labor diminishes as machinery takes its place. The meaning of this, being interpreted, is that notwithstanding the protection given by governments to capital, competition eventually reduces prices to the cost of production after all. Under the slave and serf systems this mattered little. But now, when lower profits mean not only insolvency, but speedy liquidation, the capitalist must keep up with the times or perish. Accordingly machinery is continually supplanting labor, and the reward of the latter, Mr. Denslow being witness, falls accordingly. This may seem to contradict his other assertion, to which I agree, that the wages of the hired laborer increase with the gains of the capitalist. But the paradox is easily explained. Wages increase absolutely with profits. Relativly to the percentage of profits they increase also. But relativly to the incomes of capitalists they decrease as the capitalists themselvs grow bigger. This is the double process which is forcing on revolution, placing on one side a very few immense monopolies, and on the other a world of discontented laborers.

Mr. Denslow improves on MacCulloch, as MacCulloch did on Ricardo, when he says that if wages are too low in any line of employment what is needed in that line is a greater competition among employers, and therefore a good many of those who are now seeking to work at that business for wages should begin working as employers. Let us return for wisdom to the friend of our childhood, Mrs. Marcet. "Work to be performed is the immediate cause of the demand for labor." Then low wages in any line mean that there is no work to be done in it which anybody wants, and the incoming of a thousand employers would only mean a thousand candidates for bankruptcy. I am tempted here to show that the reduction of prices to the cost of production is secondary, and that the overstocking of particular lines with the resulting crash and crisis is the primary fact in our industrial system. This, however, has been done already by myself and others so well that I only advise Mr. Denslow to read Karl Marx's little pamphlet on "Capital and Wage Labor," or my own, entitled, "Anarchy." But I cannot refrain from pointing out that Mr. Denslow's wage laborers with $800,000,000 in the savings banks belong to that class of skilled, not that of common, laborers; that for them to engage in business on their own account would be to invite the fate of beetles in that battle where, to use Mr. Denslow's own eloquent words, "the giants become Titans and the conflict Titanic;" and finally, that their lending to capitalists through the medium of savings banks does, indeed, "invert every law of charity—take from them that hav very little to hand over to them that hav much;" for as prices approach the cost of production the rate of interest falls, while the incomes of the Titanic capitalists year by year increase.

In Mr. Denslow's second paper, reasoning from the above fallacious premises, he piles fallacy upon fallacy. "The infinit elasticity of our wants is an undoubted truism in economics. But its necessary corollary is an exhaustless demand upon our energies. . . . The real road to shorter hours for every workingman is longer hours. . . . It is the love of ease, and the desire to avoid the risks, embarrassments, and worry of self-employment that chiefly keep men in the wages class." The first of these apothegms is true. But the second plainly contradicts the third. If the increase of wants means an infinit increase of labor, then longer hours can never bring shorter hours. Both the propositions may be false, but one of them must be. Now, the truth is this: that the increase of wants does not necessarily mean an increase of labor. Machinery ought to save labor. The lowest savages hav to work far harder to get clams enough to eat than the laborers of a civilized community to get a much better living. Why, then, do the civilized laborers not enjoy shorter hours than the savages? Mr. Denslow means to say it is because they insist on living higher. But suppose they did not; is it not clear that the demand for labor would fall, and that wages would fall with it? One laborer by working harder and living lower than others can get ahead of them, but all can no more gain in that way than all can win in a race. There must be another reason why machinery does not save labor. There must be another remedy for this anomalous state of things than for the laborers to "scab" each other down to the savages' standard of comfort, which is clearly no remedy at all, for it would make so much less labor to be done, and the same number of hours' work for those who could get employment. The real reasons why machinery does not shorten hours, and the real remedy, are as follows: Under every system of labor—slave, serf, or wage—the share of the laborers is the least on which they can liv consistently with the prevailing idea of comfort; that is, the least they will take without resorting to general rebellion. Mr. Denslow, of course, is aware of this well-known law, which simply brings labor within the generalization about prices falling to the cost of production. It involves this corollary, that the minimum on which laborers can liv and raise children being the average wage, multitudes never get as much, and therefore are not kept in the wage class by love of ease, but by another cause altogether. That cause is simply the operation of the law itself. All above the minimum necessary to maintain the existence of the laboring class goes to the slave-owners, landlords, or capitalists. In the first two cases it is taken from the laborers by direct force, in the third by the threat of refusing them work except on the employers' own terms, which are just the old minimum, the least they can be Jewed down to without turning discontent into revolution. Of this "surplus value," as Marx calls it, a part is devoted to enlarging the establishments of which the laborers form a portion, with what result we hav already seen. But another goes to the defense of these establishments. Policemen, soldiers, agents, collectors, lawyers, politicians, sky-pilots, etc., all so many defenders of the capitalists' possessions, must be supported out of the surplus value which the laborer creates. Thus the laborer, receiving only enough to keep him in existence as a laborer, forges his own chains with every stroke, nor is there any apparent remedy which does not involve getting rid of the noble army of idlers—stock-gamblers, politicians, military, sky-pilots, and all. But this, if it could be done, would really be a remedy, for the possession of the tools by the toilers and the product by the producers would mean short hours and general abundance.

Of all the monopolies created by governments for the enrichment of favorits and the oppression of the laborers, the most utterly inexcusable which now exists is the system of Protection to whose defense Mr. Denslow devotes his last paper. It is difficult to believe that Mr. Denslow can be sincere in saying that all values depend as much on the obstacles to the production of the commodity by others as they do on the facilities of its production by you, and therefore the higher values of American over foreign products are due to the obstacles to the free introduction of the latter. At all events, the fallacy is too transparent to be worth refuting when the many obscuring words are cleared away and the conclusion put in juxtaposition with the premises.

The second reason why a tariff benefits the American laborer is stated thus: "To the diversification of our industries is due their activity; out of their activity comes the high rate of profit on capital, and out of this high rate of profit on capital come the existing rates of wages." This, of course, embodies the old fallacy quoted from MacCulloch, but it also involves another which lies perhaps deeper still. So far, at least, as unskilled labor is concerned, high wages are as mythical as the story of the man who carried the calf till he became an ox. Malthus long since reasoned (Pol. Econ, 1820, p. 125), and the experienced Brasseys hav since announced as the result of their ledgers (Work and Wages, c. iii), that the cost of common labor to the employer is the same all over the world. The difference in the "real wages," i. e., in what a day's work will bring the laborer, depends on the price of those things which the laborer principally needs, and, of course, can only be lowered by everything which raises the cost of necessaries. In our multiplying tramps and paupers we may see every reason to believe that it is steadily falling as the United States becomes more of a manufacturing and less of an agricultural country.

The third argument, that the artificial creation of a domestic market is necessary to get rid of unexportable products, is surely too far-fetched for consideration. That any commodity under any circumstances can sell better where it is produced than where it is not is indeed an original position, and can rarely indeed be otherwise than absurd.

The fourth reason and all which follow it are political, not economic, full of the very spirit of spread-eagle, and adapted to excite a smile even in a Fourth of July oration. With more than half our farmers metayers, tenants, or insolvent mortgagers; with a million laborers in an intermittent condition of enforced idleness; with legislatures, courts, and senates controled by stock-gamblers and bonanza millionaires; with the press gagged, the Puritan Sabbath restored, immigration arrested by legislation, "order" maintained by Pinkerton's banditti, hunger in our cities, revolution at our doors, it is time to talk of attracting all nations to us, of our example to the world, of our glorious Union, our pampered workmen, our manifest destiny! The man is as blind now as most others were some thirty years ago. Who can fail to see that now, as then, we are approaching a crisis which, if it does not end in national ruin, must destroy these abuses which we stand alone in our conceited stupidity by cherishing.

Among all these closing reasons, the fourth alone is worthy a serious reply. It is that home exchanges are preferable to foreign because the country is enriched by both lines of production. I will not inquire whether the sentiment be worthy a nation whose founder claimed the world for his country. It shall be legitimate, if you like, but surely it applies only to lines of production which can support themselvs. Now the tariff, imposed to protect industries which, by the hypothesis, cannot support themselvs in America, has killed others, such as ship-building, in which we used to lead the world. And now it is proposed to tax us, that ship-building may be restored by subsidies. Instead of the ox carrying the man, the man must shoulder another calf! It is as if an Illinois farmer, having spent the profit on his corn and hogs in a doubtfully successful attempt to raise pineapples, should now, for want of corn, begin feeding the pineapples to the hogs. The only way a government can protect the laborer is to let him alone. Of all other men, he has the best reason to exclaim, "Deliver me from my friends, and I will take care of my enemies." C. L. JAMES.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

Immediately after giving up my position at the asylum I was appointed superintendent of the schools supported by the New York Aid Society, some eleven in all, scattered over the district. I visited them every week, and generally spoke on Sunday in some one of the school-houses. At the close of one of my meetings in Alexandria a gentleman came to the platform and introduced himself, and invited me to take dinner with him at the Magnolia House, saying that as he was from Massachusetts it would be pleasant to hav a little visit with a Northern woman. I said: "I hav with me some two or three teachers. I think I would not like to leave them." He interrupted me, saying, "Invite them also." Said I, "I will introduce them, and if you then choose to invite them, I shall be most happy to dine with you." I introduced him. Two of the ladies were daughters of Mr. Lawton, of Cambridge, who is, or was, the originator of the Lawton blackberry, and they bore a color as dark as the famous fruit of that name. I expected my new friend would feel that such a color would be a bar to further hospitalities, but he immediately extended his invitation to my colored friends. I induced them to accompany me to the hotel. They were refined ladies, and shrank from any unpleasant demonstration. I felt sure that the gentleman who had invited us knew his grounds, and so I told them it would be something to remember, to dine at the public table in a hotel in the old slaveholding city of Alexandria. We went to table. None of the boarders left, but the waiters, who were colored, seemed beside themselvs with astonishment. My new acquaintance was a prominent lawyer, and the landlord a German. Some few weeks afterward Mr. Douglass was ordered from the table, but he did not go to the hotel as the guest of my influential friend.

I tried in my public meetings to teach these poor, ignorant, grown-up children that "cleanliness" was not only "next to godliness," but that it was positivly essential to godliness, and that shouting, singing, and even praying would avail them nothing while the day following these religious demonstrations they drank themselvs drunk, quarreled with each other, and stole and lied as they had learned to do in slavery. It was a hard lesson for some of them, but generations of the most debasing, abject slavery is not productiv of very lofty morals. We expected too much of them.

The American Tract Society early established themselvs by their agents among these people. This society was the most positiv pro-slavery organization I ever knew. In all their leaflets, as well as larger publications, they entirely ignored slavery. They sometimes republished some of the English tracts, leaving out all reference to the sin of slaveholding, putting instead warnings against dancing, card-playing, and theatrical exhibitions. One at this day can hardly realize how entirely subservient all classes were to the slave power. I remember a good, liberal clergyman who, for twenty years, fought in his own parish "the rum power," and conquered it, publishing a reading-book for schools, in which he put one of Cowper's poems wherein occur these grand words against slavery:

> I would not hav a slave to till my grounds,
> To carry me, to fan me while I sleep,
> For all the wealth that sinews bought and sold
> Hav ever earned. No! dear as freedom is,
> And in my heart's just estimation prized above all good,
> I would much rather be myself the slave,
> And wear the bonds, than fasten them on him.

The South refused to buy the book, and the clergyman, bending his knee to the slave power, published another edition leaving out the objectionable poem. The Tract Society now ignoring the past, made haste to prepare a room for religious services at Freedman's Village, where my friend, Captain Carse, was superintendent. These agents did not like me or my influence. Captain Carse, on the other hand, thought my influence beneficial, and sometimes sent for me in a troublous time with the contrabands. One day he said to me, "You ought to hav a monthly pass instead of being obliged to go to the commandant every time we need you. I will get you one;" and so, going to the office, he asked Captain Brown to make out a monthly pass. "How is that?" said Captain Brown. "Here is a man who was just trying to persuade me to refuse Mrs. Colman a pass, never allowing her one." Captain Carse looked up and saw the resident agent of the American Tract Society, and thereupon ensued a scene. The superintendent of Freedman's Village demanded his authority for keeping anyone out of a place of which he was military commander, reminding him that he was a resident only by his permission. The monthly pass was given, and these agents were obliged to endure my visits oftener than agreeable.

Sojourner Truth, the colored woman who was not allowed to enter the White House as an equal with other visitors, was living at the village at that time, going among the women and teaching them how to make the best use of the little the government supplied them to liv upon. I think I will here giv my readers an account of a visit which I made to President Lincoln with this remarkable colored woman for the purpose of introducing her to him. Sojourner Truth was a slave in the state of New York, freed by the state in 1817. She was then about forty-five years of age, and she lived till the year 1883. She never learned to read, but her intuition was remarkable. She was what the Spiritualists call mediumistic, but the spirit with whom she held almost hourly converse was God. She held long conversations with what she called the God of the universe, asked his opinion about anything she was uncertain about, and followed his directions. She early came into the Antislavery work, and did valiant service as a lecturer. The first time she visited Ohio, she must hav been about seventy years old, but she was as vigorous as a woman of fifty. Some one of the friends of her race fitted her out with horse and buggy, and she traveled for weeks, getting up her own meetings, and they were quite a success. She said whenever she came where two roads met, she laid the lines down in her lap, said to God, "I don't know which way to go; please you drive," and he always drove her to some place where she had a good meeting. Her talks, which she called lectures, were mostly recitals of her own experiences. And she could sing well, having a delightful voice. I hav heard her sing charmingly after she had passed her one-hundredth birthday. When she went among the freed people, she found, if she was to hav influence among them, she must refrain from doing herself what she wished them not to do. Her wit or talent at repartée was very great. Once, in a large company, a young man said to her, "Sojourner, I don't know about your going to heaven. The Bible says no unclean thing shall enter that place, and your breath is foul with tobacco." Sojourner looked at the saucy youngster, saying, "Laws, child! I 'spects to leave my breath behind when I die."

When Mr. Lincoln was elected to the presidency, Sojourner determined to make the journey to Washington to see him, an Antislavery president, and so her Antislavery friends sent her, with her grandson, a boy of twelve years, to me. For some reason, if any special thing was to be done for any colored person, everybody, far and near, knew I was the one to call upon to do it, and I am glad to say that, however difficult the thing to be done, I somehow accomplished it.

When Sojourner reached the capital she supposed that by the following day she could walk right into the White House without any trouble, hav a good chat with the president, and be asked to call again perhaps; but it took many weeks before I could get an appointment for her. This I did at last through Mrs. Lincoln's dressmaker, a colored woman, who because of her business was in almost daily communication with the president's house. At last, one Saturday morning at eight o'clock, we were to be received, and promptly at the hour we were on the steps. The usher took my card, and leading the way to the outer-room, from which the president's room was reached, seated us, saying that when Mr. Lincoln wished he would send for us. This receiving-room was well filled before nine o'clock. Still no call came for Mrs. Colman and her friend. Just before twelve o'clock we were presented. While in the anteroom there had come in a black woman who looked so forlorn that I knew she needed a friend, so I said, "Hav you any one to present you to the president?" "No," said she, "but I must see him." So I said, "When I am called for you may go with me," and I entered the presence of the nation's highest officer with two of the blackest women I ever saw, not as my escort, but I as theirs.

We were obliged to wait long enough for Mr. Lincoln to tell one of his funny stories to a deputation of twelve merchant tailors from Baltimore, who had come to ask the president to pardon one of their brother merchants charged with trading with the rebels. I do not know whether the man was pardoned; they departed with no answer save the story, and that I hav forgotten. I wrote it out at the time, and it was published in the New York Tribune. When the president was ready, I said, "I am very glad, sir, to say to you that I havn't come to ask any favor; my business is simply to present to you my friend, Sojourner Truth, a woman very widely known, not only in our country, but abroad. She will say to you what she desires without further help from me." To the other woman I said, "As soon as Sojourner is through with the president, present your business." Mr. Lincoln was not himself with this colored woman. He had no funny story for her; he called her Aunty, as he would his washwoman, and when she complimented him as the first Antislavery president, he said, "I'm not an Abolitionist. I would not free one slave if I could save the Union in any other way. I'm obliged to do it." I said to my friend, "We must not detain the president; others are in waiting. Are you ready?" and saying good-bye, I had just reached the door when Mr. Lincoln said very earnestly: "Mrs. Colman, won't you come back? Walk in here and take a seat," opening the door of the railing that separated him from his callers. I went back, took the seat, and by Mr. Lincoln's request read the letter which the colored woman who had gone into the room with me had presented. It was from the wife of a colored soldier, then "at the front," who was to be put out of the house she occupied the next day for non-payment of rent. She was sick in bed; the husband had been in the service over ten months, never having received one month's pay.

Judicial Folly.

I had been thinking for twenty years past that New Jersey had greater fools in church and state than any other state in the Union; but your legislature, by adding the word "disgusting" to the amendment of the villainous and foolish Comstock law, hav proved themselvs the biggest fools in the nation.

To me the book called God's holy word contains hundreds of passages so disgusting that no money would hire me to read it to a company of decent young people.

A returned missionary called at my office fifty years ago to beg money to send the Bible to the heathen. He told me the price of a missionary Bible, and said if I had but one cent that I could giv, that cent might make out just enough to pay for one more Bible, and that Bible might be the means of saving at least one more soul; and if I withheld that cent the soul would be lost, and I would hav to answer for it in the great judgment. I told him the Bible was the worst book he could put into the hands of anyone unless he could teach them that it was the work of ignorant men, having no more divine authority than "Gulliver's Travels;" but offered to giv him $10 if he would read in his next meeting ten verses from his holy book, and leave it without note or comment—not tell why he read it—but he would not do it. In an unbiased court the Bible would at once be condemned as "disgusting" to thousands, and almost every book in the world contains something disgusting to some one. The Catholic doctrin is disgusting to Protestants, and the Protestant doctrin is disgusting to the Catholics. Infidelity, or Liberalism, is disgusting to Christians. And so with all the various sects, and no man nor woman could express his or her honest sentiment on religion without saying something disgusting to those of other sects; and who is to decide what is disgusting? Why, the bigoted justices and jurors.

Comstock has now got power in New York to fine or imprison any man, woman, and child, and to stop every paper, book, or picture he pleases. I hav a leather button I would like to tack up over the speaker's desk in the New York state house to express my high or low appreciation of their wisdom or folly. I suppose if you publish this, Comstock will think it very disgusting and will be after me, but I am ready for him. I hav not been fighting the battle of mental liberty more than sixty years for nothing. Amen. Selah! J. HACKER.

A Scientific "Religion."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 16th we shall begin the publication of a series of papers which we know will be most favorably received by the Freethinkers of the country—a series written specially for our columns by Prof. Felix L. Oswald. Professor Oswald's book, "The Secret of the East," has made him known to the Liberals of the country, and his contributions to the Popular Science Monthly, the North American Review, the Forum, etc., hav made him a solid reputation as a scientific thinker. He is also author of the following books published by Appleton and Lippincott: Physical Education, Summerland Sketches, Zoölogical Sketches, Household Remedies, and the Poison Problem.

The title of the series which we shall publish is, "The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism. A Contribution to the Religion of the Future." The purpose of the papers is to demonstrate the natural basis of ethics, and to expose the immoral tendency of the Christian religion in many of its tenets, such as the natural depravity dogma, tending to the suppression of normal instincts; the alleged sinfulness of unbelief, suppressing the spirit of free inquiry; the imaginary duty of blind submission to established authorities, fostering flunkeyism and mental prostitution; and other-worldliness, which encourages the neglect of this world's interests and duties. Against these Christian teachings, so detrimental to humanity, will be set in contrast the safe standards of natural religion, by showing the identity of duty and inclination in normal specimens of our race—adducing the health-protecting instincts of young children, their love of physical exercise, their candor, their inquisitivness—all suppressed by the preposterous methods of our parsonage-plan of education.

Each chapter will be devoted to some special maxim of a code embodying the condition of earthly happiness: health, freedom, truth, order, justice, prudence, self-reliance, knowledge, industry, etc. These papers are replete with anecdote and illustrations from history and the customs of foreign nations, and the author proves his positions by facts. To the critics of Liberalism who ask, "If you explode their nonsense, what are you going to put in its place?" this series will be a complete answer. The papers will continue for several months.

We would respectfully suggest that Liberals make extra effort to induce their Christian friends to read this series, and become converts to The Religion of the Future.

The Missouri Church Scandal.

Bishop Hogan's exposure of the immoral character of some thirty priests in his (Kansas City, Mo.) diocese is causing great scandal in the church. A priest interviewed upon the subject said that Bishop Hogan would be forced to choose between resigning and being arraigned before the pope for violation of "a cardinal rule of the church." On being asked what cardinal rule the bishop had violated, the priest replied: "He is guilty of a betrayal of official secrets. He has wittingly or unwittingly been the greatest enemy of his own church by letting matters get abroad that must injure the church. Great dissatisfaction exists in the diocese, and the case will be carried direct to Rome unless Bishop Hogan resigns. He has violated the church injunction of secrecy in all such matters."

This is about the most significant feature connected with the whole affair. It has long been a matter of public notoriety that priests are immoral. Now it transpires that if a bishop knows of scandal in his diocese, he is to conceal it from the outside world; and the interesting inquiry is at once raised how far his duty extends in the case of crimes committed to his knowledge. Must theft, arson, or murder also be concealed?

All the evidence that comes to the light goes to show that, besides other things, the Catholic church is a vast conspiracy among a lot of hypocrits to cover up one another's villainies.

Firstly and Secondly.

In the last days of June we received the subjoined circular from the American Institute of Civics, with the request to publish, together with such editorial comments as might be proper:

"TO THE EDITOR: On behalf of the American Institute of Civics, and in furtherance of its purposes, which are to promote, through the agency of the school, the press, the pulpit, and otherwise, the conditions essential to good citizenship and good government, it is respectfully suggested that on the Sunday preceding the coming anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, Christian ministers of all denominations, so far as possible, shall giv special attention in their services for the day to the following topics, viz.: 'The influence of the church as related to integrity in citizenship, and the duty of Christian men as citizens.'

"In presenting this suggestion, it is proper to say that the Institute of Civics represents no party or creed in politics or religion; that its sole purpose is to aid, as above indicated, in the promotion of integrity, intelligence, and patriotism, as essential qualifications for the right use of the suffrage; and that it is on this ground that it confidently seeks the cooperation of the pulpit, in the belief that, by united efforts, and without the introduction of controversial questions related to party politics, it may exert a more powerful influence in the formation of the individual convictions which determin the character and influence the action of American citizens.

"Printed matter, which will be of interest to clergymen disposed to adopt the suggestions made, will be sent free upon application. Respectfully,

"HENRY RANDALL WAITE, President."

The American Institute of Civics is an association heavily officered by a United States Supreme Court chief justice and a number of gentlemen whose titles would fill several lines, though of what its membership consists we do not know. This turning to the pulpit for aid, however, indicates either a lack of common sense or a purpose to build an aristocracy of pedantry and puritanism.

In the first place, the proposition or subject put forth smacks of intolerance. Why differentiate Americans into sects before asking what their duty is as citizens? What responsibility has a Christian man more than an Infidel man? The manner of phrasing this subject looks as though the Institute of Civics is endeavoring to giv the Christians a chance to repass the resolution that the earth and the fulness thereof belong to the Lord and his saints, and that the present church-members are the saints.

The subject, as the minister would say, consists of Firstly and Secondly. The firstly is, The influence of the church as related to integrity in citizenship. It is a fruitful theme, and all bad fruit at that. Church influence, so far as it affects a citizen's actions, does not conduce to integrity. On the contrary, it destroys honesty, justice, and equality. It is the influence of the church that has placed upon the statute books of so many states the infamous blasphemy laws, the unjust taxation laws, and the tyrannous Sunday laws. It is the influence of the church that makes men steal from state treasuries to support their religion; that has made them deprive their fellow-men of civil rights because of different religious opinions; that makes them force upon our public schools a book filled with the most immoral and improbable of stories. It is the influence of the church that induces our legislatures to violate the Constitution by hiring hypocrits to pray in senates and lower houses, in the army and navy, and at nearly all government institutions. It is the influence of the church that has pushed men on to commit the greatest outrages upon liberty; the grossest violations of individual rights, and the most monstrous crimes against humanity. It was the influence of the church that robbed the American Indians of their land, without recompense; that made New England a prison-house for body as well as mind; that drove good men into a wilderness to starve, and stripped virtuous women and tied them to carts to be whipped. It was the influence of the church "as related to integrity in citizenship" that incestuously joined the church to the state and robbed all men alike to feed the magistrate-ministers who fattened on the poverty of the early American settlers. It was the influence of the church that enacted the colonial laws that are now a butt of ridicule for their imbecility and the wonder of the civilized world for their ferocity. It has been the influence of the church through all the decades since that has perpetrated the cruelest acts in America's history. As it was the church that hanged witches, so it is the church that imprisons men for not committing the crime of hypocrisy. It was the influence of the church, "as related to integrity in citizenship," that put Abner Kneeland in jail, and tried to keep its record good with C. B. Reynolds. It was the influence of the church that kept millions of human beings in chattel slavery, and it was the same influence which mobbed and murdered the heroic Abolitionists. It is the influence of the church upon American citizens that keeps a sensual priesthood in power, that stifles every effort for progress, that robs the people of their rights, and perpetuates the hugest system of imposture that ever fed and fattened upon the ignorance of the human race.

As related to integrity in citizenship the influence of the church is unmitigatedly bad. No class of men produces proportionately so many criminals as the leaders of the church—the men set apart for their superior sanctity—the ministers. No other body of men numbers so many hypocrits as the church. It has got so now that the most pious are the most suspected; the loudest shouters in meeting are required to pay cash in advance on their purchases; and the longest faces are given the shortest credits. When a trusted clerk or a bank official defaults, the first question is, What Sunday-school was he superintendent of? When one woman's husband and another man's wife are missing, everybody asks, What church did they attend? When scandal touches a woman, the neighbors look askance at her pastor or her favorit deacon.

An honest, zealous, and virtuous Christian is looked upon as a little weak in the head. John Knox, and John Calvin, and John Wesley would be sat down upon hard by the nineteenth-century people outside of the church. Jonathan Edwards, dear old soul, would be called crazy. A tract pedler is looked upon as a bore, if he is not handed over to the police as a sneak-thief in disguise. The Salvation Army, the most earnest of all Christians, are classed with circuses. As related to integrity in citizenship, the influence of the church is directly the opposit of good. It is both infamous and ridiculous.

Secondly. The duty of Christian men as citizens is to reform. Reformation by the wholesale would be the most becoming to them of any duty. They should reform their laws, their morals, and their actions. Some one—was it Colonel Ingersoll?—said that the only good laws passed nowadays are those laws which repeal other laws. In this direction there is a world-wide space in which the church can do good. Let the influence of the church procure the repeal of those laws which the influence of the church has had enacted. The duty of Christian men as citizens is to be honest—to giv to others every right they claim for themselvs—and to stop tyrannizing over their fellows. The duty of Christian men is to be less arrogant, less puritanical, less cruel, less anxious to control other folks. This is not a government of Christians, for Christians, and by Christians. That kind of a government was begun here, but they fought so savagely that Infidels like Thomas Jefferson had to reconstruct the Union to make possible the realization of the dream of Americans—the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

It is the duty of Christian men as citizens, and especially Christian ministers, to be virtuous in their relations to single women and other men's wives. This sort of reform should begin in the pastor's study and the pulpit, go down the aisles where the deacons sit, up to the gallery, and invade the choristers' seats. It should be taken into the Sunday-schools, and welcomed at the church festivals. It should accompany the pastor on his calls, and the sisters in all their goings and comings. And when this reform is accomplished, the next duty of the Christian citizen is to stay in the United States and not go to Canada. Let the churches be purged of hypocrits and time-servers, of pious frauds, and psalm-singing mercantil thieves. Let the gossips' noses be shortened and their tongues silenced. Stop the gambling at church fairs, and the robbery of poverty at the church doors. Then discharge the ministers and do your guessing for yourself.

These are a few of the duties of Christian men as citizens; when they are performed the influence of the church in relation to integrity will not be such an utterly absurd subject of discussion as it is at present.

An International Freethought Congress.

We gladly comply with the request contained in the following letter from Mr. Bradlaugh:

" 20 CIRCUS ROAD, ST. JOHN'S WOOD, N. W.,
" LONDON, June 14, 1887.

" TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I should be obliged if you would giv the widest publicity to the annexed invitation. I should be also very much pleased to send you special invitations to any American Freethinkers whose names and addresses you might furnish to me.

" Yours sincerely, C. BRADLAUGH."

Following is the invitation:

" INTERNATIONAL FREETHOUGHT CONGRESS, 1887.

" By the authority of the Council General of the International Federation of Freethinkers, under the auspices of the National Secular Society (of which I am president), and with the approval and confirmation of the Freethinkers of Great Britain and Ireland in conference at Rochdale assembled, I most earnestly invite you to attend the sittings of the International Freethought Congress, to be held in the Hall of Science, 142 Old street, E.C., London, at 10:30 A.M., on Saturday, September 10th; at 11:15 A.M., on Sunday, September 11th, and at 10:30 A.M., on Monday, September 12th.

" Your early reply will be esteemed a favor.

" CHARLES BRADLAUGH."

Different Accounts.

" In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

"The earth has been brought to its present condition through a series of changes or progressiv formations. It has passed through a regular course of history or growth. There must hav been a first era, in which the earth was a globe of molten rock; a second era, in which cooling went forward until the exterior became solid from cooling; a third era carrying forward the cooling to a temperature admitting the existence of the simplest forms of life; a fourth era commencing with the beginning of life on the globe."

" And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament. And God called the dry land earth, and the waters called he seas."

"Depressions for special oceanic basins would hav been early begun in the second era over the cooling and contracting sphere; and it is probable that the existing continental areas were defined in general contour in this first-formed crust, and that within their confines appeared the first dry land. This crust has since continued cooling and thickening. The hot and acid waters of the condensing vapors and the first oceans began the work of surface erosion and alteration, and of transportation and deposition."

"And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night."

"The sun has been losing heat by radiation through all time."

"The moon is a satellite of the earth, and is illumined by the rays of the sun."

"And the evening and the morning were the fourth day."

"The earth could no more hav existed before the sun, or our planetary system before the universe of which it is a part, than the hand before the body which it obediently attends."

" And God said, Let us make man in our own image, after our likeness. And so God created man in his own image."

"Man was the first being that was not finished on reaching adult growth. Man appeared in the Quaternary age. A skeleton of low grade was found in the small Neanderthal cave. The forehead is low, and the head long; the brow-ridges very prominent, a little ape-like; but the cranial capacity was about seventy-five cubic inches."

" And the earth brought forth grass, and herb, and tree."

"Sea-weeds were the earliest plants of the globe."

"And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air."

"The earliest species of life were aquatic, and all of them marine. The animal kingdom began with Protozoans, then followed Radiates, Mollusks, and water-Articulates; it included fishes, the lower Vertebrates, and Amphibian species. With each period, the progress was upward, toward a fuller and higher display of the system of life."

" And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground."

"Man has developed gradually and step by step out of the lower vertebrates. The human race belongs to the last order of Mammals, and has undoubtedly developed out of a branch of this order."

" The creation of the world occurred about six thousand years ago."

" The earth in cooling must hav taken three hundred and fifty millions of years."

" The Bible is the word of God, and therefore true."

" The Bible account is the work of an intellect wise for its time, but unversed in the depth of science which the future was to reveal."

The source of one of the foregoing accounts of an important occurrence will be readily recognized. The other is the account of science. We put the former in small type as being of less importance.

A Saint in Tribulation.

The Rev. F. M. Todd, of Manassas, Va., is realizing the truth of the prophecy of his divine master, "In the world ye shall hav tribulation." Nine members of his church hav preferred the following charge against him, to wit:

" That on the 24th of May, 1887, he was seen by one Robert Turner in the woods of Mr. Currie, in Prince William county, about two hundred yards from the road, with a lap-robe spread and lying down upon it with a white woman."

The report of the discovery caused a commotion in Manassas, but there were faithful adherents to the pastor who would not believe the darkey's story. A trial of the case was inevitable, and Mr. Todd wanted to hurry it up. So it was given out that the pulpit on the next Sunday would be filled by a noted preacher from Washington. That brought a full house. At the close of the service Pastor Todd announced that at ten o'clock to-morrow morning there would be a meeting of the church, when all persons having any charges to make against him were invited to present them, and that the Rev. Dr. Sunderland, of Washington, was expected to preside at the trial.

Accordingly, at ten o'clock the next morning, the meeting was held, Dr. Sunderland in the chair. But when the accusers of the pastor were asked to present their charges, they refused to recognize the jurisdiction of such a court. Dr. Sunderland ruled that the point was well taken, and the consequence was that the case was referred to the Presbytery.

And now it is on trial in Washington, Dr. Sunderland appearing as counsel for the accused; and some say the selection of counsel is a wise and proper one, because Dr. Sunderland once underwent a similar tribulation.

Three New Pamphlets by Colonel Ingersoll.

We hav put in pamphlet form the last three articles by Colonel Ingersoll that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They are

THE TRUTH OF HISTORY. This is a comment by Colonel Ingersoll upon the religious lies that hav been told about himself, and first made its appearance in these columns.

BIBLE IDOLATRY. A letter Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the editor of the London Secular Review.

INGERSOLL ON MCGLYNN. Being the comments and opinions of Mr. Ingersoll upon the fight in the Catholic church between the late pastor of St. Stephen's and his employer, the pope.

The price of each of these little pamphlets is three cents; per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $2.

Editorial Notes.

IT is reported in the daily papers that Governor Hill has signed the Disgusting Literature bill. If this new law is impartially enforced, let the Christian journals, the Police Gazette, the American Tract Society, the publishers of dime novels, and the Bible House crowd look out. The Christian at Work's editorial commendations of patent medicins, also, will hav to be toned down.

A CHRISTIAN journal derives great satisfaction from the statistics of church building, which show an increase of ten a day. " In view of this deeply significant fact," it says, " we may assuredly anticipate the coming time when every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God the father." Another statistical item going the rounds of the press—probably as true as the church figures—is that saloons are increasing at the rate of forty a day. Shall we conclude from this that we may anticipate a time when every knee shall wobble and every tongue get thick acknowledging that lager beer is lord, to the glory of whisky, the father of intoxicants?

THE Cœur d'Alene mines in Idaho were first made known to the public through THE TRUTH SEEKER. A great many people crowded there, found no gold, and denounced the men who discovered the mines. Frank Reed, one of our subscribers, owns the Jim Blaine mine, in Dream Gulch, and has just refused an offer of $100,000 for it. He says he won't sell to a psalm-singer anyway, at any price.

QUEEN VICTORIA has addressed a letter of thanks to her beloved subjects for the enthusiasm they showed in celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of her reign. Of the jubilee she says:

" It has shown that the labor and anxiety of fifty long years, twenty-two of which were spent in untroubled happiness, shared and cheered by my beloved husband, and while an equal number were full of sorrows and trials borne without his sheltering arm and wise help, hav been appreciated by my people."

The construction of this sentence shows that while the sun may always shine when Victoria comes out in person, it is sometimes foggy when she appears in print.

THIS is the deep and satisfying argument for the trinity used by William R. Huntington, rector of Grace church, New York:

" Of the threefold personality inherent in that eternal one, we are given a hint in the form of the ascription under which he is addressed. 'Holy, holy, holy,' is the cry of those about the throne, 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come.'"

Because the crazy man who wrote Revelation said " holy " three times there are three persons rolled into one in the Lord! If driveling idiocy can go further than that, we do not want to see it.

ONE plank in the Union Labor party's platform is as follows:

" As the continued prosperity of the community depends upon the physical as well as mental condition of the growing generation we demand that our young men shall be allowed to practice base ball, boating, dancing, music, and other athletic sports and amusements without let or hindrance by law, provided it is done without interference with the rights of other citizens."

None of these amusements being prohibited on other days, this plank is thought to hav reference to Sunday base ball. Another plank says:

"We believe that a protectiv tariff for the benefit of American manufacturers and manufactures is the corner-stone of the prosperity of the nation."

Concerning which latter declaration of faith there is room for a wide difference of opinion.

NEW JERSEY nowadays furnishes some queer samples of religious people, but perhaps no more than might be expected when it is considered that they spring from ancestors as ignorant as the writer of the following ordination paper:

" In the Name of almighty God

" To whome it may concarn: the barer hereof Noble W Thomas is Premited to Preach The Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ In the Methodist E Church

" Being Exsamned and approved of at a Quartermeet held at the Branch—Freehold and Trenton Circit

" Sign in the Name and behalf of the Conference

" Solomon Sharp
" October the 30 1802 President of the " Methodist E Church
" in the State of
" New Jersey"

There is very little about ancient Methodists to boast of, and the present members of that sect are worthy descendants of them.

THE Christian at Work, good orthodox paper that it is, is shocked. It says:

"The name of almighty God is being dragged into politics in a way that is as blasphemous as it is distressing. Thus a speaker at a temperance meeting in Detroit the other day declared, 'God is a Prohibitionist,' and a certain A. A. Carleton, a member of the general executiv board of the Knights of Labor, in a speech delivered on Sunday evening at the Knights of Labor hall in Sixth avenue in Pittsburgh, is reported as saying, 'Christ himself, when he preached his Sermon on the Mount, was the first Knight of Labor.' Grossly irreverent and blasphemous as these declarations sound, they indicate a tendency on the part of the ignorant and irreverent to speak for Providence. The utterances may not be intended as irreverent, but they are so. These cranks, demagogs, theorists in a small way, who assume to quote God's views on economic questions, should be suppressed. Two of them in sixty millions of population are exactly two too many."

Did the editor of the Christian at Work reflect, when he penned this rebuke, that there are about eighty thousand ministers in this country, every mother's son of whom can tell us all about the will of God—what it is on any given subject, and just what will happen to anyone who does not obey it? These ministers all speak for Providence, and are terribly familiar with his ways and will. And we hav even read in the Christian at Work very dogmatic statements of what God wants or does not want. Why, then, should not the followers of Henry George and Dr. McGlynn be allowed to put in their little guess? Their right is as good as that of any minister or pious editor, and they know just as much about it as anybody.

WATSON HESTON recently journeyed from Carthage to Joplin, Mo., to hear J. E. Remsburg.

W. S. BELL'S lecture engagements are as follows: Creston, Iowa, July 17th; Herman, Neb., 21st; Stanton, Neb., 23d, 24th; Burnett, Neb., 25th; Clearwater, Neb., 26th; David City, Neb., 30th; Osceola, Neb., August 2d, 3d; Seward, Neb., 4th, 5th, 6th; Lowell, Neb., 8th, 9th, 10th; Plum Creek, Neb., 12th; Fairbury, Neb., 15th, 16th, 17th; Salem, Neb., 19th, 20th, 21st; Palmyra, 22d.

Letters from Friends.

NEWPORT, ME., June 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As one who is as interested in the prosperity of your paper as anyone in the world, I earnestly protest against the waste of so much valuable space as D. Louis Bodge has on a subject he has made "as clear as mud." Who can tell what his thirty-eight lines of nonsense mean? Every word of the two columns is so much space wasted.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

FT. SULLY, D. T., June 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2—$1 to be applied for the defense of Elmina D. Slenker; the other dollar for C. B. Reynolds's Tent fund, if you will be so kind as to receive funds for our champions. If the Christian fanatics succeed in chopping off the heads of our leaders, that will encourage them to attack the rank and file. Now is the time to step to the front with substantial aid. J. C. BLAISDELL.

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., June 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, to be applied as directed. THE TRUTH SEEKER suits me very well, all except the ridicule department. This I think will do no good, as it is put on now. Those cartoons may take with a few, but I humbly think it lacks dignity. The cause we are advocating is a tremendous one, and our efforts should be in such a direction as not to excite anyone's disgust by want of (excuse the term) dignity and solidity. Remember, my dear sir, THE TRUTH SEEKER is our standard and leader in Freethought.

GEO. A. CROOM.

EDGAR, NEB., June 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose a draft of $3 for the Elmina Defense Fund. The money has been subscribed as follows: J. W. VanBrunt, 50 cents; J. Branstitre, 50 cents; Nathan Ong, 50 cents; J. P. Nelson, 50 cents; T. B. McClellan, 50 cents; T. E. Casterline, 50 cents.

We send the amount, though small, hoping that every Liberal will do likewise, believing, though "Elmina is a crank on the subject of heredity," that she is honest in her motivs, and the true friend of humanity.

Respectfully, T. E. CASTERLINE.

HEBER CITY, June 2, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading your issue of May 28th, and must say I think your contributions are getting better every issue. I miss Peck's "Christian Absurdities," and along comes "Tales Told Out of School," and as the saying is, "It makes me laugh when I don't feel well."

Putnam's "News and Notes" are splendid. I was surprised and pained to read the account of his narrow escape in Ukiah. I hav had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Putnam lecture, and although a man might differ from him in opinion, his bearing is such as I think ought to entitle him to the respect of every honest man and woman; but as long as there is one true follower of the meek and lowly a person is not safe in advocating free speech. Hoping you may liv long to carry on the good work, I remain, Yours for universal mental liberty, ANDREW LINDSAY.

NEWTON, MONT., June 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I consider your paper the best I ever saw. There are a good many Freethinkers here, but they are drones, as I call them. They don't take much interest in knowledge. I hav tried to get them to subscribe for your paper, but hav not got any yet, though I think I will. I shall continue to try. I was trying the other day, and in the mean time I asked an orthodox lady if she ever got an answer to prayer, and she said she did. She then gave me a sample, and here it is. She said her son, ten years of age, was thrown off a horse and nearly killed, and she prayed two days for God to make him whole, but he did not, so she and all the church-members prayed for God to take him away from earth, and her prayer was answered "Now," said she, "would you take away my only hope?" I said, "No, not if you can get consolation out of that answer to prayer." F. H. LOVERING.

OSHKOSH, WIS., June 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for one more year's subscription to the best paper in the world, commonly called THE TRUTH SEEKER. Perhaps I may liv that long; if not, my wife will appreciate it for my sake, if nothing more. I wish to send my regards to the person who sympathized with God so much; also to Si Slokum, Parson Jones, John Peck, and others who hav afforded me so much comfort in reading their contributions. I went to the Methodist church a few weeks ago, and caught them taking lunch, consisting of the body and blood of Christ, but as they knew I was not a cannibal they did not offer me any. But when the meeting was nearly over, the bishop came to me and asked me how I did. I told him I was pretty well for a man of my age and disabilities. "Are you a Christian?" said he. "No, sir," said I. "Do you come here often?" said he. "Yes, sir, I often drop in here to see what is going on, as it is near my house," said I. "Well, what do you think of Christianity?" said he. "I look upon it as a species of mild insanity," said I, "for a person can be perfectly sane on all subjects but one, and be insane on that one." "Well, what do you think of the Bible?" said he. "There are a great many good things in the Bible," said I, "but whatever there is good in it was stolen from the pagans, and does not belong to Christianity; but, taking it as a whole, I cannot indorse it. And since I hav been sitting here, I hav been pondering over what you said in the Lord's Prayer. When you said the Lord's Prayer you were praying to God, were you not?" "Yes," said he. "You believe he is a good God, do you not?" "Yes," said he. "Then why did you say to him, 'Lead us not into temptation?' for if he is a good God he would not do it, if you said nothing about it." "Well," said he, "some people construe things different from others." "But," said I, "that is in very plain language, and cannot be misconstrued, and if he is a good God, those words are very much out of place." Then he left me in quite a hurry.

My paper comes regularly, and I enjoy it immensely. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER. GEO. M. HARE.

——, O., June 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In the case of Mrs. Slenker I believe it to be religious persecution. I believe she has the good of humanity at heart. She is a storehouse of information, and she is ever ready to giv it to the most humble without money and without price; and if she has to go to prison let us try and make her stay as pleasant as the case will admit. My heart is big, but my purse is small. What money I hav is made by working hard for about sixteen hours a day, excepting Sundays, when six hours will answer. I am a farmer. Milking and churning, and all other chores, hav to be done on Sundays the same as other days, and it is often the case that odd jobs in the rush of work run over till Sunday. This Sunday morning I was up before the sun, and out in the potato-patch applying Paris green to the plants to kill the bugs. God sends the bugs to destroy the potatoes. He never did like vegetables; probably you remember how mad he was at Cain for presenting his vegetables. But the Paris green is more than a match for him; it lays them out by the millions.

I am almost sixty years old. After following a fast horse all day, cultivating corn, I can hardly drag one foot after the other. Thus you see that what little money I hav comes by the hardest work, but for all that I hav inclosed $5 in a letter to send to Mrs. Slenker. I hope every Liberal in the country will do the same. Let us show our liberality. B. M.

NEW YORK, June 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: G. N. Hill writes, June 18th, as follows: "And as 287 years added to 1600 A.D. make 1887 years, as all can see, therefore no just complaint can be found," etc. He started the calendar from the early part of 1600. In the Investigator of July 18, 1883, he wrote that he began the calendar with the first day of January, 1600. It is evident that G. N. Hill has not learned anything since then. Now, it is true that 287 added to 1600 makes 1887, but can he not see that the year 1600 is not included in the 287 years? And that as he started with and from the 1st of January, 1600, he is therefore a year ahead in his reckoning? He wrote to me, as I can show, that the year 1600 belongs to the seventeenth century, and as he still persists in his perverseness, all virtue in patience will come to an end. Let Brother Wakeman come to G. N. Hill's aid, "gloriously, grandly," and put himself on record too.

I will hereby renew my former offer to G. N. Hill, or to anyone else, to wager $25 or more, the loser to pay it to the Liberal cause, that, starting with and from the 1st day of January, 1600, is to count now 1888; any editor of a reputable daily paper, or our famed lawyer, R. G. Ingersoll, to decide the case. This dispute about the era concerns a gross error of fact, which is reason enough to condemn it at once. Besides, there has never been given one good reason. Not one can be named in its favor, but there are a great many against it. FREDK. KOEZLY.

OVERTON, GA., June 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Though not a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER (I reside with my father, who has taken it since its first publication), I read it regularly, and think it by far the most truly progressiv of the Liberal papers I hav seen. Some editors seem to think that the addition of every new ism to their banner constitutes Liberalism. Your plan seems to be to investigate all, and adopt only those which lie on the true road to progress. "Be sure you're right, then go ahead," is your motto, I think.

Aggressiv Christianity, as well as aggressiv Liberalism, seems to be more rife in the North than in the "pious" South, as your correspondents will hav us. Our churches are filled as usual with women and children, and a few men who never read nor think of the Bible. Our preachers are as a rule a dull, stupid set of men. Of those I know, I can call to mind only one who seems to labor for the good of his hearers. His sermons are utterly devoid of cant, but rather plain lectures on morality and business habits. A good many of our ministers are shrewd, money-making men, who scruple not to coin filthy lucre on the Lord's day.

Georgia has a few odious religious laws, but has not yet caught up with New Jersey. Church property is not taxed, and priests are exempt from poll-tax and county duties. Although the subject is not being agitated, I am confident that the sentiment of the majority is against these disgraceful laws, and they will probably be repealed within a few years.

It pains me greatly to see you publish so much reflecting on our people, both as to their ante-bellum and post-bellum habits. I cannot see that the cause of true Liberalism is thereby benefited. If it be true, as most Northerners seem to think, that we are all villains, 'tis passing strange that our criminal records do not show it. Now, I ask you in all seriousness, suppose some "respectable" old Southern lady in her dotage were to write for THE TRUTH SEEKER a series of reminiscences, characterizing all Northerners as miserable scoundrels, would you publish her effusions? You ought not to, and you would not. Yet from such a Northern lady you print such articles, though I am happy to see that they are of so contradictory a nature that no sane man can believe them. Think of a blacksmith welding an iron band (white hot, of course) around a negro's neck! Anyone who can swallow this for breakfast can digest the Hebrew children at noon, and gormandize on an everlasting hell the following evening. Whether African slavery was right or wrong, the question has been settled for over twenty-two years by brute force, and I do not see how it can do any good to revive the subject now, especially if falsehoods are brought into play. As I glance through your paper, I can not help but think how free its otherwise fair pages would be from foul stains if a few more of John Brown's co-partners in treason had been hanged with him.

I merely refer to these pieces because they are perhaps more bitter than any other which you hav recently published. In a spirit of fairness, I ask you to publish this letter in order to let it be known that you hav at least one reader who occasionally gets tired of reading malignant vituperations of his state, his parents, and himself.

Yours for true progress, B. B. BELL.

BRADFORD, PA., June 15, 287.

MR. EDITOR: For several years I bought two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and after reading gave them to friends. Find inclosed $3, and put me down for thirty years. I am only seventy, young and healthy. I hope to liv to see the revolution commenced in '76 completed. Our ancestors broke the chains of a tyrant, but we are now struggling to sever the liuks of mental slavery, and for intellectual liberty. I must hav THE TRUTH SEEKER under any circumstances. I can't well exist without it. I read the letters with much interest, and I often look for contributions from Peck and Kelso. I feel like expressing my thoughts, but the Liberal subject, so vital to our happiness, is so vast I am at a loss to know where to begin or end.

I enjoy the cartoons hugely. They blossom with the pictures of truth. I feel disappointed in not getting the argument in the blasphemy case. The colonel is certainly the greatest living orator of this age. How true when speaking he always says something!

The hotel-keepers of New York hav a realizing sense of their rights. A guest in a hotel any day should enjoy every privilege, as though living in his cottage. Why not? And who shall dictate to us what we shall eat and drink when in pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness? When the time comes that a big, nasty man, armed with a club, puts his nose into the goblet of my friend with a flourish of legal authority to see whether he drinks wine or sarsaparilla, I wish to die.

I wish to say there are in this city many good and true Liberals, and many more scattered throughout McKean county. They are earnest Freethinkers, but they are lazily satisfied. Tell me how we can create enthusiasm among them. If worth a million, I would giv one-half to aid universal freedom and liberty of the mind, if I could convince the world that this is the time and place to be happy.

Find $2 more. Send anything you please for distribution.

Sincerely, O. H. WHEELER.

AXTELL, KAN., June 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I received three circulars from the Defense Association, and posted one, with clipping from Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, in our post-office, with the notice that I would receive and forward their contributions, signing my name, and posted the others in stores. I had already sent $1 to "Aunt" Elmina, and you know that $1 is harder for me to spare than hundreds from others that read your paper. I am not done yet. I am getting people to read Mrs. Slenker's works, and will see that she gets more money. All of our Liberals here are shocked, surprised, and hurt over her arrest. Where is this arresting business to end? Elmina, as I understand, is an opponent of free love, a true Liberal, and an earnest laborer in the field of true reform. She probably did what I would not, but she has far more ability than I, and if I should ever rise to her level, which is very doubtful, I might do just as she did. I and, in fact, most Liberals are sectarian, and would much rather our leaders would leave the sex question to those that are not prominent with us, but if anyone is persecuted for their efforts in scientific research, it is our duty as Liberals to help them. We do not know how soon any of us may be arrested for Anarchy, and tried for blasphemy, or arrested for obscenity and tried for Infidelity. It is getting to be a very grave matter when our secretary is assaulted by throwing at him a lighted lamp by a "respectable" member of society, and when all of the power and genius of Ingersoll cannot prevent a verdict of guilty for blasphemy, and when a lady of more purity than all of the orthodox churches in this land ever possessed is hunted down, and her good name, her happiness, and her liberty taken from her.

We of the Axtell Liberal Union talk of putting up an ice cream and lemonade stand on the Fourth, and giving to all that are approachable a badge of red, white, and blue, with our trinity, Axtell Liberal Union, and hoist the stars and stripes with a streamer containing our motto, "Universal Mental Liberty;" and each one is to be a committee of one to secure recruits to sign our constitution and read and subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. We think a barrel of lemonade given away will giv us more popularity, and power, and good fellowship than to hire the best lecturer in the field for one hundred lectures. I recommend all Liberal societies to try it. Five hundred persons in a crowd of twelve hundred with a badge on with the words, "Axtell Liberal Union," will show our editors and the sky-pilots that we are not to be spit upon with impunity. We will then be so we can demand that a tribute to Thomas Paine must be on the program in the future. Most people say I am too outspoken. I cannot help it. I am honest; I am sincere. I would rather hav the open hatred of the enemies of reason than to fondle around and hav no true, warm friends. I hav one faculty, however, that is to my benefit. I make them laugh. A smile doesn't answer me. I like a good, hearty laugh, and in our "literaries" they are so used to it that they often commence when I arise. We should all learn that "vinegar will not catch flies." We hav sixty Farmers

Alliances in this (Marshall) county. I hope that Comstock will arrest the publishers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Boston Investigator now. It will be the grandest boom for free speech that was ever heard of. E. W. MINER.

ST. ANTHONY, IA., June 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I send you the names of some Liberals, to whom please send your valuable paper.

It just happened by chance that I saw your paper and subscribed. I would not be without it for double its price. It voices my sentiments to a dot. I think well of the cartoons—think it is good work in the right place.

I should like to hear from you longer and stronger on the public school question. We need no dogma or superstition taught the young. Text-books need a reform, especially primary readers and histories. I am a teacher in the public schools, and hav long noticed and fought the tendencies of text-books to develop religion and politics. It is a paramount question to Liberals that school books should be free from all religious superstitions. Teachers in this state are prohibited by law from teaching religion. Still it is done. Reading the Bible, praying, singing hymns, etc., are carried on by some teachers.

Two years ago, when I accepted my present position, I found that Bible-reading, etc., had been practiced by my predecessors, and some dissatisfaction was expressed at first when it was discontinued, but a ten-minutes' talk on some scientific subject soon filled the requirements, and to-day neither students nor patrons would hav us fall into the old line again. J. F. REED.

LATHROP, Mo., June 6, 287.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav quit Hamilton I therefore request you to please send my paper to the above address and oblige. Now I wish also to i m you that this is one of the most godly little cities I ever struck, having a population of about 1,500,six great joss-houses,and a corresponding number of long-faced gospel-cardrivers, sky-pilots, spook-dealers, etc., and variously designated (by the faithful) as priests, preachers, and true servants of the Lord, etc., and not an Infidel in the place, that I know of, excepting myself. Therefore I think I am justly entitled to the condolence of all liberal-minded men and women, especially the latter, as we are single, of the male gender, and on the market; and we would also solicit the Truth Seeker Company's daily and nightly prayers, i.e., if they should happen to hav on hand any of that commodity, to the throne of grace (humanity) that we may hold out faithful to the end for the cause of the genus homo (not God), to stir up the dry bones of old corrupt orthodoxy, get them to read and subscribe for one of the best papers in the world—THE TRUTH SEEKER—the true saver of mankind. Fraternally yours, LEVI CHUTE.

P.S.—I will inclose $1, for which please send me "Little Lessons for Little Folks," 40 cents; "Two Little Red Mittens," 10 cents; "The Outcast," 30 cents; "The Fathers of Our Republic," 15 cents, and "A Lay Sermon," 5 cents.

L. C.

MCNTPELIER, IND., June 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I feel like praising the cartoons in general, and the picture of Thomas Paine in particular.

I made good use of what Paine had done in his life in reprimanding the editor of a small paper for publishing Talmage's sermon in which he rehashed the miserable lie of Paine's awful death, and compared Colonel Ingersoll, and Infidels in general, with something bad. It just suited me to tell what Paine did that the world now acknowledges as meritorious.

The evolution of human liberty would be an excellent subject for an essay—religious bigotry, tyranny, arrogance, and persecution on the part of those in power, and self-sacrifice, martyrdom, suffering for the sake of truth and justice by the reformer. For instance, the Albigenses were murdered and exiled, John Huss and Jerome of Prague burnt at the stake, and the persecuted Hussites, Taborites, Waldenses, and others made way for Luther's great reformation, denying the supremacy of the pope, claiming the right of private judgment, and building up the creeds and dogmas of Calvinism. Then comes the Quaker and decides that when an apparent contradiction appears in the holy scriptures we should accept the doctrin that givs God the most exalted character; that God is no respecter of persons; that all may be saved by accepting Jesus as the means of redemption, and in church capacity all are equal. Thomas Paine's parents were Friends, and he doubtless was well educated in religious matters, and only had to take a step to be where he was in politics and religion. WILLIAM ALLEN.

FOND DU LAC, WIS., June 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I judge from Mr. Heston's work that he is reading the Bible, and by the time he gets through, and spreads his thoughts as he progresses so that men and women may see as well as read the old history of the human family, many may be prepared to read some paper or article not headed "Christian." A very good man said to me a few days since that he thought the Christian churches had been of some advantage to the human family. I submitted to him a few tests. I referred him to the report of the warden of the Wisconsin state prison for 1879: "Religious instruction. Baptists, 4; Catholics, 44; Campbellites, 1; Christian, 1; Congregationalist, 1; Episcopalian, 1; Lutheran, 18; Methodists, 33; Protestant, 4; Presbyterian, 6; Shakers, 2; Universalists, 1; Unitarian, 2; No religion, 10. Totals: Religious, 120; No religion, 10." For 1880: Protestant, 78; Catholic, 31; Jew, 1; No religion, 11." For 1882: "Protestant, 106; Catholic, 58; No religion, 21." Then I referred him to your report of sixty-two prisons, and he admitted that those reports were stubborn facts, and he had not considered it with these facts in view. Then I referred him to Professor Billings's work of the "Crimes of Preachers," wherein he shows from his list of the crimes of preachers and the census of the United States that the crimes of preachers are nearly five times as many in one thousand as it is in one thousand of the people, the preachers excluded. Then I referred him to the late move on the part of the Episcopal and Catholic churches to destroy our common school system and reduce women to ancient bondage, and I remarked that the only good the human family had ever derived from so-called Christianity was what had been obtained by association, and what little had been got in an educational point after being obliged to do their own sifting, and I thought if all church-members could hav had clear-cut associations, all dogmas and church themes left out, our calendar of crimes would be very much improved. I am glad Mr. Reynolds has got through. DE W. C. PRIEST.

HAVANA, ILL., June 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As I am a regular reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I thought I would contribute a mite to its columns. I am an admirer of your paper, and would not do without it. Myself and partner, Mr. L. P. Weaber, are millers, so we take THE TRUTH SEEKER together. I think Watson Heston can lay Talmage in the shade. Mr. Heston represents the Bible as I understand it by reading the book. But Talmage, and all other sky-pilots, only tell us the good and omit the bad. As I am a Bible reader and church attendant, I know these so-called ministers, or gospel agents, are "choicey" in selecting their texts.

We hav an opportunity of hearing a thin sermon every month. Our minister tries his best to explain the scriptures, but he has only three sermons perfect, viz.: "Baalam and his Inspired Donkey," "The Prodigal Son," and "Christ and him Crucified." No matter where he selects a text, he is certain to hop on one of the subjects named. We hav some fine arguments with the Christians and ex-Christians, and those non-converts who think they will be Christians. I hav read "False Claims," and the Jersey heresy case. Please inform your readers how it is that G. S. Baldwin, the copyrighter, prefaced the blasphemy pamphlet in such a disgusting manner, viz.: "His [Ingersoll's] Client is a Very Foolish Person," "The ex-Clergyman's Ribald Pamphlet," etc. Please correct Mr. G. S. Baldwin's error. As we are Liberals, we think Mr. Balwin is a little orthodox. He certainly gathered up newspaper reports in order to swindle the public. Fearing I am using too much of your space and time, I will close and giv some other contributor room.

J. A. REED.

[Mr. G. S. Baldwin's pamphlet is a spurious version, and we do not understand by what authority he has copyrighted it. The sensational titles were no doubt intended to please the religious public. Being made up of newspaper reports, his pamphlet is beyond question what our correspondent implies—a swindle on the public. We do not know what Mr. Baldwin's religious views are, but his methods would indicate that he is orthodox.—ED. T. S.]

NEW ERA, MICH., June 15, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please tell brother J. R. Perry, of Wilkes Barre, that here is another ten dollars to put with his for a test case, but I want one thousand tens, and that will shake Christian ideas from the base to the capital of this stupendous monument of superstition and ignorance grown arrogant with age. One thousand tens will strike the tap-root—the traditionary pineal gland inside the circle of Willis—and deaden the whole system.

When I want to kill a bear I don't snip a piece off the end of his nose, or jerk out one of his claws, or slice two hairs from the end of his tail. Science (natural) has shown us vital points, and we are not ignorant of the means by which Bruin can, with no danger to ourselvs, be blotted out. Let us (as Liberals intelligently true to our own best interests) act on the offensiv awhile and see how it will work. Stop skirmishing; do as Hood did at Nashville, concentrate our forces, and cut our way through or die. We hav our general and his engineers, and subalterns, Ingersoll, Wakeman, Seaver, Watts, Underwood, Monroe, Slenker, Colman, Stanton, Severance, et al.

Let us put the sinews of war in their hands, and if they prove untrue on all the general ethical principles which concern us (as Freethinkers in all the term means) most, then in committee of the whole let us take a rope and hang them higher than Haman. I hav been so cut up myself for twenty years past—ostracized, my motivs utterly misconstrued, even murder attributed to me (which, however, is the lot of all physicians), and always with Christian bitterness, never by Spiritualists or Freethinkers—that somehow I feel the persecutions of evolutionists more than I would otherwise. Organization is needed, coöperation next, concentration of financial force next, on the powers that be, with a definit understanding from the first that this is no boy's job.

Excuse my vehemence! The old soldier will come up sometimes as of old when I hear the rebel yell as I heard it at Atlanta and Franklin, and other hard-fought battles no more vital in their results and necessities than what we, as Liberals, should fight for to-day. Please tell Mr. Perry I look through the same glasses. JOHN M. LOGAN, M.D.

ST. LOUIS, MO., June 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Often I hav taken the pen and written page after page with the intention of sending it to you for publication, but always found some fault or another and thought it unworthy and uninteresting for the readers of your valuable paper.

First, I would like to ask you or any of the readers to answer me the question: Is it correct that the United States Congress has voted $10,000 for building a Roman Catholic church at Fort Leavenworth? I can't think that the members of this body would nav done an act so contrary to the Constitution. I read this in one of those magnificent and strawheaded-edited Battle Creek baptism papers. Another wonderful publication is the War Cry of the Salvation Army. To save my life I cannot find a sensible passage or sentence from the first to the last words. This army is a company formed out of old minstrel and circus people, together with criminals, drunkards, runaway girls, all too lazy to do anything honest; but cranks won't die out. In my opinion all these saints ought to be brought to the workhouse for ninety days or longer.

St. Louis is a pretty but very dusty city, with some very fine parks, botanical, and zoölogical gardens. The public library contains some extra good books, but the accommodations for strangers are not sufficient. The reading-room is filled with signs prohibiting smoking, talking, and wearing the hat, etc., but, nevertheless, it is a better one than none. Still, I expected more for St. Louis, as the one in Cleveland, O., is much better, in my opinion, and St. Louis has so many more inhabitants than Cleveland. I hav not found out as to whether there is a Secular Union here or not. Never heard anything of it since I hav been here.

Sometime ago I made a trip down South along the grand father of waters, the Mississippi, which I enjoyed very much. I think there is no better way to learn something about the country than a trip along the river. One thing that I noticed which I had not known before was the treatment of the crew of negroes on board of the boat. I hav traveled over parts of Europe, and hav been in many states of the Union; I hav seen people work hard to make a living, but I never saw such an immense amount of labor done in such a short time for such a small pay—$1 per day and living. The first mate would help them—with a club—if they were exhausted and tired. Some of them I saw fall down with cramps, but no pity from the side of the officers. Work, work, and work, or die! At a small place above Cairo about a dozen of them ran away and forfeited the money they were to get.

FRED. L. HOFFMANN.

LOWELL, MASS., June 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We Infidels all hav a work to do, and a work which none can do but ourselvs. It is the elevation of the race, and its complete emancipation from the mental slavery which religion imposes upon its devotees. Superstition is the great bane and curse of this world, overtowering and overtopping all others. Who shall slay the monster? Let each one do his part.

It should be our aim to elevate our own being to a higher plane of physical existence. The moral man, as D'Holbach says, "is nothing more than this physical being considered under a certain point of view; that is to say, with relation to some of his modes of action, arising out of his particular organization." And he defines the physical man "as he who acts by causes our senses make us understand. The moral man is he who acts by physical causes with which our prejudices preclude us from becoming acquainted."

To elevate the race man must study nature, meditate upon her, and conform to her laws. The supernatural, what is it? A chimera, a delusion which for ages has chained the mind of man in slavery; which has caused him to think only in a given rut; to cringe in the dust like a serf before an omnipotent czar; and for his sake to hate wife and children, and to trample under foot the tenderest and sweetest impulses of humanity; to deluge the earth with blood and turn it into a vast charnel-house. Once, aye, and for ages, until Liberalism tore the bloody scepter from its grasp, the Christian church, with fiendish heart and unpitying eye, burnt at the stake myriads of the pure, the brave, the true, nature's noblemen, who dared defy her power and scorn her authority. Liberalism has done its work, but not its perfect work. The snake is only scotched, not killed. Even now she is trying to hunt out a heretic to prosecute for blasphemy! The firebrand is dead, but the infernal spirit which lit it still livs in heart and brain. The hyena is perfectly harmless when caged. We must cage the church.

Now a word as to the every-day duties of Liberals. We should all own a good stock of Liberal books; they are our weapons in debate. They sow the seeds of common sense and reason in the minds of our children, and besides we need them to read ourselvs. The brain must hav mental food. Giv it the right kind, the kind that nature's teachings furnish. Buy the works of Paine, D'Holbach, Ingersoll, Graves, Bennett, etc. Then lend them to your inquiring neighbors, but not, perhaps, to the ultra-orthodox, who would start a bonfire with them, as that would be casting pearls before swine. And every Liberal should take, and pay for promptly, at least one Liberal paper. THE TRUTH SEEKER is worth four times what it costs. Keep it paid for in advance. Bad bills are the rocks on which most Liberal papers are shipwrecked. Organize a Liberal society. Don't say, I can't—there's no such word in the dictionary. United we stand. In union there's strength. Under the term Liberals I include Spiritualists, Materialists, Agnostics, Deists, Atheists, and radical Unitarians. We are all Liberals, or Secularists, if you like that word better. We all stand upon the common platform of Freethought, free speech, and a free press. Our creed is broad, universal mental liberty; we can all stand upon that, too. We are all opposed to sectarianism, superstition, and bigotry, also to priestcraft. Then let us unite, organize, and work for the triumph of the Nine Demands of Liberalism. It is not necessary to hire a hall—meet once a week in each other's parlors. Let half a dozen Liberals get together and elect a chairman, and for one year. Read a lecture to be followed by ten-minute speeches. For singing books the "Truth Seeker Collection," and Kneeland's "National Hymns," are both admirable. We don't want any Methodist religion; but a little of their zeal, well secularized, wouldn't go amiss, brother.

The Constitution of the United States is menaced. Liberty is but a name in New Jersey, in which Christian bigots gag free speech, and where a dozen jackasses, presided over by the "missing link," convict a man of the unmeaning crime of blasphemy. JOSEPH A. WILSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Birds, Berry-beds, and Cats.

The berry-blooms are white as snow,
And corn-field furrows, row on row,
The plowshare turns;
And blackbirds in their friar coats
Hav offered us the shrillest notes
From oh, how many golden throats!
When day returns.

The berry-blooms are falling now,
And birds on every bended bough
This very morn
Sat watching, with their crested heads
Of sober browns or wrathful reds,
Tne changing of the berry-beds
In thievish scorn.

But now the Maltese cat appears,
With half-grown kits—the pretty dears—
All creeping low,
And flying fast across the sward,
Each hungry cat and boasting bird,
Each asking each the self-same word,
"What scared you so?"

Come here, defeated kitty-cats;
Your poor hearts beat such pit-a-pats,
I pity you;
But vanquished birds feel war's fierce stings,
And though you chase the saucy things,
Touch not a one of all their wings,
Black, white, or blue.

Frenchtown, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Mother's Girl.

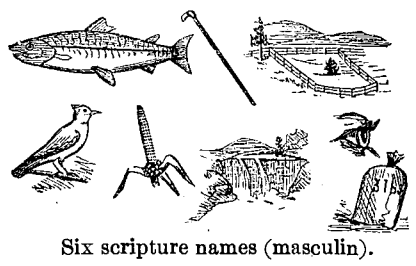
She sits securely by my side,
My bonny little lass.
The world is cold, the world is wide,
I let the cold world pass;
With Mary smiling up at me
I care not what the world may be.

She looks into my faded face,
My bonny little lass,
But does not see the wrinkled place
Where Time's rough footsteps pass;
She measures me by love's own rule,
And thinks "mamma is beautiful."

She asks me many curious things,
My bonny little lass:
"Be angels shaking out their wings?"
She says when snow showers pass.
I kiss her happy face and say,
"Angels hav surely passed this way."

She looks at me with serious eyes,
My bonny little lass;
Right up to mine the sweet thoughts rise
That through her lashes pass.
She pats my cheek, with smile and nod,
And softly asks, "Does you know God?"



And though I cannot answer her,
My bonny little lass,
Queer little questions quaintly stir
The rippling words that pass:
"Is God a Quaker? 'cause, you know,
He thee's and thou's the verses so."

She holds her head against my heart,
My bonny little lass;
Her eyelids droop, her tired lips rest,
Her thoughts to dreamland pass;
While bending down to kiss that curl,
I hear her whisper, "Mother's girl!"

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—REBUS.

Six scripture names (masculin).

2.—CHARADE.

Here is Bunny, and 'tis funny
How the wagging of his jaw
Hid impose his joke on Moses
In the old Levitic law;
And you'll view him if near to him,
While that "chestnut" still he chews,
As he'd scoff at law, God, prophet,
Still defying Jewish stews;
Tho' regarded and recorded
As a ruminant complete,
Yet as proven—hoofs uncloven—
He gets out by four whole feet.

Next I bring you, and I ring you,
For that "chestnut" what I should;
For Lepus, reap us cheap as Nepos—
You don't really chew your cud;
So bring it, spring it, ring it sing it—
Leporin jokes are understood.

Now the whole is just a solace,
Flora's gift of heavenly hue;
Just a token that seems broken
From the vast cerulean blue;
'Tis creation's revelation
Of the beautiful and true.

Correspondence.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., June 21, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Children's Corner. W. S. Bell lectured here last night in the colored schoolhouse. Grandpa and grandma and I went to hear him lecture. He delivered a good lecture. Mr. Bell stayed at our house, and he is awful funny. He has lots of puzzles. He puzzled me with them. I am nine years old. I read in the Fourth Reader. I study spelling, arithmetic, geography. Please, marm, if you think it worth it, publish this.

Yours truly, ARABULA HALL.

P.S.—The pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER make me laugh. That monkey is too funny for anything.

W. SUTTON, June 26, 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CHILDREN'S CORNER: I commend most heartily your invitation to all citizens to unite in making the coming anniversary of our national independence a national gift holiday for the children and youth of our country. It has been the fashion, of late, in some quarters, to attempt to belittle the day, and to talk slightingly of the "stilted oratory," as it was termed, when eloquent men rehearsed the noble deeds wrought by our patriotic grandsires.

That day commemorates an event—and other events sequent thereto—more closely allied to the welfare of the human race than any other human action or event. Let then the patriotic fires of the fathers be rekindled in the hearts of the youth, there to burn with unquenchable ardor until injustice, usurpation, and tyranny shall be swept into an oblivion that knows no resurrection.

J. WATERS.

[The above was received too late for publication last week, but the sentiment and character of the article make good reading all the year round. We would like all who observed our national holiday as a gift-making season to send their names to the Children's Corner for publication, with an account of their proceedings.—ED. C. C.]

A Very Little Flea.

Most of you hav seen fleas, especially you who own a dog, for the common flea is a parasite of the dog.

What is a parasite? Why, it is a creature that livs the whole or a part of its life upon the body of another, and gets all its food from it.

The flea is a very agil animal, dark-brown in color, small, and remarkable for its hopping powers as well as its sharp and nipping bite. It belongs to a class known as the hopping diptera. It has a quick eye, and sees you, when you are hunting for him, before you see him, and with one bound he has evaded your search. As the Irishman said, "When you put your finger on him, he is not there!"

The flea is quite an interesting fellow, and although he is so very little, he can make himself extremely troublesome and annoying. He has a long tongue and a double upper jaw, quite firm and hard, and also a double upper lip. He has three pairs of jointed legs, and long double claws; little rings, ten in number, lap over his body, like scales on a fish. His two hind legs hav several joints, and are so long that he can leap a surprising distance without any seeming effort. His outer case, or covering, is tough and hard. Fleas are quick-witted, and perfect little torments. They are very troublesome to some animals, especially to dogs, as told you in the commencement, but the Dalmatian insect powder will effectually destroy them by being shaken freely upon the animal.

When very plenty they attach themselvs to human beings, and their bite makes a fearful itching sensation. In some countries they abound in great numbers, and bite the people all day and all night—as in Turkey, Germany, Italy, and South America.

The jigger, or sand flea, is another variety found in the sand and abounding near the sea-shore.

"A flea in the ear" is a common expression, and means to hint at something unpleasant, or to put a person on guard against some enemy, or the evil doings of another.

It has been said that the flea could be trained, and that a man once did train some fleas to perform several little tricks. The two tricks with which the people are most familiar, however, are the biting and hopping tricks.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS:—Tell the meaning of parasite. Describe the flea. Name the class it belongs to. Describe the search for one. What peculiarity hav its hind legs? What will destroy them? In what countries do they abound? Is there more than one kind of flea? What is the meaning of "a flea in the ear?" Can the flea be trained? Did you ever see a flea? Does the above sketch agree with your own ideas?

Jokes of the School-room.

A five-year-old boy returned from his first day at school not quite satisfied with his teacher. "Why," he said, "she kept asking questions all the time. She even asked how many two and two are."

This was written on the fly-leaf of a book on moral science: "If there should be another flood, for refuge hither fly; though all the world should be submerged, this book would still be dry."

As an Austin teacher was calling the roll, he had just come to the name of Robert Smith, when Robert threw open the schoolroom door on a run, and called out, "Here!" "Robert," said the teacher, gravely, "you must not answer to your name unless you are here."

"Henry, you are such a bad boy that you are not fit to sit in company of those scholars on the bench. Come up here and sit by me," exclaimed an exasperated teacher.

"Professor," said a graduate, trying to be pathetic at parting, "I am indebted to you for all that I know." "Pray don't mention such a trifle," was the not very flattering reply.

"Now you see how the power is applied in this machine," said the professor, as he started the machine referred to, and added, "It is turned by a crank." Then he wondered why the class smiled.

The youthful idea of school has many illustrations. "Where are you going?" "To school." "What do you go for?" "To wait for school to let out."—Youth's Companion.

Books.

The Tatler is a new periodical published at Indianapolis, of which Margret Holmes, the author of the story—the "Revival"—printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 18th, is the editress. The Tatler is literary, and published to entertain its readers, in which it should succeed, with Margret Holmes as a contributor to its columns. The subscription price is $1.56 a year.

Mr. I. W. Groh does not believe that the God of Israel is the true God, and the Truth Seeker Company has published the reasons for his unbelief in a 25-cent pamphlet. Mr. Groh was early taught, as too many are, that the Bible is the word of God, and in order to understand God's will he became a reader of the book. His reading discovered to him that, so far from being divinely inspired, the Bible is the composition of very fallible men. He still has faith that somewhere in the universe there is an "all-wise creator," and he labors to remove from him, if it shall turn out to be of the masculin gender, the stigma Christians hav attached to him in describing him in the Bible. Mr. Groh begins at the beginning, quoting the first chapters of Genesis, analyzing them, and showing their falseness. In this way, he pursues his subject through to Jesus and Paul, and while, perhaps, his criticisms are not as forcible as those of Paine and Colenso, they are sufficiently energetic to shake the faith of the common-sense Christian. He uses largely the Socratic method, and his queries are those likely to occur to almost every intelligent person. The pamphlet is worth reading.

A Radical's contribution to the late jubilee of England's queen is entitled "Royal Paupers." G. W. Foote, the editor of the Freethinker, London, is the author. The object of the pamphlet is to show what royalty does for the people, and what the people do for royalty. After reading it, one must conclude that the answer to the first question is, Nothing; and to the last, Everything. Mr. Foote very easily finds that the cost of the royal family to the nation is about $4,041,580 annually, while the returns for this vast sum are not found at all. The queen, it is true, forms a ministry, but in this she has no choice; she is supposed to open and close Parliament, but she rarely does it; her speeches are prepared for her by the ministry and read by proxy; she givs perfunctory assent to acts of Parliament she never reads, and which she would not dare to veto if she wanted to; she confers titles, but the recipients are selected by the ministers. She is, in short, of no earthly use, and Mr. Foote prefers to see England a republic, with an elected president at the head. The loftiest virtue Victoria possesses, says Mr. Foote, is that, being a queen, she has lived like an honest woman. And to glorify her for that is casting reflections. Therefore the jubilee is founded upon no great shakes, and the money spent might better hav been used in relieving the sufferings of the people. The pamphlet costs about 10 cents, and is obtainable at 28 Stonecutter street, E. C., London, England.

"Isms" is the quaint title of a little book received from the house of Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati. In tracing the origin and unity of religions, the author has been exhaustiv, and clears away much of the mysticism and obscurities with which ignorance, prejudice, and superstition hav usually succeeded in clothing the world's religious history. The gradual development of man from savage to civilized life through the phases of fetich, animal, and nature worship to psychotheism, wherein, under either pantheism or monotheism, love, charity, mercy, benevolence, etc., become elements in his social life, is very clearly set forth; and the author's assumption that such a stage of development, with the accompanying attainments in the arts and sciences, had been reached by a people some ten thousand years ago has many facts presented to support it. These people, he author thinks, disseminated a pure and simple monotheistic morality throughout the world, and it has reappeared in history clothed with the myths and folk-lore of the various races, under many forms of mythology and religion; all preserving under animal and astronomic symbols the "true inwardness" of the esoteric religion. The usually dull subject of symbolism is rendered quite simple and interesting, and exhibits the curious uniformity existing in the allegories, morals, and internal sense of all Bibles and religions. The author handles Theosophy very tenderly, and presents Spiritualism in its aspect as a vitalizer of religions, while he concludes that it is neither a science, philosophy, nor religion in itself. He has given an unusually clear insight into the birth, rise, decline, and resurrection of systems. The book has been variously been attributed to Governor Hoadly, M. D. Conway, Professor Reich, and others, but we think we could name a Cincinnati M.D. more likely to be the author than either of these. It may be had at this office, and, we believe, at the bookstands.

"A. Spies's Autobiography" comprises a short, jerky, and disconnected history of the life of the leading Anarchist under sentence of death in Chicago, a lucid account of the Haymarket riot, a full report of his speech in court, a preface by "Nina Van Zandt Spies," and portraits of both Mr. and Mrs. Spies. His story of the riot is as follows:

"On the following morning [after the riot at McCormick's reaper works], about nine or ten o'clock, A. Fischer, one of our compositors, asked me if I would not come to a general mass meeting which would take place at the Haymarket in the evening, and 'make a speech' on the brutality of the police and the situation of the eight-hour strike. I replied that I was hardly able to speak, but if there was no one to take my place, I should come. Delegates of a number of unions had called the meeting, he said. I made no further inquiries. About eleven o'clock a member of the Carpenter's Union called on me and asked that the handbill he showed me be published in the Arbeiter Zeitung as an announcement. It was the circular calling the Haymarket meeting, and at the bottom it contained the words, 'Workingmen, bring your arms along!'

"'This is ridiculous,' said I to the man, and had Fischer called. Him I told that I would not speak at the meeting, if this was the circular by which it had been called.

"'None of the circulars are as yet distributed—we can hav these words taken out,' the man said. Fischer assented, and I told them that if they would do that it would be all right.

"I never for a moment anticipated that the police would wantonly attack an orderly meeting of citizens. And I never saw a disorderly meeting of workingmen. The only disorderly meetings I hav ever witnessed were the Republican and Democratic powwows. I went home about four o'clock P.M. to take a little a little rest before going to the meeting. The reaction, following the excitement of the previous day, had set in. I was very tired and ill-humored. After supper my brother Henry called at our house. I asked him to come along to the meeting, which he did. We walked slowly down Milwaukee avenue. It was warm; I had changed my clothes; the revolver I was in the habit of carrying was too large for the pocket, and inconvenienced me. Passing F. Stauber's hardware store, I left it with him. It was about 8:15 o'clock when we arrived at Desplaines and Lake streets. I was under the impression that I was to speak in German, which generally follows the English. That is the reason why I was late. Small and large groups of men were standing around, but there was no meeting. Not seeing anyone who might be supposed to be intrusted with the management of the meeting, I jumped upon a wagon, inquired for Mr. Parsons, who I thought had been invited, and called the meeting to order. Parsons was not there. I saw Parsons at the corner of Halsted and Randolph streets. 'I think he is speaking there,' said a reporter to me. I told the crowd to wait a few minutes, while I went out in search of Parsons. Not finding him, I returned to the wagon, where somebady told me Parsons, Fielden, and others were holding a meeting in the office of the Arbeiter-Zeitung. I sent one of our employees over to the office to call Parsons and Fielden, and began to address the meeting. I spoke about twenty minutes.

"Then Parsons spoke. The audience was very quiet and attentiv. Parsons confined himself to the eight-hour question, but spoke at great length. While he was speaking I asked Mr. Fielden if he would not make a few remarks. He didn't care to speak, but would say a few words, and then adjourn the meeting. I said, 'All right, do so.' It was about ten o'clock when Fielden began to speak. A few minutes later a dark and threatening cloud moved up from the north. The people fearing that it would rain—or at least two-thirds of them—left the meeting. 'Stay,' said Fielden, 'just a minute longer. I will conclude presently.' There were now not more than two hundred persons remaining. One minute later two hundred policemen formed into line at the intersection of Randolph street, and marched upon the little crowd in double quick step!

"Raising his cane in an authoritativ way, Captain Ward, directing his words to Fielden (I was standing just behind Fielden in the wagon), said, 'In the name of the people of the state of Illinois, I command this meeting to disperse.'

"'Captain, this is a peaceable meeting,' retorted Mr. Fielden, while the captain turned around to his men and gave a command which I understood to be, 'Charge upon them!' At this juncture I was drawn from the wagon by my brother and several others, and I had just reached the ground when a terrific detonation occurred. 'What is that?' asked my brother. 'A cannon,' I believe,' was my reply. In an instant the fusilade of the police began. Everybody was running. All this was as unexpected as if suddenly a cloud had burst. I lost my brother in the throng, and was carried away toward the north. People fell, struck by the bullets, right and left. As I crossed the alley north of Crane's factory, a lot of officers ran into the alley, some of them exclaiming that they were hurt. They had evidently been shot by their own comrades, and sought protection in the alley. I was in a parallel line with them, and the bullets whistled around my head like a swarm of bees. I fell once or twice over others who had 'dropped,' but otherwise escaped unhurt into Zepf's saloon, at the corner of Lake street. Here I heard for the first time that the loud report had been caused by an explosion, which was thought to hav been the explosion of a bomb. I could learn no particulars, and about a half hour afterward took a car and rode home to see if my brother had been hurt. He had received a dangerous wound. Turning aside when I had answered, 'It's a cannon, I believe,' he beheld the muzzle of a revolver deliberately aimed at my back. Grasping the weapon, the bullet struck him in a vital part. (He recovered.)

"The next morning the papers reported that the police had been searching for me all night, and that they had orders to arrest me. Nobody had been at my house during the night; the report was a lie. I went to the office at my regular hour, and began to work. About nine o'clock, detectiv Jim Bonfield made his appearance, and told me the chief of police wanted to hav a talk with me. I went along with him to the central station. Two other detectivs arrested Schwab and my brother Christ, who had come to the office to learn what had occurred on the previous night. The fact that his name was Spies sufficed to arrest him and charge him with having committed murder!

"This was on the 5th of May. I hav been incarcerated ever since. The comedy, called trial, lasted eight weeks, and ended, as the reader well knows, with our conviction."

Nina Van Zandt Spies publishes the book "with one object in view, namely, to afford my American countrymen and women an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the life, character, and aspirations of a man who, with others, has occupied their attention for the last nine months." She also takes the public into her confidence, and tells how she fell in love with Mr. Spies, and married him.

The price of the book is 25 cents, and may be had of Nina Van Zandt, 102 East Washington street, Chicago, Ill.

Obituary.

When a good man passes into the "great unknown," it is but meet to pay a passing tribute to his memory. Such is due John Johnson, of Oak Valley, Elk county, Kan., who crossed the mystic river May 2, 1887. Deceased was born in Butler county, Ohio, Oct. 11, 1829. On the banks of the Miami he grew to manhood, married, and settled down in life. In 1855 he moved to Hendricks county, Indiana, at which place he resided until April, 1860, when he moved to Jefferson county, Kansas. From thence he moved to Oak Valley, in Elk county, in 1871, at which place he was an activ member of his county until his untimely demise. Soon after locating at Oak Valley, he erected a flouring-mill on Elk river. No mill west of the Mississippi ever had a better reputation for "truth and veracity" than had what was known as "Johnson's Mill." The needy were never sent away empty. He was kind and charitable to a fault. John Johnson was a progressiv Liberalist in the fullest acceptation of the term. He was ever ready to giv a reason for the hope within. Political preferment did not awe him into silence. He was one of the favored few that pass through life without having an attack of religion in some form. Mr. Johnson settled in Oak Valley when the wild whoop of the Osage Indian mingled with the howls of the coyotes, and lived to see the Kansas Southern railroad constructed through his lands, and the busy town of Oak Valley spring into existence at his door. Generations yet to come will call John Johnson a good man, and point with pride to the works of his mind and muscle that transmit his name to the pulsation of coming years.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us."—N. Y. Sun.

1 vol. 8vo. Cloth. About 600 pages.

Price, $2.50.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Published at Hammonton, N. J. Marie Howland and Eduard Howland, Editors; Jos. Burgher and F L. Browne, Printers. This paper is devoted specially to the interests of our colonization enterprise, the Credit Foncier of Sinaloa, and generally to the practical solution of the problem of Integral Co-operation. Price, $1 a year; 50 cents for six months. 25 cents for three months.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Gems of Thought.

PAUL believed in a God who used to liv in a box made with hands, and only three or four feet square at that, and who seemed to need a great deal of burnt blood and roasted flesh to make him feel comfortable.—D. M. Bennett.

THERE is no reason why a Christian young woman should not desire to secure service in a Christian family; there are good reasons why she should desire this. But considerable experience in household matters has confirmed us in the opinion that, when this reasonable desire is very strongly urged, the safest course to pursue is to make careful inquiries at the last place of service, both as to the moral character and the readiness and ability to perform the duties of her position. A readiness to attend family prayers, even an eagerness for those devotional exercises, will hardly compensate for lack of willingness to do what a servant is employed to do. The old Scotch parson might hav put it a little too strong though we confess to considerable sympathy with him. Asking where he could get his shoes mended, a brother parson, whom he was visiting, replied that "Jamie, at the foot of the hill, was a good Christian man;" and the parson broke in with, "It's not a good Christian man that I want, but a good cobbler."—The Golden Rule.

IN one of his letters Hume gives the following half-playful, half-serious summary of the constituents of human happiness which had fallen to his lot: "I shall exult and triumph to you a little that I hav at last arrived at the dignity of being a householder. About seven months ago I got a house of my own, and completed a regular family, consisting of a head—namely, myself—and two inferior members, a maid and a cat. My sister has since joined me, and keeps me company. With frugality I can reach, I find, cleanliness, warmth, light, plenty, and contentment. What would you hav more? Independence? I hav it in a supreme degree. Honor? That is not altogether wanting. Grace? That will come in time. A wife? That is none of the indispensable requisits of life. Books? I hav more than I can use. In short, I cannot find any blessing of consequence which I am not possessed of in a greater or less degree; and without any great effort of philosophy, I may be easy and satisfied."—Burton's Life and Letters of Hume.

UNFORTUNATELY, beautiful maxims about loving one's enemies and returning good for evil did not keep Jesus from reproaching the Pharisees on many occasions. Unfortunately, a man's particular enemies are just those who scarcely ever appear to him worthy of love, and this was evidently the case with Jesus and the men upon whom he poured forth his denunciations. Judging by his mode of speaking, we should suppose that all religious people who did not agree with him were simply hypocrits. . . . Jesus uses toward the Pharisees such language as this: "Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrits;" "you blind guides;" "you fools and blind;" "you serpents, you generation of vipers."—Amberley's Analysis. Verily, verily, I I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep. All that came before me are thieves and robbers.—John x, 7, 8. [Not merely Moses and the prophets, greater and lesser, but such men as Buddha, Confucius, Zoroaster, Socrates, Plato, Cicero, etc., etc. Bah! Jesus Christ was surely as great a crank as Guiteau!—C.]

A PERFECT being would not hav been so unmanned and terrified by the approach of death as to be in "agony," and "sweat as it were great drops of blood." His deportment would hav been more like that of the heathen Socrates, who conversed freely with his friends, endeavored to sustain their fortitude and lighten their grief, and when the time came, drank the fatal hemlock with as little concern as if it had been a glass of wine. The agony and despair of Jesus increased to the fatal moment, and his last words, prompted by his suffering and the utter hopelessness of his position—so it would seem—were words of reproach against his God, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"—Underwood's Jesus Not a Perfect Character.

> WHO noble ends by noble means attains,
> Or, failing, smiles in exile or in chains;
> Like good Aurelius let him reign, or bleed
> Like Socrates. That man is great indeed.
> —Pope.

WHEN they tell me that Jesus taught a gospel of love, I say I believe it. Plato taught a gospel of love before him, and you deny it. If they say, "Jesus taught that it is better to bear an injury than to retaliate," I say, "Yes, but so did Aristotle before Jesus was born. I will accept it as the statement of Jesus, if you will admit that Aristotle said it, too." I am willing that any man should come before us and say, "Jesus taught that you must love your enemies; it is written in the Bible;" but if he will open the old manuscript of Diogenes Laertius, he may there read, in texts that hav never been disputed, that the Greek philosophers, half-a-dozen of them, said the same before Jesus was born.—T. W. Higginson.

THE LAST OF ABRAHAM.

And these are the days of the years of Abraham's life, which he lived, a hundred threescore and fifteen years. Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years; and was gathered to his people.—Gen. xxv, 7, 8.

A DISPATCH from Rome says: "Orders hav been sent to the archbishop of New York to excommunicate the Rev. Dr. McGlynn and to publish the decree of excommunication in the journals."

THE Rev. Peter Roberts, Congregationalist, of Scranton, Pa., is under arrest at the instance of his servant-girl, Anna Husaboe, who charges him with betrayal and conspiracy at criminal abortion.

A REUNION of Southern and Northern soldiers has been held at Gettysburg, Pa. The veterans were placed in battle array on the old field and charged on each other, but instead of firing when they met they shook hands heartily and declared that the war is over.

THE pope of Rome wants the United States to recognize him as a temporal power, and desires provision to be made for a papal embassador at Washington to look after the interests of the church. Similar overtures are being made toward the English government.

THE crops in Cambridge, Ill., are suffering severely from drouth. About ten days ago the farmers of the place called a meeting in the Congregational church, and, led by the minister, all prayed for rain. Outdoor prayer meetings were also held, one of them continuing until 12 o'clock at night, at which hour a bank of clouds arose, and there were indications of moisture. At this the happy farmers turned the meeting into a dance and offered up a prayer of thanksgiving. Rain did not come, however, and at last accounts the condition of the crops was more serious than ever.

TWENTY-ONE persons were tried at St. Petersburg between June 7th and 16th on the charge of being members of the secret society called the "Will of the People," of complicity in several murders, and of having assisted in several dynamite outrages. Three prisoners were acquitted. The others, including two women, were sentenced to death, but their sentences were commuted to exile in Siberia or imprisonment at hard labor.

THE Fourth was celebrated in the usual way. Though we hav in this city an ordinance that prohibits fireworks on that day, it was totally disregarded and no attempt was made to enforce it. Consequently the city was filled with smoke and noise. The fire department was kept on the jump for three days, and a long list of fingers shot off, faces burnt, legs broken, and eyes injured demanded the attention of the doctors.

Odds and Ends.

THERE is a destiny which shapes the side-door, rough Hewitt as he will.

A JERSEYMAN'S idea of celebrating the glorious Fourth is to come to New York and spend his money for oyster stews.

A PRINTER up in Canada is said to be 103 years old. He has made so many typographical errors during his career that he is afraid to die.

BATH-HOUSE robber: "No use lookin' fer anythin' here, Bill. Ticket stub ter one of Joe Cook's lectures, an' a poker chip. Busted drummer from Boston."

THE editor of London Punch confesses that his paper cannot make much headway in America in opposition to the "Editor's Drawer" of Harper's Magazine.

"WHAT was the text this morning?" asked a stay-at-home husband of a church-going wife. "Many are called, but few are chosen." "What jury did he hav reference to?"

A BROOKLYN physician has been investigating cats and dogs, and he finds just as many cranks and fools among them as among the human race. He says that every fourth cat is off her base, while every ninth dog is a sort of fanatic.

COMMERCIAL traveler: "So you don't hav Prohibition down here in Tennessee, eh?" Tennessean: "Prohibition—what's that?" Commercial traveler: "Why, laws against liquor-selling." Tennessean: "Stranger, this is Tennessee."

IN Syracuse late Saturday night. Customer: "Where's Mr. French?" Clerk: "Gone to New York to spend Sunday." Customer: "Where would a telegram reach him?" Clerk: "Music-hall, Hoboken, up to 12 o'clock to-morrow night."

A WELL-KNOWN clergyman recently refused to permit his congregation to pay the expenses of a trip to Europe which he had in contemplation. The commission appointed to inquire as to his sanity report that he will probably recover before the steamer sails.

A DARKEY, being brought before the magistrate, was asked: "Havn't you been in jail for stealing chickens once before?" "No, sah; no, indeed, I hain't. Praise de Lawd fer his infinit mussy, nobody hain't cotched me yit. It seems as if I was pertected by de higher powers."

"Do you realize, sir," said a long-haired passenger, "that there is one who sees and hears all we do, who can solve our inmost thoughts, and before whom we are but crushed and bruised worms?" "Giv us your hand, stranger," replied the other, "I know just how you feel. I'm married myself."

ADVICE to young ladies about to graduate: Be just as sweet as you can. The man who doesn't like to look upon a sweet girl graduate is a villain—or married. Tie your essay with a blue ribbon, and be practical in the choice of a subject. We suggest "The Coming Man." Advice to young men about to graduate: Don't mind the newspapers. Whoop it up for all you're worth on the Commencement stage about "The Scholar in Politics," "The Ideal Republic," and "The Political Destiny of Patagonia." About five years from now read your oration over to yourself slowly.

"DON'T ask me to go to church with you again," said a Minneapolis citizen to his wife; "it won't do you any good." "Why not, John?" she asked. "Didn't you enjoy the sermon?" "Enjoy the sermon?" he repeated. "Why, the preacher kept boomin' St. Paul, an' never said a dinged word about Minneapolis."

OUT OF THE DEPTHS.

From the advance sheets of "The Bitter Dregs," a story of passion and feeling by Montrose Madeira, Esq., the rising young Boston novelist:

"It was noble in you to speak so frankly of your struggles and poverty. Very few men would be brave enough to own that they had formerly lived in South Boston."

Peleg Burnham's face flushed with delight at Elvira's words.

"I, too, hav suffered," she continued, with the sigh of one who has tasted of life's bitterness. "Last summer"—the cold, hard look which he had noted once before came into her eyes, and there was a perceptible quiver in the lips as she spoke—"last summer we visited my uncle's family in Vermont. They hav a motto, 'God Bless Our Home,' over the mantelpiece, and at night they gather about the melodeon and sing from 'The Golden Treasury of Song,' forming a group similar to that which embellishes the cover of that volume."

"And you can speak of these things unmoved!" exclaimed Burnham.

"It is you who hav taught me to be brave, Peleg," she made answer, "but I hav not told you all. My father has invited them to visit us this winter, and they are coming—all of them—on Tuesday—and the Browning Club meets at our house on Wed—Wednesday." Her words ended in a dry sob, but in another moment her strong, womanly nature reasserted itself, and she was herself again, calm, proud, and defiant.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Burnham. "And the 'Golden Treasury of Song!' Will they bring that, too?"

"I know not," she answered, wearily. "It may be that they will bring not only that, but the motto and the melodeon as well."

There was in Peleg's nature a strong element of poetic chivalry which enabled him to appreciate and admire any act of silent heroism, especially on the part of a woman. He rose slowly from the low chair on which he had been sitting, and with a sudden movement of exquisit, fawn-like grace knelt at her feet, reverently lifted the hem of her tailor-made dress, and impressed upon it a kiss.

"Noble, suffering woman," he murmured. "I will come to the Browning Club, to be with you in your hour of trial!"

A RELIGIOUS PROCESSION.

Notes and Clippings.

A COMMITTEE is being organized at Genoa, Italy, the birthplace of Columbus, to celebrate in 1892 the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America. All the United States will be invited to send representativs.

A SEVENTH DAY BAPTIST of Waterford, Conn., the Rev. Edmund Darrow, was born in the seventh year of this century, on the seventh day of the month, on the seventh day of the week, and in the seventh hour of the day.

THERE is prospect of a religious war in South Carolina. Some Mormon elders are proselyting in the upper part of the state, and the other sects hav opened hostilities. South Carolina has furnished the Mormon church about five hundred recruits in the last ten years.

DURING the war the city of Richmond, Va., issued about $500,000 in paper money, which passed current throughout the Confederacy. Now somebody has gathered up all these notes and is suing the city for redemption. Legal opinion is about evenly divided as to the city's liability.

No Fourth of July celebration thus far reported equals that held at Beaver Cañon, Idaho. The Declaration of Independence was read by a man named John Hancock, and Henry Clay delivered an oration. There was a big procession in which the states were represented by thirty-eight young women in white Mother Hubbards, mounted on black horses. One hundred woodchoppers marched four abreast, carrying their axes, and the city fathers rode in a big lumber wagon drawn by twelve yoke of red oxen, driven by the Goddess of Liberty. In the evening there was an exhibition of fireworks, with a war-dance performed by one hundred Shoshone and Bannock Indians.

NEW YORK'S new corporation counsel, Mr. O'Brien, sustains the decision of the court that hotel-keepers may sell liquor with meals, but decides that restaurant-keepers hav not that right. That is, the Fifth avenue man may hav his wine, but the Bowery man is denied his beer. Thus the equality of citizens under the law gets another set-back.

ON the pay-rolls of the teachers of our public schools for May there was one teacher who receives a salary of $700 a year, from whose pay was deducted just one cent for being tardy two minutes. The cent was, according to the figures of a clerk to the Board of Education, the amount the teacher would earn in one one-hundred-and-twentieth of her day's work.

THE trial of the Rev. F. M. Todd, of Manassas, Va., by the Washington presbytery on a charge of having been seen in the woods in a ministerial situation with a female member of his congregation, ended on the 8th in a verdict of not proven. All of the seventeen members sitting in the trial were agreed that the charge was not proven, but it is said that five of them were opposed to a simple "not guilty." The report adopted indicates that the presbytery believes the defendant to be guilty, but that under the rules of evidence the belief is not sufficiently supported to warrant a verdict to that effect. Dr. Sunderland, counsel for the defense, announced an intention to appeal the case to the synod. He objected to the form of the report, and insisted that a simple verdict of not guilty should hav been rendered without any qualifying words.

IF the Board of Visitors of the Andover Theological Seminary has expelled Professor Smyth from his professorship because he spelled his name with a y, their action would at least hav been comprehensible, and might hav been justified. Neither of Professor Smyth's four accomplices spells "Smith" with a y, and neither of them was expelled. But if the Board fired Smyth on account of his religious opinions, its action was incoherent, for Churchill, Tucker, Harris, and Hincks all admitted at their trial that they think as Smyth does, but no one of them has been disturbed. Anyone might know that the Board that makes such an unwarranted distinction and shows so crude a sense of justice, is the same that insists that the unwarned heathen must be damned.—Life.

IN reversing the decision of a referee granting a divorce upon the testimony of a detectiv and a disreputable woman, Judge Brunt of New York delivered the following opinion: "The wisdom of the rule that divorces should not be granted upon the evidence of prostitutes and private detectivs is strikingly illustrated by the nature of the testimony offered to support the allegations of the complaint in the case at bar. The prostitute, influenced by money or for the gratification of feelings of revenge, seems willing to swear in any way desired, and the private detectiv furnishes the evidence which he is employed to procure, even though he has to resort to his own fertil brain for the facts or supposed facts upon which he founds his testimony." This opinion is a blow at the private detectiv system under which a great many divorces hav been granted.

SOME people's ideas of the function of a mayor do not seem to be very clearly defined. A person signing himself "Yours for Reform" writes this to Mayor Hewitt: "if its al the same to yu i woold like to sugest that yu do sumthing to prevent a factory over my rooms from letin water run through the sealin on to my bed. I hev complaned to the factory men, but they say they can't do nothin', and eppeel to you as mair of the city to protect its sitzens in their constushnal rites."

IN 1858 Pierre Dejan and Caroline Schaeffer, residents of Louisiana, were married. She was a German, and he had a small percentage of negro blood in his veins, though he was as white as any Caucasian. The marriage was illegal, but the Catholic church sanctioned it, and they thought they were husband and wife and lived as such for eleven years. Then, in 1869, the constitution of the state was changed to allow marriages between whites and blacks, and the couple were again married before a justice of the peace. In a controversy over the property of Dejan, deceased, a decision has just been rendered by the court that the ceremony of 1858 was invalid, and that they were not husband and wife until 1869. This decision affects a great many couples of mixed blood in the South who were married by the church before the war, and who now are informed that their children are illegitimate and that they hav been living in illicit relations.

Tales Told Out of School.—Concluded.

THE REMEDY FOR THIS WIDESPREAD DEFECTION.

In finishing my work as a jury of inquest, sent out to ascertain as far as I could the real condition of things, I hope you will take my suggestions as coming from one who has observed carefully and reflected much on the subject. The published reports made yearly of the condition of the church, and her auxiliary societies, are not reliable. As charged by an eminently respectable and responsible secular newspaper in New York, they are doctored, so that those from whom the money comes cannot understand them. They tell the public only what we would like to believe, instead of what is really the case, deluding the people, putting them off their guard, thus increasing the danger which is already imminent. But the scriptures are full of the doctrin that prayer is omnipotent with God; and if God does not appear in behalf of his church, jeoparded with evils both within and without, it is proof positiv that the fervent, effectual prayer of the righteous has not been offered. As a concluding part of the program, you hav a right to ask me what suggestion I would make in the way of remedy for the present state of things.

Well, a desperate condition requires a desperate remedy. In the treatment of a bodily disease many a valuable life has been saved by the heroic method of a physician who, even through the hollow eyes of death, could see life peering. Such heroic treatment the Christians of this age must adopt if they would arrest the widespread Infidelity, and continue the existence of the church as the repository of divine truth. Then

I. I would hav a grand convention made up of a pro rata representation of all the orthodox churches, including the Catholics and the orthodox Jews, to consider the present dangerous condition of the country in regard to religion. If you would reject the Catholics from this consensus of the competent, let me remind you that during the long centuries up to the time of the Protestant reformation, she was the sole embodiment of the Christian life and doctrins in the world, except the Eastern or Greek church, which, in point of numbers and influence, was comparativly small. Whatever of authority we hav to preach the gospel and administer the sacraments was derived, mediately or immediately, from the Catholic church. Protestants hav nearly all admitted this by declining to rebaptize converts from that church, thus acknowledging that body to be a part of the true church; and if the Catholic church is good enough for God, she ought, especially in such an emergency as the present, to be good enough for us. Dr. Hodge, our distinguished professor of theology in the Princeton Theological Seminary, which has sent, and still sends out every year, more young ministers than any other institution of the kind in the country, has deliberately expressed his matured opinion on a subject closely cognate with this in an essay published in the New Princeton Review for January, and entitled, "Religion in the Public Schools." In this article the doctor, who from his eminent position and his great learning may be considered a spokesman for all the rest of us, justifies me in my proposal to coöperate with our Catholic brethren in the grand effort to Christianize the schools and the laws, and make them conform to the religious character of the nation. As the Protestant hatred to the Catholic has been so intense for two hundred years, and would naturally be the chief obstacle to a political union of our forces in the coming struggle with Infidelity, I will quote a few sentences from Dr. Hodge's article to show that there is the best authority for the suggestion I hav made, and that such coöperation, so far as the school question and we Presbyterians are concerned, is entirely practicable. He says: "Shall the Christian majority consent that their wealth shall be taxed, and the whole energy of our immense system of public schools be turned to the work of disseminating Agnosticism through the land and down the ages? Christians hav all the power in their own hands. The danger arises simply from the weak and sickly sentimentalism respecting the transcendental spirituality of religion, the non-religious character of the state, and the supposed equitable rights of a small Infidel minority. All we hav to do is, for Catholics and Protestants—disciples of a common master—to come to an understanding with respect to a common basis of what is received as general Christianity, a practical quantity of truth belonging equally to both sides to be recognized in general legislation, and especially in the literature and teaching of our public schools."

If you object to the orthodox Jews, let me call to mind that they hold, at least, to the inspiration and authority of the Old Testament, which we admit to be the foundation of the New Testament. But what confirms their right to sit in such a consensus is the fact that we Christians got the central doctrin of our religious system—vicarious atonement—from their typical feast of expiation yearly observed, where it is said (Numbers xvi, 21): "And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited; and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness." The orthodox Jews feel toward Ingersoll and the evolutionists just as we feel, and in such a convention as I propose their rabbis should be invited to take seats.

II. I would hav a committee of able men designated by the convention who should be skilled in polemics and in the art of addressing popular audiences, and who should hold themselvs in readiness to accept the challenge of the Infidels, and discuss the points at issue between them and us. This would put a stop to the boast that of the eighty odd thousand clergymen in the country who are the official defenders of the faith, not one of any reputation at all has the courage to meet the Infidels in a discussion of the merits of the question. No tongue can tell how this refusal to discuss acts as a justification among the people of the doubts they express as to the truthfulness of religion. More than once during my peregrinations hav I encountered young men and young women, born and brought up in the church, and who were just Infidel enough to hav lost their relish, if they ever had any, for divine things, asking me, with an air of triumph, when I mildly reproved them for their course, why, among all the thousands of our educated and learned clergy, who call themselvs expounders and advocates of religion, there is not one who is willing to defend that religion in oral debate? The fathers of the church were ex-officio fighting men in their time, and extinguished heresy after heresy as they arose to corrupt and weaken the faith of the gospel. But while Infidelity in our day has increased its power a thousand-fold by the invention of arguments which the early fathers never dreamed of, our clergymen, it is alleged, like a military company on dress parade, pose before their congregations on the Sabbath and preach wishy-washy sermons from which no one would suspect that the church was beleaguered by an army of sharp-shooters so deadly in their aim that the clergy feared them as much as they feared the devil. The late Judge Black was greatly to blame for sending this pale-faced fear into the ranks of the clergy. He was foolish enough to grapple in a wrestling match with Ingersoll, and, before he had fairly felt his antagonist, found himself on the broad of his back as if engaged in contemplating the heavens. Judge Black as a lawyer or a politician could hav discussed any question in law or politics with his opponent. But when he undertook to debate the religious question, as a pastime, with a man who had made it a subject of study for years, he discovered, and others saw, that he did not understand the subject; and we had to hurrah him through as we did many years ago Dr. Berg in his debate with the Infidel, Joseph Barker, whom he had challenged to engage in a similar contest without first girding up his loins.

For such reasons I would hav a committee of our ablest men, supported out of a general fund, whose function should be to debate before the people the questions in dispute between us and the Infidels. Such debates should be printed in fair type, and circulated everywhere among the people, so that, by reading both sides, they might become intelligent Christians, able to giv a reason for the faith that is in them.

III. I would hav this convention issue a deliverance to the public, setting forth their authority to act in the premises by virtue of their being the constituted witnesses for God upon the earth, and their capability from life-long study to understand and expound the will of God as revealed in the scriptures. Such deliverance should be addressed to that class in society who hav the intelligence and the wealth necessary to control the orders below them, and to satisfy the people that the questions concerning religion, and its relation to the government, and the well-being of society, are not open, but settled ones, so adjudged to be by this consensus of the competent; that the state of things hitherto existing, where every man, unlearned as he may be, sets himself up as a debater and a judge on religious questions, is as dangerous to the stability of society as if the citizens were allowed to carry around in their pockets, as they now do, matches, dynamite cartridges liable to explode by concussion and to spread death and ruin everywhere. I see with pleasure a movement among the ruling classes to hav Congress increase our standing army, and establish garrisons near all our large cities, so as to be in constant readiness to put down popular tumults arising from any cause. If the soldiers enlisted for this service were selected for their intelligence and sobriety and their noble ambition to be soldiers of the cross; and if they were well paid and enlisted for long terms, the public interests could be protected from the anti-religious, as well as social agitators. We need, and must hav—what, as yet, we hav not—a strong government which shall command the respect of our own people, and be a terror to evil thinkers, evil speakers, and evil doers. It is admitted that in all ages Christianity has been eminently conservativ in its influence, politically and socially, while it is equally true from history that heresy is revolutionary in its tendency, and disposed to follow any jack-o'-lantern reformer who professes to advance the public good.

IV. Then, and lastly, I would hav the national Congress make a similar pronunciamento based upon the conceded fact, stated by Dr. Hodge, that this nation is Christian in character, and should be Christian in its government; and that Infidelity and Infidels, Socialism and Socialists, together with Anarchy and Anarchists, should be suppressed by law. All the orthodox religious sects, having been, according to this program, in that convention on the principle of representation, no opposition worthy of notice would be made. If the German Infidels should grumble at such wholesome restraint as this policy would impose on them, they can return home when they please to the merciful rule of Bismarck. And as for our nativ-born Infidels, like other dangerous vipers which cannot be killed, let them gnaw against the file. All of which is respectfully submitted.

DAVID JONES.

The King and the Priests.

A BOOK OF CHRONICLES.

CHAPTER I.

1. Once there was a king who ruled his people even as a father governs his children.

2. He pressed not his subjects into standing armies to molest or conquer neighboring kingdoms, nor did he organize missionary enterprises to force his religion upon other nations that chose to maintain different systems of church polity.

3. He did not seek to overreach the rulers of other countries through priestcraft by sowing the seeds of religious dissensions between king and subject, priests and congregations, parents and children, and husbands and wives.

4. But he did unto others even what he wished them to do unto himself; and his servants walked in all the footsteps of their royal master.

5. In his dominion all the virgins got good husbands and all the young men for themselvs good wives. [The fifth verse is thought by commentators to be an interpolation.]

6. There came unto this king three magicians saying: We hav heard of thy glory in a distant land, and we hav journeyed hither to acquaint thee with the mysteries which we hav searched out, and to exalt thee with the miracles of our wisdom.

7. For behold we hav come to weave a fabric for thy garment of state. This fabric shall be a touchstone of virtue unto all thy servants and people; for whosoever shall be pious, loyal, and trustworthy of thy servants he shall be able to behold the brilliant colors of the royal garment and to discern the fineness of its texture; but whosoever shall be a traitor, an Atheist, impious, and untrustworthy, his sight the garment shall elude and to his grasp the texture of the fabric shall not be discernible.

8. And the king was pleased with the words which the wise men spake.

9. And the king gave them an upper chamber in his palace wherein to set up their loom, that they might weave a garment for the king even as they had said, and according to all the wisdom which was within them.

10. And the king appointed them to eat at his table and to drink of his wine, and he gave them revenues, and costly apparel, and he commanded his people that they should withhold no good thing from the wise men.

11. Thus did the wise men liv at the king's palace.

CHAPTER II.

1. And after many years the king sent his chamberlain to the room wherein the wise men wrought, that the king might hav information of the progress of the garment and of its color.

2. And the king thought within himself: "Now I shall know of a surety whether my chamberlain is faithful unto me or not."

3. And the chamberlain went away from the king with fear and trembling; for though he was a just man and faithful, yet he feared evil.

4. And when the chamberlain came unto the wise men and made known unto them the king's commands, the wise men led the chamberlain into an inner room where the loom was, but the chamberlain could see no fabric in the loom.

5. And the wise men took the hands of the chamberlain and laid them upon the loom and said: "Touch now, we pray thee, the softness of this fabric, and feast thine eyes upon the brilliancy of the texture which we hav wrought; for thou art faithful and loyal unto the king thy master, and unto thee the garment shall manifest itself, and its gorgeousness shall not be hidden from thee."

6. And the chamberlaim said within himself, "Hav not I served the king my master with singleness of heart all my days? Why then should the scales of unbelief be placed before mine eyes, that I see not the gorgeous fabric which the wise men hav wrought? Behold I must conquer Satan, or I shall die, and my office shall be given unto another."

7. And the chamberlain cried with a loud voice and said: "Blessed be God who has sent unto the king the wise men to weave this beautiful garment, and glorious shall be the day on which the king shall be arrayed therein."

8. And the wise men said: "Blessed be God who has given unto the king a faithful chamberlain to whom the fabric has manifested its beauty, and whose hands hav been able to handle its texture."

9. And the chamberlain reported unto the king that he had seen the fabric which the wise men had wrought, and glorious was the color thereof, brilliant the design, and gorgeous would be the garment made thereof to array the person of the king.

10. And the king sent other of his officers to the fabric which the wise men wrought, and he sent them one after another.

11. And when they came to the loom they could see nothing.

12. And the wise men spake unto them even the words which they had spoken unto the chamberlain.

13. And they thought within themselvs, "Hav not we served the king our master with fidelity in our several stations? Why then should this fabric be hidden from our eyes?

14. "Shall the chamberlain only hav honor, and we be cast out and be found unfaithful? Surely, Satan hath bewitched us that the brilliancy of this garment is hidden from us, but we will not let Satan triumph over us; let us fight the good fight and keep the faith, and our eyes shall behold the glory of the king's apparel when he shall be clothed therein." And they reported unto the king even as the chamberlain had done.

15. At last the king himself went to view the garment which the wise men had wrought.

16. And the wise men said unto the king: "Blessed art thou, O king, above all the monarchs of the earth, for God has prospered thy kingdom and has given thee servants faithful and true, for they were able to behold the fabric which we hav wrought and to handle its texture. An Infidel and an unworthy one is not among them, and blessed art thou to be set over so faithful a people."

17. And the king looked upon the loom, but could see no fabric.

18. And he thought within himself, "How is this thing? Are all my servants faithful, and shall I alone be found a castaway? Surely some charm confounds my sight; and some evil spell darkens my discernment! Hav I not been ever as a father to my people? and hav not they been as children unto me? But I will walk by faith, if not by sight, and I shall yet escape the snare of the evil one and confound the onslaught of the enemy of souls."

19. And the king said unto the wise men, "The fabric which you hav wrought pleases me well, and mine eyes delight in the brilliancy of its color.

20. "Behold the feast of harvest draweth nigh, and the people shall present themselvs before me with gifts and with rejoicing; then will I be arrayed in the garment of your handiwork."

CHAPTER III.

1. And the harvest was ended and the summer was past, and the people assembled with presents for the king before the royal palace;

2. And the wise men arrayed the king in the garment which they had wrought.

3. And the king presented them with gold and with precious stones, and the wise men departed for their own land.

4. And the garment was light and airy for the king's person.

5. And the king walked forth from his chamber to present himself before his people.

6. And the chamberlain and all the king's officers and household cried out with loud acclaim, "Behold how beautiful is the king arrayed in his regal garment!"

7. And the king stood forth upon the balcony of the palace before all the people.

8. And the people beheld the king and there fell a great silence upon them, and they marveled greatly, and they made no acclaim unto the king.

9. And a stripling whose master had come from afar to do homage to the king, and the stripling had charge of his master's horses, and he cried out: "By the spirit of truth which is within me, the king stands before you naked!"

10. And others reported the saying, and a rumor and tumult arose and spread even unto the king and to his ears: "The king hath no garments on! the king is naked!"

11. And the chamberlain took off his cloak that was upon him, and he put it upon the king, and he led the king into his chamber.

12. And he fell at the king's feet and he said: "Of a truth we hav been deceived by the wise men, and by their craftiness they hav laid snares both unto the king and unto all his people. And now also are they gone and hav taken the king's gold and silver with them."

13. And the king and his people marveled greatly at the subtlety wherewith they had been deceived by the magicians.

News and Notes.

I found a goodly company of Liberals at Marshfield, Coos county. This is quite a lively little metropolis on the far-away coast. There are extensiv coal mines in the neighborhood. The fisheries are excellent. The timber is of splendid quality, capable of a beautiful finish. The most elegant furniture is made from the myrtle wood which abounds in this county. Along the shore are what they call the "beach mines," which produce quantities of gold, and gold mines are also in the mountains. The soil when cleared is exceedingly fertil. It is a good fruit and stock country. Coos bay offers one of the best ports of shelter along the coast. When railroad communications are complete and the natural resources developed, Coos county will be a noble country. Its climate is superbly healthful. The summers are delicious. It is just where the north winds and the south winds meet in refreshing currents. There are no cyclones; the days flow along with bright and breezy splendor. The winters are a bit disagreeable, with little snow, but considerable rain. There is, however, no extremely cold weather.

Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Cathcart, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Garfield, Mr. and Mrs. F. Mark, Mr. and Mrs. Norman, Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Hilburn, R. M. Hutcheson; Wm. Hall, chairman of the meetings; T. G. Owen, E. A. Anderson, S. Miller, Thomas of "Kentuck Slew," Judge Hyde, G. A. Bennett, editor of Bay News," Cyrus Sandrith, T. M. Bridges; Gilmore and Garrison, of General Trumbull's brigade—and through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER they send greetings to their old commander; C. G. Grandholm, J. Bazzill and others of Marshfield, S. H. Hazard, chairman of meeting at Empire City; Wm. Saunders, A. P. Owens, Fred. Jarvis, O. B. Richardson, Henry Ploeger, etc., of this latter place, make up the splendid legion of Coos bay. Three hundred were present at all the meetings in Marshfield, and I closed the series of lectures to a full house, at Empire City, on Sunday evening. A Secular Union was organized for Coos bay, and thus two strong associations hav been formed in both parts of the county—the Coquille and Coos—and they will, no doubt, keep our banners to the front in this farthest Western sea-board of the United States. I felt amply repaid for all my arduous journeys in these bright results, and the companionship of so many choice and forward spirits.

Sunday afternoon the steamer Comet, Captain Roberts, takes me to Empire City. After the evening lecture I cross the bay to the little sand-encircled ranch of Fred. Jarvis, the stage-driver—a herculean companion who would take you safely through every peril. I bunked beside his horses until two o'clock in the morning. It was blowing great guns, and the big sea was thundering in mighty squadrons upon the near beach. In the faint daylight, after the tide was out, we began our journey alongside the Pacific to the Umqua river.

It was a picture of strange magnificence that hung its mystic shadows, and lights, and gloom, and glories along that marvelous pathway. On one side the sea with its crested billows sweeping from seven thousand miles of tumbling waters to our very feet; on the other the faint gray sands, straggling clumps of trees, huge fallen trunks, stranded ships, and bleak hills. Friend Jarvis wrapped a big oil-cloth tent about my body, and I didn't care for the whirling gales that make the sea roar. Brighter grew the horizon, and whiter the broad expanse of liquid night. Silvery splendors rolled along the orient sky. Then the sun, a glittering golden point, burst upon the sea and shore, and soon all the billows were gorgeous in the draperies of morn, a beautiful army, ever advancing and changing its resplendent array, with its million feet flashing far as the eye could see twenty miles up and down its circling shores. At six o'clock the little steamer Juno awaits us at the mouth of the Umqua. Up this beautiful winding river we go in the now burning heat—the thermometer at one hundred and thirteen. I make me an umbrella of a bedstead and sleep upon the hay bales in the breezy shadows, while the soft green hills and sylvan dales go floating by. At noon we reach Scottsburg. Here we are stranded until next day morning, when we take the lumbering stage amid heat equal to that of the previous day, and travel to Drain's station, at which we arrive in the afternoon. At two o'clock in the morning we are aroused for the rushing train, whose music is gladness, for I had become tired of the slow-moving coach and clouds of dust. In the dawn I reach the church-shadowed city of Salem, which they say is awfully pious. I had not time to look around, for I. N. McCorkle, of Silverton, was ready with a swift team to take me to the grand rally which was appointed for that morning. It was fourteen miles away, and in the bright sunshine we sped along. Glorious Mt. Hood, rising like a vast pyramid sixty miles away, crowned the green landscapes with snowy lusters. At the appointed hour we arrived at the beautiful grove on the edge of the little village of Silverton, where the gathering was to be—and a grand gathering it was. Four or five hundred people were present. The band played enlivening music, the choir sang, and I then gave an address on "American Democracy." In the afternoon an equally large number was present, and I spoke on "Mental Sincerity." Mr. P. D. Allen read Washburn's beautiful address on "Death and Immortality," and the band and choir gave joyous entertainment. We had our lunch beneath the tall trees and amid the sun-bright shadows. In the evening a big meeting was held in the railroad freight house. Seats were made of lumber for the accommodation of about three hundred, and every seat was occupied. I gave "The New Heaven and Earth." Thursday afternoon the Silverton Secular Union was organized. One hundred and fourteen names were enrolled, representing the best elements in the community. In the evening there was another grand gathering.

Friday afternoon I again lectured in the grove, and closed the series of lectures in the evening to a crowded house. Nothing has been more successful and brilliant than our Silverton meetings. The orthodox were simply overwhelmed. The Methodist minister was made sick by the affair and had to take to his bed. One Methodist sister said I ought to be mobbed and hung. "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." A curious incident occurred at my first meeting. The Rev. Thomas Small has been a minister here for forty years, and has ruled with unquestioned authority among the members of his sect. He interrupted me once or twice in my discourse. He evidently thought the Infidel had no rights that he was bound to respect. In the course of my address I declared that Christianity was in favor of poverty, and quoted the text, "Blessed are ye poor.'" He instantly cried out, "Don't misrepresent the scriptures. There is no such text. It says, 'Blessed are ye poor in spirit.'" I had the exquisit pleasure of showing that he was ignorant of his own Bible, and demonstrated before his own admirers that it was he that misrepresented the scriptures, for I read the text just as I quoted and there was no "poor in spirit" about it. Oh, what a fall there was, my countrymen! The subsequent proceedings interested the Rev. Small no more. He kept a profound silence. A minister of forty years' standing, he was convicted before his own people of absolute ignorance of what the Bible said on a most important subject.

The orthodox are thoroughly demoralized. Last winter they had a revival, and after thirty-one days' laborious effort gathered in one hundred and thirty-three, of which only sixty proved up their claim at the end of the six months' probation, and most of these were women and children. In three days, without any particular effort, our host numbered over one hundred stanch men and women. Abner Allen, eighty-seven years old, joined the organization, and it was the first organization of any kind that he had ever joined. Without doubt, a Freethought hall will be built at Silverton, and a splendid influence go forth for liberty and justice. Dr. McClure, the president; Mr. Kline, the vice-president; P. D. Allen, secretary; Mr. Fitzgerald, treasurer; Mrs. Carrie Fitzgerald, Mr. Mount, and Mr. Walford, of the executive committee, are brave and energetic workers; and to back them up in every enterprise are the Davenports, the Rosses, the Smiths, the Allens, the Wolfords, the Leonards, the Hibbards, the McGeers, Macintosh, Buff, Marchbanks, Wright, Forshay, the Cooleys, the Geers, and others whom space forbids to mention upon the roll of honor and progress.

The Methodists wanted a debate, but when we agreed to debate, their man, the Rev. Driver, was unwilling to come to the front. He preferred to giv his thunder after I was gone. I sold nearly one hundred dollars' worth of books at Silverton, and this shows the deep interest among the people concerning Freethought; and, more than the lectures, these books will continue to disturb the equanimity of our orthodox friends, and spread the mighty agitation for reform.

Silverton has nobly advanced our cause, and made the pulse of freedom quicker, stronger. Hope glitters amid the radiance of her beautiful homes.

Next week and week after I am at Salem, Molalla, Portland, McMinnvile. I am at Corvallis, July 10th; Stagton, July 12th, 13th, 14th; Silverton again, July 15th; Forest Grove, July 17th; Scappose, July 19th, 20th, 21st; Seattle, July 24th; Port Angeles, July 31st; Port Townsend, Aug. 7th, 8th, 9th; Colfax, Aug. 14th; Pendleton, I expect, Aug. 21st; Baker City, Aug. 28th, and then I shall move on to Idaho and Utah, etc. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

THE Standard estimates the income of Archbishop Corrigan at $40,000 a year. This is gathered from the cathedraticum; a tax of $200 on each church in the archdiocese, $5,000 salary from the cathedral, his palace and its expenses, and a tax of $1 on each burial in Calvary cemetery.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

INTRODUCTION.

From the dawn of authentic history to the second century of our chronological era the nations of antiquity were beguiled by the fancies of supernatural religions. For fifteen hundred years the noblest nations of the Middle Ages were tortured by the insanities of an antinatural religion. The time has come to found a Religion of Nature.

The principles of that religion are revealed in the monitions of our normal instincts, and have never been wholly effaced from the soul of man, but for long ages the consciousness of their purpose has been obscured by the mists of superstition and the systematic inculcation of baneful delusions. The first taste of alcohol revolts our normal instincts; nature protests against the incipience of a ruinous poison-vice; but the fables of the Bacchus priests for centuries encouraged that vice and deified the genius of intemperance. Vice itself blushed to mention the immoralities of the pagan gods whose temples invited the worship of the heavenly-minded. Altars were erected to a goddess of lust, to a god of wantonness, to a god of thieves.

That dynasty of scamp-gods was, at last, forced to abdicate, but only to yield their throne to a celestial Phalaris, a torture-god who cruelly punished the gratification of the most natural instincts, and foredoomed a vast plurality of his children to an eternity of horrid and hopeless torments. Every natural enjoyment was denounced as sinful. Every natural blessing was vilified as a curse in disguise. Mirth is the sunshine of the human mind, the loveliest impulse of life's truest children; yet the apostle of Antinaturalism promised his heaven to the gloomy world-despiser. "Blessed are they that mourn." "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily." "Be afflicted, and mourn and weep; let your laughter be turned to mourning and your joy to heaviness." "Woe unto you that laugh." "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, his wife and children, his brothers and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."

The love of health is as natural as the dread of pain and decrepitude. The religion of Antinaturalism revoked the health laws of the Mosaic code, and denounced the care even for the preservation of life itself. "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on." "Bodily exercise profiteth but little." "There is nothing from without a man that, entering him, can defile him."

The love of knowledge awakens with the dawn of reason; a normal child is naturally inquisitive; the wonders of the visible creation invite the study of every intelligent observer. The enemies of nature suppressed the manifestations of that instinct, and hoped to enter their paradise by the crawling trail of blind faith. "Blessed are they that do not see and yet believe." "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." "He that believeth not is condemned already."

The love of freedom, the most universal of the protective instincts, was suppressed by the constant inculcation of passive resignation to the yoke of "the powers that be," of abject submission to oppression and injustice. "Resist not evil." "Of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again." "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain." "Submit yourselves to the powers that be."

The love of industry, the basis of social welfare, that manifests itself even in social insects, was denounced as unworthy of a true believer: "Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed? For after all these things do the gentiles seek." "Take no thought of the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself." "Ask and it shall be given you," i.e., stop working and rely on miracles and prayer.

The hope for the peace of the grave, the last solace of the wretched and weary, was undermined by the dogmas of eternal hell, and the preordained damnation of all earth-loving children of nature: "He that hateth not his own life cannot be my disciple." "The children of the kingdom shall be cast out into utter darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." "They shall be cast into a furnace of fire, there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." "They shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb." "And the smoke of their torment ascendeth forever and ever, and they have no rest day nor night."

For fifteen centuries the pilot of the church lured our forefathers to a whirlpool of mental and physical degeneration, till the storms of the Protestant revolt enabled them to break the spell of the fatal eddies, and, like a swimmer saving his naked life, mankind has struggled back to the rescuing rocks of our mother earth. Lured by the twinkle of reflected stars, we have plunged into the maelstrom of Antinaturalism, and after regaining the shore, by utmost efforts, it seems now time to estimate the expenses of the adventure.

The suppression of science has retarded the progress of mankind by a full thousand years. For a century or two the Mediterranean peninsulas still lingered in the evening twilight of pagan civilization, but with the confirmed rule of the church the gloom of utter darkness overspread the homes of her slaves, and the delusions of that dreadful night far exceeded the worst superstitions of pagan barbarism. "The cloud of universal ignorance," says Hallam, "was broken only by a few glimmering lights, who owe almost the whole of their distinction to the surrounding darkness. We cannot conceive of any state of society more adverse to the intellectual improvement of mankind than one which admitted no middle line between disoluteness and fanatical mortifications. No original writer of any merit arose, and learning may be said to have languished in a region of twilight for the greater part of a thousand years. In 992 it was asserted that scarcely a single person was to be found, in Rome itself, who knew the first elements of letters. Not one priest of a thousand in Spain, about the age of Charlemagne, could address a common letter of salutation to another." In that midnight hour of unnatural superstitions every torch-bearer was persecuted as an enemy of the human race. Bruno, Campanella, Keppler, Vanini, Galilei, Copernicus, Descartes, and Spinoza had to force their way through a snapping and howling pack of monkish fanatics who beset the path of every reformer, and overcome the heroism of all but the stoutest champions of light and freedom. From the tenth to the end of the sixteenth century not less than 3,000,000 "heretics," i.e., scholars and free inquirers, had to expiate their love of truth in the flames of the stake.

The systematic suppression of freedom, in the very instincts of the human mind, turned Christian Europe into a universal slave-pen of bondage and tyranny; there were only captives and jailors, abject serfs and their inhuman masters. Freedom found a refuge only in the fastnesses of the mountains; in the wars against the pagan Saxons the last freemen of the plains were slain like wild beasts; a thousand of their brave leaders were beheaded on the market square of Quedlinburg, thousands were imprisoned in Christian convents, or dragged away to the bondage of feudal and ecclesiastic slave farms where they learned to envy the peace of the dead and the freedom of the lowest savages. "One sees certain dark, livid, naked, sunburnt, wild animals, male and female, scattered over the country and attached to the soil, which they root and turn over with indomitable perseverance. They have, as it were, an articulate voice; and when they rise to their feet they show a human face. They are, in fact, men; they creep at night into dens, where they live on black bread, water, and roots. They spare other men the labor of plowing, sowing, and harvesting, and, therefore, deserve some small share of the bread they have grown. Yet they were the fortunate peasants—those who had bread and work—and they were then the few" (while half the arable territory of France was in the hands of the church). "Feudalism," says Blanqui, "was a concentration of all scourges. The peasant, stripped of the inheritance of his fathers, became the property of ignorant, inexorable, indolent masters. He was obliged to travel fifty leagues with their carts whenever they required it; he labored for them three days in the week, and surrendered to them half the product of his earnings during the other three; without their consent, he could not change his residence or marry. And why, indeed, should he wish to marry, if he could scarcely save enough to maintain himself? The Abbot Alcuin had twenty thousand slaves called serfs, who were forever attached to the soil. This is the great cause of the rapid depopulation observed in the Middle Ages, and of the prodigious multitude of convents which sprang up on every side. It was doubtless a relief to such miserable men to find in the cloisters a retreat from oppression; but the human race never suffered a more cruel outrage, industry never received a wound better calculated to plunge the world again into the darkness of the rudest antiquity. It suffices to say that the prediction of the approaching end of the world, industriously spread by the rapacious monks at this time, was received without terror."

The joy-hating insanities of the unnatural creed blighted the lives of thousands, and trampled the flowers of earth even on the bleak soil of North Britain, where the children of nature need every hour of respite from cheerless toil. "All social pleasures," says Buckle, "all amusements and all the joyful instincts of the human heart were denounced as sinful. The clergy looked on all comforts as sinful in themselves, merely because they were comforts. The great object of life was to be in a state of constant affliction. Whatever pleased the senses was to be suspected. It mattered not what a man liked; the mere fact of his liking it made it sinful. Whatever was natural was wrong."

The dogma of exclusive salvation by faith made forcible conversion appear an act of mercy, and stimulated those wars of aggression that have cost the lives of more than thirty millions of our fellow-men. In the Crusades alone five millions of victims were sacrificed on the altar of fanaticism; the extermination of the Moriscos reduced the population of Spain by seven millions; the man-hunts of the Spanish-American priests almost annihilated the native population of the West Indies and vast areas of Central and South America, once as well-settled as the most fertile regions of Southern Europe. The horrid butcheries in the land of the Albigenses, in the mountain homes of the Vaudois, and the Spanish provinces of the Netherlands exterminated the inhabitants of whole cities and districts, and drenched the fields of earth with the blood of her noblest children.

The neglect of industry and the depreciation of secular pursuits proved the death-blow of rational agriculture. The garden-lands of the Old World became sand-wastes, the soil of the neglected fields was scorched by summer suns and torn by winter floods till three million square miles of once fruitful lands were turned into hopeless deserts. "The fairest and fruitfulest provinces of the Roman empire," says Professor Marsh—"precisely that portion of terrestrial surface, in short, which about the commencement of the Christian era was endowed with the greatest superiority of soil, climate, and position, which had been carried to the highest pitch of physical improvement—is now completely exhausted of its fertility. A territory larger than all Europe, the abundance of which sustained in bygone centuries a population scarcely inferior to that of the whole Christian world at the present day, has been entirely withdrawn from human use, or, at best, is thinly inhabited. . . . There are regions, where the operation of causes, set in action by man, has brought the face of the earth to a state of desolation almost as complete as that of the moon; and though within that brief space of time which we call the historical period, they are known to have been covered with luxuriant woods, verdant pastures, and fertile meadows, they are now too far deteriorated to be reclaimable by man, nor can they become again fitted for his use except through great geological changes or other agencies, over which we have no control. . . . Another era of equal improvidence would reduce this earth to such a condition of impoverished productiveness as to threaten the depravation, barbarism, and, perhaps, even the extinction of the human species" (Man and Nature, pp. 4, 43).

The experience of the Middle Ages has, indeed, been bought at a price which the world cannot afford to pay a second time. The sacrifices of fifteen centuries have failed to purchase the millennium of the Galilean Messiah, and the time has come to seek salvation by a different road.

The Religion of the Future will preach the Gospel of Redemption by reason, by science, and by conformity to the laws of our health-protecting instincts. Its teachings will reconcile instinct and precept, and make Nature the ally of education. Its mission will seek to achieve its triumphs, not by the suppression, but by the encouragement of free inquiry; it will dispense with the aid of pious frauds; its success will be a victory of truth, of freedom, and humanity; it will reconquer our earthly paradise, and teach us to renounce the Eden that has to be reached through the gates of death.

Astronomy and Geology at War.

THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Different Accounts" of world formation—i. e., the biblical and the scientific—is amusing and instructiv. But I cannot refrain from incidentally pointing out the conflict of modern science with itself, or rather the conflict of geology with astronomy. It is assumed that the Laplace theory of cooling and condensing worlds is true, and then, to contradict the biblical assertion that the creation of the world was about six thousand years ago, THE TRUTH SEEKER says:

> The earth in cooling must hav taken three hundred and fifty millions of years.

I turn now to Newcomb's "Popular Astronomy" and quote:

> It is thus found that if the sun had, in the beginning, filled all space, the amount of heat generated by his contraction to his present volume would hav been sufficient to last eighteen million years at his present rate of radiation. We can say with entire certainty that the sun cannot hav been radiating heat at the present rate for more than this period unless he has, in the mean time, received a miraculous accession of energy from some source outside.

Professor Newcomb's calculation is doubtless accepted by every astronomer who believes in the Laplace theory. But it is at war with geological data. If the sun, including our earth and the whole planetary system, has condensed from "all space" in eighteen million, how can this little earth hav been cooling three hundred and fifty million years?

But there is no proof that the sun is contracting or that it ever was any larger than it is now. On the contrary, ages of meteoric accretion must hav enlarged it. And so also we know that the earth is slowly enlarging. This accretion hypothesis is not hampered by time. The growth of worlds is as long as eternity.

No wonder Professor Newcomb is constrained to add that man has probably existed on this planet less than ten thousand years, and civilization less than four thousand. Every well-informed geologist is certain that man has existed at least hundreds of thousands of years, and probably millions.

The fallacy of the Laplace theory can be shown in a few words. The maximum thickness of the earth's fossiliferous strata is fifteen miles or more. The lowest Silurian rock uncovered by later formations contains fossil animals and plants which must hav lived in a mild temperature. But it is certain that other Silurian rocks, containing the same species of animals and plants, are now buried many miles deep under later deposits. Say it is ten miles at the lowest. Now, what is the temperature at that depth? About 1,000° Fahrenheit! So, then, we hav this result: Those Paleozoic creatures, which never could hav lived in a temperature much over 100°, are now in their fossil state heated up to 1,000°. And this is your cooling world! BURR.

An Open Letter to Friends.

Only three more days and I start for Abingdon Court-house, so I pen one more letter to the old TRUTH SEEKER, and in doing so the face and fate of its beloved founder arise vividly before me, almost making me feel as if he was here present reading the lines as they drop from my pen-point. He went through the same round of experiences I hav. At first he was almost alone in his radical views, but determined to speak his honest thought though ever so unpopular, because he felt it was truth and the world needed it. Arrested by post-office spies for obscenity, he stoutly denied the charge, and the "consensus of the competent" pronounced him guiltless, yet he was convicted simply because it was a foregone determination of his enemies that he should be.

A few days more may tell the same tale for me. But I want, while I can, to assure you all how gratified I hav been at the strong support of press and people that has been vouchsafed me. It has helped to mold public opinion at home and abroad, and has made the waiting days pass, not only in toleration, but with actual pleasure and enjoyment.

Over eight hundred letters hav brought the magnetism of kind words, sympathizing words, cheering words, indorsing words, and hopeful words. And words hav not been all! Money for defense has come far more lavishly than I had dared to hope. Should any remain in my hands, when all is over, it will be sent to the National Defense Association, where it can be used to defend others who are unjustly prosecuted and persecuted.

Right here I want to make one simple explanation of what has gone against me more than almost any other one thing. Some months before my arrest I became deeply interested in the subject of hybrids, and in the correspondence many wonderful accounts of monstrosities born of connections between animals and human beings came to me from many quarters. I knew Heywood was interested in all that pertains to sex and heredity, so wrote a note to him telling him of the stories I had received, and to my sorrow and surprise he published the item in the Word. I did not think it fit for publication, so failed to mark it "private," and when I wrote a letter for his paper disclaiming all approval of such connections, I did not think of correcting the impression that I had purposely sent the item for print, and not till I had received letters from several friends telling me they could not help to defend my case because I had advertised these stories in the Word did I see the shape they had taken in other minds.

That it acted as an advertisment I soon realized, for so many wrote for them; but unless I thought the writers interested in the subject for science's sake I refused to send them, and explained to them the manner in which the subject was made public. But I think this is my first explanation for print, and just now, while every act of my past is closely scrutinized, it is well to explain the error and how it occurred. I am usually cautious in placing before the public what I think will be misunderstood or will in any way lead to the vulgarizing of the human mind.

True scientific inquirers will be aided and helped by much that would be harmful to the undeveloped intellect of the ignorant or the very immature. I cannot expect to meet the approval of all on all subjects.

Many of our German friends disapprove of helping me because I believe in Prohibition, but I don't believe in the Prohibitory laws as they are, and are advocated by the church and the masses. I think the government should own and run all manufactories of liquor, and see that all was genuin and unadulterated, and hav it all sold at certain places and stated prices, just as postage stamps are. The people make the laws for the benefit of the whole people, while liquor rings work specially for their own benefit, caring little or nothing for the consumer. It is my propensity of giving the pure and genuin, and furnishing each customer the full value of his money, that has helped place me before the people as I just now find myself.

If a correspondent sent a stamp for information, I always gave all I could, sometimes several dollars' worth, including time and stationery. I am money out on all the work I hav ever done for the public and in the correspondence. I may be out far more than this ere it is all ended, yet I would not take back one iota of it all, even to jail experience and broken health, for I believe it has done great good, and will do still greater. Life is short at the best, and we can each of us do but little. I hav the testimony of hundreds that I hav helped and benefited them. Can one regret doing good? As yet no testimony has come of anyone ever having been harmed by aught I've said or written. So I go quietly to my trial, hoping whatever the verdict of the court may be, that my little world, the Liberal world, will stand by me only one-half as earnestly as they did by D. M. Bennett—only one-half as earnestly as he would, could he hav lived till now. In the bright and hallowed radiance of his honored and beloved name I rest my case, bidding each and all of you a cheerful and hopeful good-bye.

TO ELMINA'S FRIENDS, HELPERS, AND CUSTOMERS.

I am receiving quite a number of letters, the writers of which say they mailed me money and failed to hear from me as to its reception. I hav written to every one who has sent as much as ten cents. I always try to answer all business letters at once. If any hav ordered books or photos, or sent money that has not been acknowledged, they may be sure the fault is in the mails. I mail my letters, packages, and papers myself, and attend to it well. If books fail to reach customers, I shall be glad to hear of it, and will do all I can to make it right. I earnestly thank all who hav aided me by sending for books. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Beecher and Ingersoll.

The beautiful tribute of Robert Ingersoll to the memory of Henry Ward Beecher recalled a unique and characteristic defense of the first-named gentleman by the Plymouth pastor. There had been some talk of a public controversy between the alleged Infidel and Christian, and some members of Plymouth were quite anxious for such a discussion, but the majority were seriously opposed to it. One gentleman in particular was most bitter in his denunciation of Mr. Ingersoll, and among other things remarked, "No man has any right to tear down unless he can build up with equal facility."

"Brother," said Mr. Beecher with a chuckle, "the foundations of your faith must be very knock-kneed, and you ought to be obliged to Ingersoll or any other man who would sweep them away. True faith and true love cannot be disturbed by logician, Infidel, or iconoclast. That which is not true ought to go, and if there is anything I do enjoy it is to see a brave and able man pitch into the superstitions of the age. He can't whack 'em too hard to suit me."

At another time a gentleman was relating a story of Ingersoll's egotism. An admirer of this gentleman desired him to visit his mother, an old lady of seventy, who was an ardent Presbyterian. Mr. Ingersoll declined on the plea of not wishing to unsettle the belief of so venerable a matron.

"The arrogance of supposing himself able to show an old Christian like that the error of her ways!" said the critic with a sneer.

"I don't believe he ever said it," said Mr. Beecher with some irritation. "It is not in harmony with his character. If the lies that are told about public men could be materialized, they would wall in and roof over the whole earth."—Eleanor Kirk in the World.

Prehistoric Man.

A valuable collection, numbering more than ten thousand objects, illustrating the habits and accomplishments of prehistoric man in western Europe, was opened to public exhibition at the Smithsonian Institution, July 7th. These were gathered during a five years' residence abroad by Mr. Thomas Wilson, ex-United States consul at Nice, and his wife. They hav been so arranged as to illustrate the gradual progression of the race from the beginning of the Paleolithic epoch of archæology (the Quaternary of geology) down to and through the Bronze age to its merging with the Iron, just preceding the dawn of prehistoric time.

The series begins with the chipped stone elements of the creatures who, during perhaps sixty or seventy centuries, roamed over all that portion of the continent then above water and not covered with ice. The jaw-bones of these people lack the fixtures, so to speak, to which in modern humanity the tongue muscles are attached; and this leads to the presumption that they did not possess the power of speech. However that may be, the shape of their skulls indicates that they could hav had nothing of interest or importance to say.

The dawn of the Glacial period drove them to the caves, where, during a residence of some centuries, they invented clothes. This is proved by the existence in great numbers of stone scrapers used in preparing the hides of their quadrupedal contemporaries. From chipped stone they hav advanced to ground or polished stone, and thence to implements of bone. Now came the dawn of art, and their finest bone implements were engraved with pictures of the horse, reindeer, and bear.

The collections of pottery and bronze of a much later period are curious and extensiv. Of bronze there are barbed fish hooks, exactly like those of to-day; long pins with globular heads as large as walnuts, the counterparts of the implements used by modern ladies to keep the hat in place; and, finally, there are safety pins, used by Etruscan maidens long before the advent of Romulus and Remus, which contain in the germ every principle of that most useful article known to the modern nursery.

Professor Klein's Star.

Astronomer Klein, of Kentucky, recently made the startling announcement that he had discovered the Star of Bethlehem "in the northwestern heavens near the horizon." Mr. Klein's knowledge of astronomy may be judged by the following letter from Richard A. Proctor to the Globe-Democrat:

Astronomers hav to thank Mr. Klein for the amusement he has afforded them.

The smoked glasses and mirror attachment which hav shown him Cassiopeia in the day-time, though at night he cannot find either the constellation or his marvelous star, would be useful improvements. He should patent them. Hitherto astronomers, idiotic old fogies that they are, hav supposed smoked glasses chiefly useful in diminishing light, not in making faint objects visible.

It may interest Mr. Klein and others ignorant of elementary matters in astronomy to learn that Cassiopeia is never "below the horizon, and consequently invisible from our latitude"—our latitude meaning any latitude in Kentucky. Cassiopeia at midnight, at this season, is as high above the horizon as at 4 in the afternoon. The constellation may be invisible at midnight through smoked glasses or with the mirror attachment in which the Hartford observer rejoices. Smoked glasses and mirror attachments are indeed not greatly esteemed by astronomers as aids in observing stars. But assuredly every star down to the seventh magnitude can be seen in Cassiopeia now at midnight, and Mr. Klein's Star of Bethlehem is not visible among them. While he has been smoking glasses, somebody has been smoking him.

But possibly this portentous new star comes out in the daytime to oblige Mr. Klein, and goes in again—perhaps even works its way out of Cassiopeia to get below the horizon—at night, just to vex astronomers.

Let me explain, however, that though in writing about the matter for European and American magazines and journals I hav done my best to get all the fun out of the Kentuckian professor's "discovery" that lies in it—and that is saying a good deal, for it is the funniest thing I hav yet heard of—I hav been careful not to describe it as an essentially Kentuckian or American achievement. It curiously illustrates prevalent ignorance about matters astronomical—but that is all. Respectfully yours, RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

Lectures and Meetings.

SINCE the commencement of the lecture season last fall, J. E. Remsburg has delivered three hundred lectures.

J. HENRY SCHROEDER, of Arago, Coos county, Or., under date of June 18th, writes: "Coos county was struck with a Liberal cyclone this week. It visited Myrtle Point first on the 14th inst., and swept through Arago, Coquelle City, Bandon, and Marshfield, and is expected to spend its force at Empire City to-morrow night, and then leave the county for other parts of the state. Its course from here has not been definitly calculated, but will be northward as far as Washington territory, then east. It would be advisable for people north of here to prepare for it. It seemed to increase in force, so that Coquelle and Bandon got a little heavier dose than the two first-mentioned places. Marshfield and Empire City are yet to hear from. The damage cannot yet be estimated. Fortunately there was nobody killed. It seems that the principal damage done was a mental disturbance, and it is feared that some will not recover. The most singular feature of the affair is that a majority, especially those who sustained the greatest damage, are now praying that it may retrace its course and visit us again, and complete the destruction. They would rather build on a new and strong foundation than patch up an old and partially worn structure. Later.—Some hav not yet recovered from the shock, and are undecided. The present outlook, however, is that those who lack the means ('poor sinners') will patch up the old structure and make it serve their purpose a while longer, while others more energetic hav already commenced to clear away the debris, and will build anew. Some are talking of emigrating, but cannot decide where to go. Nearly all the Liberals here are showing a spirit of self-sacrifice by rendering every necessary assistance, and doing all in their power to alleviate the suffering of the poor unfortunates. Putnam is a brick. He has endeared himself to us by his congeniality and gentlemanly deportment, as well as his devotion to the cause of humanity. We hav lived in a new earth this week, and hope to reach the new heaven in the future. The 'American Democracy' is our ideal, and we hav decided to enlist in the cause and fight for the same. The Coquelle Liberal Union was organized at Bandon, Coos county, Or., on the 16th inst. J. Henry Schroeder was chosen temporary president, and J. M. Upton secretary. It will hav a membership of over one hundred, and looks forward with pleasure to the time when it may affiliate with other organizations of the kind, and do its part in the reformation."

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

As I read the letter, "It's a hard case," said Mr. Lincoln, "but what can I do? I hav no more money than she has. Can't you take her off my hands?" I said in answer, "Mr. President, when I came in I told you I was very glad I had no favor to ask of you, but really I shall be most happy to grant you one, and so if you will write on this envelope the words you hav just said to me, 'It is hard, but I, the president, hav no more money than she has.—Abraham Lincoln,'" said I, "I will take her and see that the sick woman's rent is paid." The president put on a look which meant, "You hav the best of me," took the letter, and wrote on the outside, "I consider this a very worthy case.—Abe Lincoln." I took the woman, but I learned in that conversation of perhaps something more than fifteen minutes that he, Mr. Lincoln, was not glad to be the emancipator of a race of slaves. Perhaps he came to rejoice over it when he realized that by the logic of events his name would be immortal for that act, but he did not see it then. He believed in the white race and not in the colored, and he did not want them to be equal politically or socially. My work continued with the freed people through the year, though I often visited the hospitals, and did what I could to while the time away with the poor maimed and homesick soldiers.

A woman's presence was always a joy to them. There was a volunteer nurse, a Mrs. Mary Parker, with whom I was intimately acquainted, whose name should be printed in letters of gold on enduring marble. She worked without salary, as she did not please the woman who had charge of the nurse's department, and was therefore summarily dismissed from government employment; but she worked, giving herself very little rest, day or night, sleeping for an hour or two wherever night overtook her. She slept in the warehouse where the soldiers' supplies were kept, when within reach of the building, on a pile of blankets, and if the blankets were gone, on the boxes. She visited all the hospitals in the entire district once a week if possible, but her daily visits were at the hospitals in Alexandria. The soldiers told her all their grievances, and she never once failed to get them removed, when they were found to be real, and not the effect of a morbid condition of the sufferer. After the first year of work, she had become so well known to President Lincoln that he said to those whom it concerned, "When Mrs. Parker asks for an ambulance, giv her the best pair of horses and the most trusty driver. There's no need of questioning her; she is on some mission of mercy which everyone else has forgotten." The surgeon-general became her powerful friend, and more than one incompetent or cruel surgeon lost his place by being represented to him (the surgeon-general) in his true colors by Mrs. Parker. She shared the soldiers' rations, and the soldiers shared with her whatever friends sent to her for her comfort.

One day she came to my room with her feet literally on the ground. She did not know it, though it was in March, and wet and cold. She was full of enthusiasm about a young soldier whom she had in her tent (some of the Western soldiers had given her a tent, and now she had a home). He was very young, had fallen away on his march, and was reported drunk or a deserter. Mrs. Parker had found him, knew that he was sick, had ordered an ambulance and brought him to her home, and after making him comfortable, she had been to the president, and he had said, "Yes, yes," to whatever she desired, and now on her way home she had called to tell me and to ask me to come and see "her dear sick boy." I looked down at her feet, her toes protruding from the holes in her shoes, and said, "Mary Parker, you havn't been into the White House in such a plight?" She said, "I didn't once think of my feet, and I don't think the president saw them. I was in such haste to get the pardon before my poor boy soldier dies, so that he could see it." I took from my purse five dollars and said, "Swear to me that you will buy you a pair of shoes on your way home, and I will giv you this money to pay for them. I can't afford to giv it to you for any other purpose." She said, "I will." But when, a week from that time, she came to tell me the young soldier was dead and buried, her feet were in the same ragged shoes. I said, "Your feet—what does it mean?" "I couldn't help it. I know if you had been with me and seen the soldier that I used that money for, you would hav forgotten bare feet." Such was Mary Parker, who for all the years of the war gave herself to the welfare of the soldier. She never received one dollar from the government for her services, but I hope some of the soldiers for whom she worked so faithfully remembered her and made her some remuneration.

Jane Gray Swisshelm, one of the earliest of the Woman's Rights women, a lineal descendant of the family to which Lady Jane Gray belonged, did valiant service in the hospitals. She had the same power, perhaps in a less degree, that the late Dr. LaRoy Sunderland possessed. Her hands always soothed the patient; even the amputation of a limb seemed not painful if only Mrs. Swisshelm was the assistant; her touch overcame the suffering. But like Mrs. Parker (the nurse), she could not come under rules. She knew what and how to do, and when to do it, and so, as a soldier, she would hav been a sharp-shooter or a scout, never a subordinate. It was my privilege to know her well, and knowing, to appreciate her. I used to think, as on my visits to my various schools, I met or passed the ambulances filled with maimed and bleeding men, and often dying men, how great must hav been the wrong of chattel slavery that required such a sacrifice of life to abolish, and wonder if woman were only an activ power in the government if she would not hav found a way to remove the wrong without the dreadful war; but the thing that most distressed me was the seeing of young boys handcuffed together in charge of some officer, accused of deserting or some lesser offense. These boys—they were not old enough for men—had been, in many cases, hired by some men as substitutes for themselvs, they, the boys, having no idea what a soldier's life meant; charmed by the martial music and the persuasiv power of the speakers, they had enlisted. The life was too much for either their physical or moral nature to endure, and so they had fallen and were prisoners. At last came the end and Richmond was taken, but one morning, not a month after the joyful news, came the shock of the president's death. What need to write it? Is not every one familiar with the tragedy? One thing you are not familiar with unless you were a witness; that is, the grief of the colored people all through the District of Columbia. They had looked upon the president as their savior, and loved him as such, and, added to their grief, they feared now they would be returned to bondage. It was touching to hear their wailings; every hut whose occupant possessed a rag of black cloth, or, not possessing, could obtain it, found it a delight to hang it over the door, and when the day came when, for the time being, all, without regard to the color of the skin, were allowed to enter the White House, not one failed to look upon the face of their dead friend. And now came the trial of the assassinators, all of which you will find in the chronicles of the day. I only make this record, that, so far as I could judge from the evidence, and I attended the trial, Mrs. Surratt had no more to do with the murder of President Lincoln than had any other rebel woman. She, no doubt, desired it, as did many another rebel, but that she in any way aided or abetted, or even knew anything about it until after the occurrence, was not, in my opinion, proved even by circumstantial evidence; but men seemed mad. I was present in the court when Mrs. Surratt's daughter entered, looking wild with grief. She was not allowed to look one moment upon her mother, but one of the officials took hold of the poor girl's shoulders, turned her around, and put her out of the court. Mrs. Surratt was not allowed speech with a woman after her arrest. Man made the law, man arrested her, man tried her, by man she was pronounced guilty, and by man she was hung by the neck until she was dead. I do not find anything to say about "woman's rights;" it is all woman's wrongs. My good cousin need not hav warned me that I would make my reminiscences unpopular by writing of the rights of women; I find so much of wrongs that I hav no space for rights. I think great injustice was done to one man, perhaps two, who were found guilty of aiding in the assassination; but the people were mad with fear, and the civil authorities and military commission that tried the prisoners only carried out the will of the people at large. Had they become less bloodthirsty, that they were so careful of the arch-traitor, Jefferson Davis?

The Iron Bed of Procrustes.

From Unity.

The age of fable has bequeathed us a very suggestiv bit of mythology in the story of Procrustes. Upon an iron bedstead which this notorious highwayman possessed, all the victims which fell into his hands were stretched. If they were too long for the bed, their legs were cut off. If too short, they were stretched. Bed and victim must be made to fit at any cost.

This myth suggests an analogy in the mental history of man. Established opinion has ever been tramping up and down the highway of thought and has stretched upon the Procrustean bed of torture the advanced thinkers of every age.

In the past men of independent thought were burnt, poisoned, hung, drowned, buried alive, smothered, crucified, for attempting to enlarge or purify the world's knowledge and life. None of these things are done now. The man of ideas is merely figurativly stretched on the Procrustean bed of dogmatism. Instead of chopping off his legs, his character is impugned, his heart declared hardened, his sanity impeached. Instead of stretching the thinker's limbs, his ideas are tortured and twisted and bent until their original form and power is destroyed.

Time was in Christian history when the church willingly sacrificed life in the holy effort to make earth's noblest men fit the iron bed of dogma! Mother Church found the monk Luther an eccentric child. She tried to put him to bed and to sleep, but he refused to be silenced by such benumbing lullaby. The success of Luther's protest encouraged the human spirit. Since his time the rise and progress of Rationalism and the disintegration of dogmatic theology has been a movement of steadily increasing breadth and momentum.

Organized Christianity is now ashamed of its iron bed. But no amount of sanctimonious whitewash or pious paint can efface the stains and spots upon it. Liberal and humane men in all denominations wish to put the hateful thing in the theological attic. But mark the irony of fate. Science and the purified religious consciousness of humanity insist in bringing that iron bed (the plan of which was revealed from heaven) into the clear light of day.

It is not proposed to stretch persons upon this bedstead. The intelligence of the age proposes to put it to a new and more noble use. Henceforth it shall be called the bed of truth, and all ideas which will not fit it must be modified until they do. If any man chooses to tie to theories that cannot rest peacefully upon this humanized Procrustean bed, he may be permitted to do so. There is no law to prevent one from believing in any amount of superstition, except the law of right thinking; and if one will ignore that law, there is little to be said. People may lie down on their bed of dogmatism in fancied security, but the coverings that prevent contact with the iron framework of truth are being rapidly worn out, and at no distant day contact with reality will startle the human mind into a self-conscious appreciation of the fact that it has been bound for centuries upon the Procrustean bed of delusion.

Parable of the Monkeys.

In a certain forest on the far-distant borders of the sea there lived a tribe of monkeys. Though their rank in civilization and learning was comparativly low, these monkeys led a life of peace and contentment. They obeyed implicitly the mandates of their ruler, adhered strictly to the laws of the tribe, and performed their religious duties with devotion and sincerity. Old age and infirmities were respected, the weaker sex was treated with deference and spared the harder portions of the toils, and toward one another they were peaceful and considerate. Temperance and morality governed all their actions and desires, dishonesty or deceit was never practiced, and, in short, vice was unknown to these simple monkeys.

The Great Orang-outang was worshiped as their creator. They prayed to him for relief or succor, adored him for the blessings they enjoyed, and praised him for his goodness and greatness and wonderful works. Life, they had learned to believe, was given them for the sole purpose of being enjoyed; therefore was true and perfect happiness made the object of their lives. And as contentment and pleasure were found with the knowledge they possessed, and in their mode of living, any advancement was never desired, and was, moreover, unnecessary. But withal, these monkeys were industrious; for their idea of a life of happiness was not that it consisted of idleness. Each performed diligently his share of the work necessary for the welfare and maintenance of his family and the tribe.

As in their forest was found all they desired, nought was cared for the world outside of it; save at times to wonder, while gazing out over the vast expanse of sea, what strange things lay beyond the horizon.

And thus they lived, and had lived, from generation to generation, in peace, simplicity, and virtue.

One day several strange monkeys came into the forest. Notwithstanding that they were of a tribe entirely different from and unknown to the nativ monkeys, and that their speech, appearance, and action caused them to be looked upon with mixed reverence and fear as beings of a superior order, they were received hospitably and treated with all the civility and kindness the nativ monkeys were capable of showing them.

"We hav come," said they, "from the big forest across the sea to teach you the truth, so that you can be wise and good, as we are, and as all monkeys are who worship the Great Baboon, the true creator. At present you are ignorant, unhappy, and barely civilized; you cannot be good, or peaceful, or contented; for how is it possible when your religion is so low and untrue, and you so abominably wicked as to worship a false creator? But rejoice! for we hav come to teach you the blessed truth and save you from the wrath of the Great Baboon."

The nativ monkeys were both perplexed and displeased. They regarded these strangers as far superior to themselvs in wisdom, and could not therefore but admit that they were in possession of many truths unknown to them, yet they failed to comprehend the truth of what had just been heard, and to understand by what right those denunciations of both themselvs and their beliefs had been made.

"You say we are wicked and unhappy because we worship the Great Orang-outang. We fail to comprehend. We obey our creator's laws, and they tell us to be good and happy. You say we should worship the Great Baboon. We do not know who he is; we never heard of him. Why, then, shall we worship him? The Great Orang-outang made this forest, and the sea, and the whole world; and he made the sun, and the moon, and all the stars; and it is he who givs life to the monkeys and all other creatures. We hav heard him and hav seen his wonderful manifestations; and many generations ago he appeared at times to certain of our ancestors, and talked with them and gave them laws. Therefore we worship him, for he is the creator."

"You poor deluded monkeys!" replied the strangers in pitying accents, and rolling up their eyes, "surely it is time you are delivered from your blindness. We are much wiser than you, and you must believe what we tell you and not question the truth of it. The Great Baboon is merciful, therefore has he sent us to teach you to worship him. For if we had not come, you would hav gone, after death, to the Horned Gorilla, who livs in a great, cold plain, where there is no fruit or water, and not even a tree, and no light or heat, but it is so cold that all those go there freeze forever and ever, without once being able to become warm or escape. It is there all monkeys go who do not worship the Great Baboon; and it is there you will go if you do not believe what we tell you. You must not believe in the Great Orang-outang, for there is no such being. You say he gave you laws and talked to different ones of your tribe; that is not true. The Great Baboon is the only real creator. He has many times appeared to monkeys and has given them laws, which are written in a book; and if you obey these laws and pray to the Great Baboon for forgivness, you will become as good and wise as we, and civilized like the monkeys of the big forest across the sea. And after death, you will go to the Great Baboon's beautiful forest among the stars, where you will liv in infinit bliss forever and ever with a golden bell on the end of your tail."

And thus these worshipers of the Great Baboon haranged for a long time; dilating on the horrible sufferings to be endured in the company of the Horned Gorilla, and the manifold wonders and delights of the Great Baboon's forest; relating numerous tales of the creator's power and mercy and loving kindness, and reading from the book in which his laws were written; referring continually to the ignorance and wickedness of their hearers, and endeavoring to dissatisfy them with their condition by glowing descriptions of the innumerable blessings, wonderful advancement, and marvelous achievements of the believers in the Great Baboon, and promising them that by adopting the true faith they, too, would enjoy the same advantages. And so they continued, reasoning, entreating, threatening, and commanding, while they enforced the truth of the new faith and their assertions of being messengers from the Great Baboon by the performance of certain tricks which, though commonplace to anyone of their own tribe, appeared to the nativ monkeys as miracles performed through the divine agency of the creator. In this manner, then, they worked upon the simplicity and superstitions of these monkeys, who, though at first attempting to remonstrate, were gradually overcome; and finally, believing themselvs the most unhappy and wicked creatures on the face of the earth, they abandoned their faith to adopt the better one for fear of eternal punishment, and in the hope of being able to find at least a small amount of true peace and enjoyment while they remained in this world.

And now more of the Great Baboon worshipers from across the sea arrived; and, like their predecessors, were shown the greatest civility and respect by the nativ monkeys. They were given shelter and furnished with fruits and nuts, and shown where the coolest springs were to be found. In return, the nativ monkeys were treated with hypocritical kindness; their honesty and unsuspicious natures being taken advantage of to impose upon and grossly defraud them whenever the smallest opportunity offered, so that, ere long, they found themselvs becoming impoverished for want of food, and obliged to retire deeper into the forest in order to allow the invaders to possess and make use of those better portions of it which had been obtained by barefaced fraud. They were the witnesses of acts of intemperance and immorality which, at first, shocked their finer instincts, but by constant repetition these instincts became dulled, and finally died out. Thus these civilized worshipers of the Great Baboon robbed them, not only of their worldly possessions, but of their nobler and better natures, with all their attendant attributes; and when, in natural consequence, the nativ monkeys became quarrelsome and vicious, and imitated the crimes and vices of their superiors, they were not only threatened with the most direful vengeance of both the Great Baboon and Horned Gorilla, but were severely chastised and treated with the utmost contempt and cruelty.

At length one day a large number more of the Baboon worshipers came into the forest. They informed the nativ monkeys they had come to settle there, and that therefore the forest now belonged to them. The nativ monkeys failed to perceive the lawfulness of this, and having learned by sad experience the treatment likely to be received should these civilized monkeys become their masters and rulers, they attempted to drive them out. But, they being unacquainted with the art of warfare, the invaders, with their superior weapons and knowledge of fighting, overcame them and slaughtered them without mercy, killing their children, outraging their wives and daughters, and destroying whatever belonged to them. This one-sided warfare continued till but a comparativly few of the nativ monkeys remained. These surrendered themselvs as slaves to the conquerors. Then the Great Baboon worshipers sang a song of thanksgiving to their creator for allowing them to so easily obtain so beautiful a forest, and prayed to him that all those wicked monkeys who had been killed in resisting them might go to the Horned Gorilla, and that those who had escaped might be obliged to undergo the severest hardships as a just retribution for their sins.

Only a few of the once peaceful and happy tribe of monkeys now remained. Their former home was a long, long distance away. No more could they look out over the sparkling sea or ramble along its shore; no more could they drink from their favorit springs, or gather the choicest nuts and fruits, or frequent their accustomed haunts; no more could they roam at will through the beautiful forest, and no more could they call every part of it their own—all had been taken from them. Their freedom was gone, their happiness was a thing of the past, and ere long the existence of the tribe itself would be as something of long ago.

They lived in want and degradation in a strange, unknown part of the forest, whither they had been driven by the encroachments of the civilized monkeys. In place of their once happy ignorance of vice and of their former virtuous and upright character, were moral depravity and a familiarity with the lowest of vices and crimes. Intoxication, licentiousness, and their attendant evils had already performed their share in reducing the tribe, and were now aiding in the destruction of the few survivors. There was no desire for any manual labor, and moreover, these monkeys were utterly unfit for work of any kind, having lost all their vigor and energy. Their belief in the Great Orang-outang had long been supplanted by that in the Great Baboon.

This, then, was what the true religion and its civilized adherents had done for these monkeys; and it was to them an inestimable gain, as they had been able to lay hold on eternal life. All their present degradation and wickedness were no drawbacks to everlasting bliss; for they had at last acquired that promised and long-sought-for wisdom and virtue in being able to comprehend and comply with the great, yet simple, maxim, "Only believe and you shall be saved!"

The Liberty of Thought and Discussion.

JOHN STUART MILL "ON LIBERTY."

If the teachers of mankind are to be cognizant of all that they ought to know, everything must be free to be written and published without restraint.

If the intellect and judgment of mankind ought to be cultivated, a thing which Protestants at least do not deny, on what can these faculties be more appropriately exercised by anyone, than on the things which concern him so much that it is considered necessary for him to hold opinions on them? If the cultivation of the understanding consists in one thing more than in another, it is surely in learning the grounds of one's own opinions. Whatever people believe, on subjects on which it is of the first importance to believe rightly, they ought to be able to defend against at least the common objections.

Where there is a tacit convention that principles are not to be disputed; where the discussion of the greatest questions which can occupy humanity is considered to be closed, we cannot hope to find that generally high scale of mental activity which has made some periods of history so remarkable. Never when controversy avoided the subjects which are large and important enough to kindle enthusiasm, was the mind of a people stirred up from its foundations, and the impulse given which raised even persons of the most ordinary intellect to something of the dignity of thinking beings.

The peculiarity of the evidence of mathematical truths is, that all the argument is on one side. There are no objections, and no answers to objections. But on every subject on which difference of opinion is possible, the truth depends on a balance to be struck between two sets of conflicting reasons. Even in natural philosophy, there is always some other explanation possible of the same facts; some geocentric theory instead of heliocentric, some phlogiston instead of oxygen; and it has to be shown why that other theory cannot be the true one; and until this is shown, and until we know how it is shown, we do not understand the grounds of our opinion. But when we turn to subjects infinitly more complicated, to morals, religion, politics, social relations, and the business of life, three-fourths of the arguments for every disputed opinion consist in dispelling the appearances which favor some opinion different from it.

Mankind ought to hav a rational assurance that all objections hav been satisfactorily answered; and how are they to be answered if that which requires to be answered is not spoken? or how can the answer be known to be satisfactory, if the objectors hav no opportunity of showing that it is unsatisfactory? If not the public, at least the philosophers and theologians who are to resolve the difficulties, must make themselves familiar with those difficulties in their most puzzling form; and this cannot be accomplished unless they are freely stated, and placed in the most advantageous light which they admit of.

If, however, the mischievous operation of the absence of free discussion, when the received opinions are true, were confined to leaving men ignorant of the grounds of those opinions, it might be thought that this, if an intellectual, is no moral evil, and does not affect the worth of the opinions, regarded in their influence on the character. The fact, however, is, that not only the grounds of the opinion are forgotten in the absence of discussion, but too often the meaning of the opinion itself. The words which convey it cease to suggest ideas, or suggest only a small portion of those they were originally employed to communicate. Instead of a vivid conception and a living belief, there remain only a few phrases retained by rote; or, if any part, the shell and husk only of the meaning is retained, the finer essence being lost. The great chapter in human history which this fact occupies and fills, cannot be too earnestly studied and meditated on.

The greatest orator, save one, of antiquity, has left it on record that he always studied his adversary's case with as great, if not with still greater, intensity than even his own. What Cicero practiced as the means of forensic success, requires to be imitated by all who study any subject in order to arrive at the truth. He who knows only his own side of the case, knows little of that. His reasons may be good, and no one may hav been able to refute them. But if he is equally unable to refute the reasons on the opposit side; if he does not so much as know what they are, he has no ground for preferring either opinion. The rational position for him would be suspension of judgment, and unless he contents himself with that, he is either led by authority, or adopts, like the generality of the world, the side to which he feels most inclination. Nor is it enough that he should hear the arguments of adversaries from his own teachers, presented as they state them, and accompanied by what they offer as refutations. That is not the way to do justice to the arguments, or bring them into real contact with his own mind. He must be able to hear them from persons who actually believe them; who defend them in earnest, and do their very utmost for them. He must know them in their most plausible and persuasiv form; he must feel the whole force of the difficulty which the true view of the subject has to encounter and dispose of; else he will never really possess himself of the portion of truth which meets and removes that difficulty. Ninety-nine in a hundred of what are called educated men are in this condition; even of those who can argue fluently for their opinions. Their conclusion may be true, but it might be false for anything they know; they hav never thrown themselves into the mental position of those who think differently from them, and considered what such persons may hav to say; and consequently they do not, in any proper sense of the word, know the doctrin which they themselvs profess. They do not know those parts of it which explain and justify the remainder; the considerations which show that a fact which seemingly conflicts with another is reconcilable with it, or that, of two apparently strong reasons, one and not the other ought to be preferred. All that part of the truth which turns the scale, and decides the judgment of a completely informed mind, they are strangers to; nor is it ever really known but to those who hav attended equally and impartially to both sides, and endeavored to see the reasons of both in the strongest light. So essential is this disciplin to a real understanding of moral and human subjects, that if opponents of all important truths do not exist, it is indispensable to imagin them, and supply them with the strongest arguments which the most skilful devil's advocate can conjure up.

Beecher and Comstock.

How does it happen that Mr. E. W. Bok, who was chosen, or appointed himself, to compile a "memorial" volume of tributes to Henry Ward Beecher, has included Anthony Comstock in the list of contributors? For, by all that is strange, Anthony Comstock is in that list, and gets off the following piece of labored exordium:

"What pen can describe the gifts with which the almighty endowed Henry Ward Beecher? As well attempt to count the sands of the sea or the drops in the ocean. Who can comprehend his genius? By what standard of measurement or process of description can one compass his diversity of gifts? But over and above all eloquence, genius, and powers stands, in my mind, the grandeur of a heart so filled with love to God that he regarded all mankind as his brethren. Charity abounded to all. Malice had no place of allodgment in his heart. Misrepresentations of what he said and did were abundant. These attacks were often especially exasperating and hard to bear; and yet over all in his heart seemed written, 'Love to God,' and this seemed the keynote of peace and joy in his life.

"Mr. Beecher endeared himself to the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, and to myself, by his defending and espousing our cause at various times. No amount of opposition, obloquy, or reproach which we had to encounter could daunt his courage in support of our cause. His eloquent voice more than once was heard in our behalf.

"That life that went out so quietly on Brooklyn Hights disappeared as disappears the morning star, which sinks not down behind a darkened west, but melts away with the brighter effulgence of the rising sun; that life seems to whisper back the song of the angels, 'Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will to men!'

"ANTHONY COMSTOCK."

As this is a string of hackneyed commonplaces, it is exactly what might be expected from a man of Comstock's mental caliber, but it can add nothing to the fame of Henry Ward Beecher. That phase of Beecher's character—namely, his detestation of Calvinism—which made him worthy of the words written of him by Ingersoll, is the one with which his name will be most honorably associated in history, and it is also the very phase that religious Pecksniffs like Comstock could never understand or appreciate. Their defense of Beecher weighs as testimony against him. To excite the admiration of hypocrisy is a misfortune to any public or private citizen.

Beecher's connection with the Society for the Suppression of Vice came about through his son, William C. Beecher, acting as attorney for Comstock. Probably no eminent father ever tried harder to hoist his sons up to his own level than did Henry Ward Beecher, and what recognition his services as a campaign orator entitled him to he was willing they should receive, and they hav received it. If the secret history of the "disgusting" literature bill were known, it would doubtless be found that Beecher's indorsement of the Vice Society secured the signing of that act by Governor Hill. William C. Beecher, Comstock's attorney, going to Washington with his father's name as a talisman, would at once secure the sympathy of the president; and an intimation from Cleveland to Hill that the signing of the bill would be considered a favor could not well be disregarded. The fact that Governor Hill affixed his signature on the morning of the day when otherwise the bill would hav failed, would indicate that in some manner his mind was mysteriously quickened.

But the misuse of Beecher's name by the Vice Society will not end here. Comstock's success at Albany is likely to take him to Washington with a similar bill, or a worse one, to be incorporated in the postal statutes. He will be backed by the church, and the legislature will be as wax when he lays his obscene hand upon it. And if, as is said and believed, Cleveland used his influence to secure the signing of the "disgusting" literature bill in New York, no opposition will be encountered from him when it is proposed as a United States law. Then we may expect another reign of the Comstock terror; for when the word "disgusting" is applied with all its synonyms and modifications, it can be made to bring within the meaning of the statute any thing or publication which excites the aversion of a religious or ignorant jury.

It is not a flattering commentary upon contemporary statesmanship that such a law could be passed by our legislatures, and it is to the discredit of Henry Ward Beecher that he gave the power of his name to be used by the society with which the law originated.

Our Tenement Houses.

Fr. J. O. S. Huntington, who is a Protestant Episcopal monk, contributes to the current number of the Forum an article on "Tenement House Morality," which, if its statements are true, as they doubtless are, shows that we hav forms of misery and degradation in New York unequaled anywhere else in the world. A gratifying feature of the article is that, though from the pen of a monk, it is wholly free from religious cant. Mr. Huntington describes one block of a tenement-house district which he visited. The block, he says, measures 700 by 200 feet. On all sides are rows of tenements four or five stories high. Behind one-third of the houses in these rows are rear houses, with smaller rooms, darker and dirtier passages, backed often by another rear-house, a brewery, a stable, or a factory. Altogether there are 1,736 rooms. In these rooms liv 2,076 souls, divided into 460 families; thus, on the average, each family of five persons occupies three rooms. The population of some parts of New York is 290,000 to the square mile; the most densely populated part of London has 170,000. Of course, in many cases, the family is larger (some of the very poorest people take lodgers), and in a number of cases he found fourteen or fifteen grown persons occupying two rooms, or even one. And then many of these "rooms" are hardly more than closets, and dark closets at that. Almost all the bedrooms measure only seven feet by nine, and hav but one door and one window. The door leads into the apartment that serves as kitchen, parlor, sitting-room, laundry, and workshop, and the window opens on a dark stairway, up which the moisture from the cellar and the sewer-gas from the drains are continually rising. One-fifth of these rooms, too, are in basements below the level of the street, and nearly half of even the outer rooms open into courts only twenty feet wide, in which are usually several wooden privies for the use of the fifteen or twenty families in the front and rear houses.

In these rooms are found sometimes two or three married couples, and a half dozen grown or half-grown girls and boys. In hot weather doors and windows are opened to let in what air may be stirring, and such a thing as family privacy is, of course, out of the question, and therefore unknown. Under such circumstances the morals of the barnyard, or worse, is the only morals possible. Added to this are the misery, the squalor, and the filth to which any well-kept barnyard is a stranger. "Even bodily cleanliness is impossible. Bath-rooms are unknown in tenement houses, and the public baths, open only a few months of the year, often afford but fresh opportunities for vice." In most families what little bathing is done must be done in the presence of others. Of course, says Mr. Huntington, sickness and death hav their own horrors. What little privacy may be possible for the well is often denied to the sick, who, to get any air at all, must lie in the room used by the whole family for almost every purpose. "And death, from its frequency, and the coarseness that surrounds it, loses, if not all its terrors, at least its dignity, and is regarded as one of the many disagreeable accidents of life, hardly worthy even of idle curiosity. The corpse lies for two days in the room where the family eats, works, and often sleeps."

Children in these tenement houses must find their playground "in the dirty street in front of the block, or in the dirty yard, half filled with privies, behind. When it rains the children play in the cellars, sailing their boats on the water that often stands there, or wading ankle-deep in it." With all their opportunities for observation, with their eyes open to see everything, and with their ears open to hear everything, the period of childish innocence is passed at nine or ten years of age. Girls and boys of that age are found who, as Felix Adler described it, hav "already eaten of the tree of knowledge." About these tenements there is no such thing as the home influence, but the world outside has its attractions—saloons, dance-houses, gilded vice. To these the youth are drawn, and from them the boys are likely to be graduated for the penitentiary, the girls for something worse.

The conclusion which the writer reaches is that morality in tenement houses is practically impossible. He asks: "Can anything be done to set things right?" and here he makes this significant admission:

"Of course something is being accomplished for a small portion of the young people in tenement districts by the various chapels, mission-rooms, guild and reading-rooms, schools and libraries, but these are, for the most part, only palliatives of the misery; and an increasing number of the hardest workers in the cause of philanthropy are beginning to question whether all our charitable agencies and institutions, by making the lives of tenement-house people just not intolerable, may not be actually increasing the evils that they are organized to redress."

Such an admission from a priest should hav weight with those who seek to relieve misery through charity alone. Charity has its uses. The starving man should be fed; the sick should be cared for, but the organized charity of the churches breeds vagabondage and laziness, and destroys manhood and independence. It is demoralizing to any person to receive that which he has done nothing to earn.

Exactly what the remedy for the evils of tenement-house life is to be Mr. Huntington does not say, and perhaps no man can say. It would seem that responsibility rests chiefly with the owners of the houses, who permit large numbers to liv in small quarters. If every landlord performed his duty in this regard; if every house were supplied with a janitor to see that hallways, yards, and cellars were kept clean; if the street cleaning department would do the work it is paid to do; if the health department were as activ as it ought to be, and if New York had a water supply adequate to its needs, we should shortly see a vast improvement in the tenement-house districts; and it is a great deal better to begin with reforms of this kind than to mark out for the abolition of poverty and immorality some great scheme that can never be realized. All will agree with Mr. Huntington that "this is not a matter for sentiment or pious condolence, but for justice."

It may be with some a cause for rejoicing that, in view of all the poverty, suffering, vice, and want in overcrowded, squalid, and reeking tenement houses, the Episcopalians of New York are about to erect a six-million dollar cathedral Also that we shall then hav in this city some seventy million dollars' worth of church property which pays no taxes, and which consequently throws a larger burden upon the rent-payer, from whom all taxes are finally drawn. Certainly, Father Huntington, we want less piety and more justice.

Trifling with Legal Machinery.

When the hotel men of New York waited upon Mayor Hewitt and asked for relief from the odious Sunday law, the mayor informed them that he was powerless in the matter. He would suggest, however, that they might break the law, refuse to giv bail, and, under a writ of habeas corpus, carry the case to the Court of Appeals. As mayor, of course, he would not advise them to break the law—he merely offered a suggestion. This suggestion the hotel men adopted, and in pursuance of a previous arrangement one of their number was to be arrested on the following Sunday. It was plainly a conspiracy to break the law, and the captain of the precinct was drawn into it. On Sunday he visited a hotel and ordered dinner, with wine, which was served. The captain dipped a piece of bread in the wine, swallowed it, and thereupon placed the proprietor of the hotel under arrest. The prisoner accompanied the officer to court, where the judge held him for trial, but, exercising judicial discretion, allowed him to depart in the custody of his counsel. The prisoner went back to his hotel and resumed business, and the lawyer went to his office. The parties appeared in court, the police captain guarding his prisoner with a show of mock vigilance, and counsel arose and, with due solemnity, formally demanded that cause be shown why his client was restrained of his liberty. As a matter of fact, the client had not been restrained at all. Counsel next asked an adjournment, which was granted, the prisoner being again placed in custody of his lawyer. When the case finally came to trial the judge decided, as he was bound to do, that the prisoner was guilty as charged, his license plainly prohibiting the sale of wine on Sunday. Up to this point the proceeding had been a farce under the forms of law. The reports said that the court could not keep a straight face, and the counsel bubbled over with laughter. It was a jolly affair all around.

The convict, though nominally restrained of his liberty, remained in custody of his counsel as before. Through writs of habeas corpus the case went to other courts, and it was finally decided that the words forbidding the sale of wine to any person did not include guests of a hotel. No definition of "guest" was given, and the hotel-keepers are left to construe it to suit themselvs. Consequently, any person who sits at the table of any hostelry in this city, provided he order a sandwich or a doughnut, can hav served to him all the liquor he is ready to pay for.

This case has been a legal burlesque from beginning to end. There was about it none of the majesty of the law calculated to strike terror to the heart of the evil-doer; but nothing else could be expected in the execution of Puritanical blue laws which neither judges, prosecutors, nor the man making the arrest believe in enforcing, and which it is probable they all habitually break. The chief executiv of the municipality, Mayor Hewitt himself, under the thin disguise of a suggestion, advised the breaking of the law, a police captain connived at it, and the high courts of justice lent themselvs as actors in the ridiculous farce. No mock trial could be more absurd. It is a different thing, however, when the small saloon-keeper is fined a hundred dollars for serving a customer with a glass of beer on Sunday.

The moral is that the Sunday laws should be repealed.

McGlynn.

The curse of Rome has finally fallen upon "the priest McGlynn." Michael Augustine, otherwise Archbishop Corrigan, on July 8th made public a letter, in which, after setting forth the reasons therefor, he makes the following announcement:

"It has become also our duty to declare to the clergy and laity of our charge, which we do by these letters, that the Rev. Dr. Edward McGlynn is excommunicated nominatim, with all the penalties attached to this censure by the canons of the church."

The penalties are that Dr. McGlynn is "cut off from the communion of the church, from its sacraments and participation in its prayers, and, should he persevere in his contumacy, deprived of the right after death of Christian burial." Hereafter no good Catholic can associate with Dr. McGlynn; none can eat, or speak, or worship with him, or show him any social recognition whatever, under pain of incurring excommunication. The priest giving him the sacrament will be unfrocked. The mass cannot be celebrated in his presence, and the Catholic cemetery that receives his remains will be polluted. Such is the traditional meaning of the excommunication. It is a complete boycott, to be raised only by the repentance of the subject.

Considering the nature of this ecclesiastical boycott, it was naturally to be expected that Dr. McGlynn would feel somewhat depressed at having it declared against him; but such is not the case. At the meeting of the Anti-Poverty Society, Sunday night, he spoke of the action of the Roman machine as a great mistake, and held the whole proceeding up to ridicule. He regarded it as a liberation so far as it affected himself. Said he: "The lightning of excommunication in such cases is mere stage lightning made of phosphorus by a 'super,' and the thunder the mere rattling of sheet-iron by some poor devil who receives fifty cents for his work. The excommunication is not worth the paper it is written on."

Having seen its inside workings for a number of years, Dr. McGlynn knows, as every intelligent priest knows, that the Catholic church is a fraud and that the pope is the prince of humbugs. He knows also, as every intelligent person knows, that the curse of Rome falls heaviest not upon those whom it excommunicates, but upon those whom it continues to control and upon those countries where it gains a foothold. The Catholic church is a curse in itself, and, rightly considered, to incur its condemnation is a beatitude.

Editorial Notes.

THE farmers of Illinois hav been praying for rain, and we trust that ere this they hav been blessed with a shower. But there are few things more foolish than to pray for rain. It is an implication that an all-wise creator (if there is one) does not know when crops need watering.

JUDGING from the reports from Oregon, Mr. S. P. Putnam, secretary of the American Secular Union, is awaking the echoes in that quarter. More than that, he is leaving behind him a trail of Freethought literature to repeat the joyful sound. The people of Oregon hav bought hundreds of dollars' worth of books, and read THE TRUTH SEEKER attentivly. Lecturers say that where THE TRUTH SEEKER is there is enthusiasm also. Ergo, subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

ANARCHIST TUCKER, of Liberty, calls the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER a "quack" because, while believing in law and justice, he (the Editor of this paper) takes exception to the charge of Judge Childs in the Reynolds blasphemy case. If THE TRUTH SEEKER had ever advocated laws against blasphemy, or the right of a judge to act as prosecutor under them, Mr. Tucker's criticism would hav an application which, under the circumstances, it totally lacks. The belief is growing upon us that when certain subjects are under discussion Mr. Tucker loses the faculty of Reason.

CANON FLEMING, Queen Victoria's chaplain, was recently detected in the theft of one of the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage's sermons and publishing it as his own, and now a Western religious paper brings the news that a young clergyman of Indiana has plagiarized a sermon from some other preacher and delivered it as an original conception. The paper which prints the news wants to know how it is "that men are not prosecuted for this kind of theft." The reason is that the value of the thing stolen is not sufficient to bring the offense under the head of petty larceny.

HE who wants to enjoy the comforts of religion as derived through the medium of the Bible, must cheerfully and thoroughly submit himself to the absolute, divine authority of that book. If he doubts its authority, or cavils with it, he will not be in a condition of mind to receive its comforts. Faith, simple faith, is an indispensable condition on his part.—Independent.

Also, if a quadruped would enjoy the comfort of shavings as a diet, he must wear green spectacles and cheerfully submit himself to the belief that he is eating grass. It will at once be seen that, as in the other instance, faith, simple faith, is an indispensable condition on his part.

SENATOR GRADY, in addressing the Catholic Institute the other day, said: "Don't be afraid to wear your Catholicity as a badge, and when told that one religion is as good as another, don't turn another way, but say you don't believe it; say there is but one religion that is worthy of the name, and that is the Catholic religion." The Christian Advocate adds: "Our advice to Protestants is to wear their Protestantism as a badge, and when told that there is but one religion that is worthy of the name, and that is the Catholic religion, say that they don't believe it, and that while the Roman Catholic religion may be worthy the name of religion, its true name is a mixture of Christianity and paganism." The Advocate is certainly justified in saying that Catholicism is a pagan and Christian mixture, but, then, it is the original Christianity; and though Catholics are bigoted and arrogant, their claims hav a foundation of which the claims of Protestantism are utterly destitute. This is not saying much for Catholicism either.

IT is the complaint of religious people that our public schools are godless and otherwise deficient in the theological department. Let us see. On the program of the graduating exercises of Grammar School No. 47, this city, June 28, 1887, we find the following "Order:"—No. 1. Reading of the Scriptures; No. 2. The Lord's Prayer; No. 3. Chorus, "But the Lord is Mindful of His Own;" No. 5 "Thou Heaven Blue and Bright;" No. 19. A Hymn; No. 20. Address by the Rev. William Ormiston, D.D.; No. 22. Doxology, "Be thou, O God, Exalted High." Many of the intermediate numbers here omitted also show indications of containing references to the alleged beauties of religion. We are informed by one who was present at the exercises that the "address" of the Rev. Mr. Ormiston was a sermon, in which the preacher informed the young graduates before him that unless they were Christians, and lived godly lives, they would find that what learning they had been able to acquire was but dross, not to say a snare and a delusion. If the graduating exercises in all the schools in New York were like those of Grammar School No. 47, and if the daily curriculum is like the closing services, then a good third of the pupils' time is taken up with praying, Bible-reading, hymn-singing, and listening to pious homilies, thus giving the young idea religious target practice five days of the week. Those who attend church on Sunday would get six days of it. Parents who care more for the inculcations of superstition than of learning are, of course, pleased to see their children instructed in religion, but it would strike a fair-minded person as unjust that the children of Freethinkers should hav these services thrust upon them. Of all public departments, superstition is most out of place in the public schools. It is a matter for regret beyond expression that those who hav charge of our educational institutions do not know enough about their business to keep religion out of them.

THE Kansas City Times contains an account of some religious exercises that were held near there recently. Ed. Sneed, a murderer, was hanged on June 24th. The day before the execution a number of Catholic priests and sisters visited the murderer's cell and persuaded the occupant to accept salvation through their church. They then retired, and during their absence the city Protestant missionary and a representativ of the Young Men's Christian Association gained access to the condemned man. There had been for some weeks a desultory fight to see which sect should gain final possession of Mr. Sneed. The Protestant visitors opened services by singing "Nearer, My God, to Thee" and "Rock of Ages," and were engaged in prayer, when a platoon of Catholic priests arrived, and, as the account says, with expletivs, ejaculations, and fist-shaking, hustled the intruders out. But for the prompt action of the guards there might hav been another murderer or two for the surviving religionists to squabble over. Whether Mr. Sneed took the Protestant or Catholic route to paradise is left undetermined, but it is certain that he did not leave this world without the benefit of the clergy. And that is a great boon.

IN the Waco, Texas, Independent Pulpit for June the editor, Mr. J. D. Shaw, makes a very fair and able review of the political field where the adverse forces of Prohibition and Anti-prohibition are contending. On the Prohibition side he finds the mercenary time-serving preacher, who is for Prohibition but knows nothing about temperance; the imbecil drunkard, who has no confidence in himself, and wants the state to reform him; the religious fanatic, who advocates the amendment because the preacher advocates it; the would-be party boss, who wants to get into notice some way, he doesn't much care how; and, finally, a lot of sober and thoughtful citizens who see the evils of drink and the corruption of the whisky power, and believe that Prohibition is the only sure remedy for them. On the other side is the liquor dealer, who opposes the Prohibition amendment because it would ruin his business; the party boss, who opposes the amendment because it will break up the party power; the licentious drunkard, who wants his liquor; the moderate drinker, who doesn't abuse his right to drink when he feels like it, and therefore thinks that right should not be taken from him; and again the large body of thoughtful citizens who recognize the evils of drink, but do not regard the law as a sovereign remedy for them. This class further holds that the right of Prohibition, once admitted, would be a precedent dangerous to our free institutions. Mr. Shaw confesses that, although he seeks to view the elements in the strife impartially, his sympathies are altogether on one side. He opposes the amendment.

EDGAR C. BEALL, the phrenologist, has examined the head of Henry George, and the result is published in the Cincinnati Enquirer. He finds that Mr. George has a "sanguin-vital-mental temperament, which is indicated by a plump figure, small bones, sandy hair, ruddy complexion, blue eyes, rather small features, and a high, narrow brain. This constitution is favorable to facility and versatility of expression, and aptness in literature, oratory, or educational work—qualities all present in Mr. George. His head measures twenty-two inches, not large enough to giv the power of a Luther, a Napoleon, a Bismarck, or a Gladstone. His brain is not perfectly balanced, but the only striking disproportion in his mind is between the selfish instincts and the sense of universal love. There is more thunder than lightning in him, and though as brave as any man in a battle for principle, he will never manifest cruelty or malice, even to a foe. He is modest to a fault, conciliatory and yielding, sensitiv to the luster of a good name, and as honest as any man need be. In these and some other respects he resembles Beecher, but his head is still narrower; in fact, exceedingly narrow at the sides, above and a little in front of the ears at the seat of acquisitivness or love of possession. In such a brain there is no abstract desire for ownership, and money will be regarded simply as a convenience like the spade and harrow that lighten labor, but hav no beauty or attractivness in themselvs. This explains Mr. George's lack of sympathy for monopoly, but his efforts to improve the condition of the masses, and his enthusiasm for the work, are due to his enormous benevolence, which givs the great hight to his frontal top head. This faculty dominates his whole nature, and colors all his life. Intellectually he has more capacity for philosophy than science; yet reasons more by induction than by the à priori method; has fair causality, but very large comparison, and will manifest wonderful talent for classification, illustration, criticism, perspicacity, discrimination, perception of analogies, and ingenuity in the use of metaphors. He may not be remarkable as a statistician or for great accuracy in any branch of specific detail, but he has decided power for abstract thought." Professor Beall is evidently an admirer of Mr. George, as he says that "among those who love their fellow-men his name will stand second to none." There are probably very few persons who doubt Henry George's sincerity and philanthropy, but, to use a theological figure, there is a celebrated and populous turnpike that is said to be paved with good intentions. There is one thing that Mr. George ought to do. He ought to read Mr. Beall's work on the "Brain and the Bible." It is not so big a book as "Progress and Poverty," but it is a greater one.

Letters from Friends.

SILVERTON, OR., June 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The Silverton Secular Union was duly organized at this place, June 23d, by Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the American Secular Union, with a membership of 114 citizens, representing the very best elements of society. The following is the list of officers elected for the ensuing year: Dr. J. W. McClure, president; W. M. Cline, vice-president; R. D. Allen, secretary; M. Fitzgerald, treasurer; Mrs. Carrie Fitzgerald, H. D. Mount, and E. Wolfard, executiv committee. The following resolution in regard to Mr. Putnam was unanimously adopted at our last meeting:

"Resolved, That having had the pleasure of listening to the course of lectures delivered by Samuel P. Putnam, secretary of the American Secular Union, at Silverton, June 22d, 23d, and 24th inst., we hereby desire to express to him our high appreciation of his eminent services, and would add our recommendation of him to people everywhere as a well-poised, well-informed, very able, and eloquent advocate of progressiv Liberalism."

R. D. ALLEN, Sec. Silverton Sec. Union.

KENT, O., June 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Will Seward Mitchell, of Maine, please inform the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER how it will be possible for every man to hav a home of his own under the self-existing laws of nature when it is impossible for many to draw their pay on pay-day and go home sober? How can anyone own his home if no land is to be sold? Who would build a house on land belonging to another? How would the debts of our country be paid and the security of our homes be maintained were the principles to be carried out which you advance in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 2d? Please state the benefit to a poor man in getting drunk or spending fifty cents to one dollar per day while his family is suffering for want of food at home simply because he is a poor man? Do you not know that the capitalist, as a rule, puts in more hours and harder work than the poor man? How many poor men really deserve a home? If everyone had a home at this present time, how long would they keep it if they could "fool it away?" Please answer these simple questions, and I will giv you some harder problems to solve.

A POOR MAN FROM KENT.

FT. SCOTT, KAN., June 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The growth of Liberalism is necessarily slow because the evolution of the human mind is slow. A majority of mankind hav but poorly developed intellects, and for this condition they are indebted mainly to the church, which has thrown many obstacles in their way to prevent their natural development. The church has not only discouraged thinking and reasoning, but has positivly forbid it, and the masses of mankind, being bountifully supplied by the church with ignorance and its twin brother, superstition, hav rarely found courage to disregard the commands of the church, consequently the order has had, to a great extent, the effect its originators hoped for—that is, the retrogression of the human intellect and the increase of superstition, which means almost unlimited power to the church. And those who dared to disregard the mandates of the church were made to suffer death by some of the most cruel of the approved methods of savage Christians, and their names maligned as only the church can malign those who, by asserting their individuality, offer themselvs as a subject upon which she can bring to bear her wonderful "seventy times seven brand" (none genuin without signature of the pope and portrait of the three-headed God on the wrapper. One dose stops the pain. Price only one individuality per bottle) of loving forgivness(?).

These are some of the causes that hav filled the world with mere space-occupiers—men who claim to think certain things and giv their assent to certain beliefs, but who, mentally, are not capable of either thinking or believing anything. Such is the condition of a majority of mankind today. Then the task that presents itself to the Liberal-minded men and women is to hold in check the tendency of the masses toward immorality while a faithful effort is being made to elevate them mentally, and as they rise mentally so will they morally. Their elevation will require a process much the same as has evoluted from the "razorback" of yesterday the sleek porker of to-day. They are not susceptible to the persuasiv powers of reason. Who would think of bettering the grade of his swine by a course of lectures? It is much the same with these people; they must rise gradually by the process of evolution, and as they rise Christianity will be grasped by those who hav not already got sufficiently high to grasp it because it includes in its teachings many of the barbarous and superstitious customs of the lower stages from which they are rising; and from Christianity they will, in time, rise to the higher field of Liberalism. The church is a necessary round in the ladder that reaches from the dark valley of superstition and ignorance below to the broad plane of sovereign individuality and perfect happiness above. Most all religions hav taught many good moral precepts which are none the less good by being presented along with so much that was bad, though probably less effectiv. That relic of barbarism, intolerance, is the greatest evil that can be attached to any church, and in the hands of over-zealous followers it has been the cause of untold crimes against mental liberty. The church has ever tried to arrest the immutable laws of evolution by trying to keep in the folds those who hav become fitted for a higher plane. But even intolerance is passing away, and with it the fiendish doctrin of hell, and when those are gone we will hav heaven as meaning the common condition of all men after death; and it will serve very well in that connection. And in the days of this condition of affairs, it shall come to pass that men will be seen doing that which is right, not through a superstitious fear of future punishment for doing wrong, but in obedience to that love of truth, justice, and humanity with which each intellect will be largely imbued. And in those days all men will belong to the grand army of Liberals. May their lives be full of joy! JOHN W. MURRAY.

OTTUMWA, IA., June 29, 287.

MR. EDITOR: To the list of brilliant lecturers who hav increased the intellectual wealth of our citizens, we may now add the name of Dr. York. What a magnificent man he is! His arguments are unanswerable. Eloquence, logic, wit—all these combine to make him "the Ingersoll of the West."

If the Liberals of this country desire a speaker who believes that there is no subject too sacred for investigation; if they desire one who, fearless of what may be the result, throws the light of reason over the bloody field of superstition, and reveals the cowardice, the ignorance, and brutality of the defenders of Christianity; if they desire one who stands before the world as a representativ of all that is great, grand, and noble, then they should not hesitate to secure the services of Dr. York.

Although the doctor delivered two of the most eloquent and instructiv lectures ever heard in this city, yet not one of our daily papers said a word concerning them.

It is, indeed, to be regretted that the editors of our newspapers—supported alike by Infidel and Christian—are too mean, too cowardly, to say one word of praise regarding the glorious principles of Liberalism.

They do not hesitate to write long accounts of the Academy of Visitation, houses of prostitution, parochial schools, gambling dens, Catholic fairs, dog fights, etc., yet when now and then there comes a wanderer working for the interest of humanity, when some one dares to lift his voice for the advancement of science, truth, and justice, and plead for the liberty of man, woman, and child, they either do not mention the fact at all, or else they display their intelligence by calling our lecturers "foul-mouthed blasphemers," "enemies of the beloved redeemer," etc.

There is but one paper published here that dares acknowledge the superiority of man over God, and whose editor not only believes in the principles of Liberalism, but also scatters Freethought through the medium of his paper. It is the Industrial Appeal, and the editor is Mr. N. M. Ives.

Through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER we wish to thank Mr. Wm. Lindsay for his efforts in securing the services of Dr. York.

Mr. Lindsay is one of the foremost workers in the Liberal ranks. Time has left the wrinkles of care upon his brow, and changed his hair to silvery whiteness; his shoulders for many years hav borne the load of oppression, but still he fearlessly defends the right and unfurls the starry banner of Freethought, and waves it over the barbarous creeds of ages past.

PITTSFIELD, MASS., June 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of June 25th last you say: "The Herald suggests that, as the land theories of Mr. George hav been examined by the church and condemned, though not officially, as unsound, a further holding of them by Roman Catholics will bring on a conflict with the church." As I was brought up in the Roman Catholic church, and think I know something of the dogmas of that church, it is very amusing to read such nonsense as that quoted above. Pray, how can the church condemn anything unofficially? Does the Herald or THE TRUTH SEEKER know what is meant by "the church?" Do they think or believe that a few cardinals, or an archbishop or two, constitute "the church?" If so, they are very much mistaken. The Herald is also mistaken when it says that the land theories of Mr. George hav been condemned by the church. The pope has no authority to interfere or seek to control the belief of any Catholic in matters of politics. The land question is not a religious question, and the church has not condemned or sanctioned it. The pope has no right or authority to interfere in the land question, and any Catholic, high or low, has a right to think as he or she pleases in the matter. Dr. McGlynn was reprimanded by the powers at Rome for his speeches in favor of the Land League, and before he had anything to do with Mr. George or his land theories. He was reprimanded because he was independent, fearless, and a lover of his fellow-men, and because he was not an humble tool of the power that seeks to keep the people in bondage and ignorance. He was reprimanded because he was in favor of free public schools, and not in favor of sectarian schools which would teach that all who die outside the pale of the Catholic church would go to hell. He was reprimanded because he was not in favor of the temporal power of the pope. He was reprimanded because he was consistent, and believed that the Italian people were as much entitled to their liberty as the people of Ireland or Poland. The press of the country, which for years has been saying that Catholics were "priest-ridden," is now fighting the brave man who comes out and fights manfully and bravely not alone for his own rights, but for the right of every American Catholic to think and act as he pleases on political questions. Why is it that to-day nearly every influential journal in the land is inimical to Dr. McGlynn and Henry George? It is because they belong to either of the old political parties, and they see a power in the new movement that threatens the existence of both parties; and because nearly every one of them is owned by stock companies and syndicates that are alarmed at the theories of Henry George, and know that when the people begin to think, and study, and act, the system that has allowed one man, or a dozen men, to become millionaires, while thousands hav a hard struggle for existence, is doomed. What a sight for thinking men and women was that in London on the 21st of the present month, when hundreds of thousands of people gathered to gaze upon and honor an old woman—for what? Because she had been a queen for fifty years, because she had graciously consented to liv on the bounty of the people and raise a family of royal paupers and pimps for the people to hav the pleasure of supporting. I cannot help but echo the saying of the comic paper Puck, "What fools these mortals be!" How true it is!—the pope receiving Peter's pence from the starving people of Ireland to buy a present to send to the monarch of a country, when the Parliament of that country is forging chains to enslave them. Verily, there is need of reform, and it is time that the people, and particularly the Catholic people, should awake. There is as much need for a reformation as there was in the days of Luther, and, if the signs are right, it appears to be coming. Let us hope it is, and that when it does come it will be thorough. JAMES MOKENNA.

[Our friend has settled nothing, but merely contributed to the hot dispute upon this point. It is a fact that the church has deposed McGlynn because of his adherence to Henry George's land theories. It is also a fact that the church does control the social as well as the religious views of its people. While the pope has not said ex cathedra that George is wrong, he has praised Corrigan and upheld him as against McGlynn. Everybody knows that this implies a condemnation of the land theories of George, in an unofficial manner. The Herald and THE TRUTH SEEKER are probably as well acquainted with the history, policy, and power of the church, and also what constitutes the church, as is our esteemed Pittsfield friend.—ED. T. S.]

TROPIC, FLA., May 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I was sitting on the veranda of the Casper Winter Cottage. The magnificent lagoon was doubling the beauty of the starry sky. Italian sky? No, but its counterpart, our lovely Florida sky. My genial host and family were sitting around. I had been telling the boys about the ancient Arcadians, who in the far East—and ages before Jacob, the progenitor of the Hebrew race, perpetrated the most cruel and abominable fraud recorded in the annals of crime—watched their flocks beneath skies as fair as ours. I had been telling them how these ancient shepherds, sleeping out on the open plains, had naturally been led to the study of the stars; how they had mapped out the heavens; how they had noticed that seven of the stars kept moving about all the time; how they came to believe that each of those seven stars was the home of a god; how they divided time into weeks of seven days and named the days after their gods. Saturn being a severe and morose god, the day they dedicated to him, Saturn's day, or Saturday, was regarded with awe. People were afraid to do any work on that day. And this was centuries before the Israelitish tutelary divinity, Jehovah, who "dwelt on high Olympus"—I wonder if I did make that mistake when I was talking to the boys; I seldom get Greek and Hebrew mythology mixed—whose home was on Mount Sinai, had carved the fundamental law of the Hebrew theocracy in stone. I had explained all this to the boys in language adapted to their young minds and had fallen into a reverie over my mishaps, and was thinking how many times I had laughed over Pickwick's ridiculous dilemmas and was almost wishing that I was constituted like Mark Tapley and "couldn't help being jolly" over my own. Pickwick was getting into countless difficulties; I was getting into almost as many, and what was lacking in numbers was more than made up for in intensity. The change of a single word by a printer or a "student" learning the type-writer had in two instances driven me to the verge of distraction, and more than once I had seen things in print over my name that made each particular hair upon my head "stand upon end like the quills upon the fretful porcupine." I had sworn a score of times, per deos immortales, that I would never write another line, and a score of times I had broken my pledge. I was thinking, brooding, meditating, wondering what would strike me next, when I heard some one say: "If it were so ordered that they should be put into the ark, the same power that ordered it could cause them to liv without eating. The good book says 'nothing is impossible.'" This roused me immediately. "There are a great many things that are utterly impossible; God almighty nor anyone else can't make two and two make five," I said, and then fell to thinking again. But this little break had changed the tenor of my reverie. There are people, I soliloquized, who actually believe the story of Sindbad the sailor and Jonah and the wonderful whale. I knew a minister of the gospel once, a graduate of Yale, who said that he would believe that Jonah swallowed the whale if the Bible said so, and I hav no doubt that he would. Now, a man with a mind constituted like that might possibly believe that God could, upon some extraordinary occasion, or in a few isolated cases, or under some unusual stress of circumstances, cause two and two to equal five, but I doubt if he could possibly believe that the laws of the relations of quantities could be permanently changed so that two halves of a thing would be equal to more than the whole of it. And yet, after all, as I think it over I don't know but that a man might believe it. There are men who honestly believe that one God sits upon the right hand of another God to judge the quick and the dead, and yet they believe there is only one God. There are persons of a considerable intelligence who believe that a semi-barbarous military chieftain made the sun stand still for quite a long time. Mr. O'Brien, for all he graduated at the University of Michigan, was firmly convinced in his own mind that God was born of a Syrian peasant woman. He prays to that woman every day, and honestly believes that a colossal wax doll which stands in his church, and is reputed to be an image of God's mother, is a sacred thing. I know a professor of mathematics in a large educational institution who knows that there is something supremely sacred about a Bible. He reverences the paper and other materials of which it is composed. He was perfectly horrified when he found a student using an old, worn-out Testament as he would any other waste paper. I fully realize that man's capacity for believing the marvelous is unlimited. W. A. MOSELEY.

CARTHAGE, Mo., July 3, 287.

MR. EDITOR: On the 24th of last month I had the pleasure of hearing J. E. Remsburg deliver his magnificent lecture on Thomas Paine. Mr. Remsburg has been giving a series of lectures at Joplin, Mo., and as I had a little spare time I went fourteen miles to hear him, and was well repaid, as I found him to be scholarly, eloquent, and logical, and possessed of an array of historical facts concerning the career of Paine which were not only convincing, but admirably presented. After giving a general outline of the many positions of trust and honor which Paine filled, and the inspiring influence of his writings, Mr. Remsburg went on to quote the opinions of numerous great men who knew Paine personally, proving beyond dispute that those who knew him held him in high esteem. When such men as Napoleon Bonaparte, Lafayette, Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and hosts of others unanimously speak of the old hero in the most exalted terms, how impotent and contemptible are the slanders of the religious bigots and moral runts who try to do him harm! Even Dr. Priestley, Paine's most bitter religious opponent, is forced to admit the truth of Paine's integrity and moral worth. But in the summing up, the examination and comparison of evidence, the analytical and caustic style in which he handled his subject, and the blistering denunciations of the sleuth-hounds of the church, was where Mr. Remsburg particularly excelled. It was a verbal cyclone of thrilling and red-hot truths. I advise all Liberal organizations to get Remsburg, and if only one lecture is secured, let that lecture be his unanswerable defense of Thomas Paine. It is time the people knew the truth, and high time that the lying and malicious tongues of a brazen and shameless clergy were silenced, and I know of no one better fitted for the task than J. E. Remsburg. In this connection I want to say a good word for the many wide-awake and earnest Liberals whom I met in Joplin. I felt as a lone wanderer must feel who suddenly finds himself among brothers. Owing to the kindness of my friend, Mr. George Hutchinson, I was enabled to meet many genial and true Liberals. The Kendrick brothers, Dr. Owen, Mr. Burgess, and others whose names I cannot now recall, are men worthy of the great and noble cause of Freethought. I shall long hav pleasant memories of the few brief hours I spent with them. One thing is rather remarkable—I find that all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER whom I hav met are earnest and aggressiv workers in trying to destroy the power of Christian superstition. They seem to be endowed with plenty of wholesome grit and energy, and hav no fears of what either the parson or Mrs. Grundy may say about it. Would that we had more like them. WATSON HESTON.

WARREN, O., June 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am still in the land of the living—on probationary ground, now in my seventy-sixth year. My pious friends hav some hopes of me yet. While the lamp of life holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return. The older I grow, the more ridiculous orthodoxy seems to me.

There was a revival last winter in the Methodist church here, and a daughter of mine, who is a zealous member, induced me to attend. My hearing being impaired, I was obliged to go up close to the pulpit, and that made me rather conspicuous. My daughter introduced me to the minister and his wife, who did all they could to hav me get religion, and while they offered it very cheap—almost for nothing—I could not see for the life of me what I should do with it if I had it. The preacher's arguments were simply an appeal to the feelings, and he commenced at the wrong end. He tried to influence the brain through the heart instead of the heart through the brain. But as I was inoculated with that same virus when a boy, it failed to take.

Salvation may be a good thing to those who liv entirely for the next world, but as I hav no interest in any other world than this, I want a salvation that will do the business here and now. I don't want to wait till I'm dead. This minister admitted to me that he cared not what I believed so long as I joined his church, and kept my radical views to myself. Honest, wasn't he?

Only once during the revival did he mention hell, and then he apologized for it and added that the hell he meant was simply a state of mental anguish. Different sort of a hell fifty years ago! Then they uncapped hell in their imagination, and pictured the awful condition of the inhabitants of the underground world. But it is cooling off wonderfully since the introduction of natural gas. I'm afraid if we keep tapping the earth for gas we will get ahead of the almighty, and cut short his supply of fuel in the nether world.

Right on the heels of the revival came a branch of the Salvation Army officered by young women, who hired the rink and started business. After they had been running some time I went one day and met the Methodist minister, who introduced me to the lady officers. They in turn labored hard to save my soul, but were far from pleased when I hinted at the possibility of one not having a soul to save. They labored so earnestly, and were apparently so honest about it, for my welfare, that I felt inclined to make a few remarks, which they kindly permitted me to do. I told them that I didn't see the thing as they saw it, and that I could not afford to be less than a man; that some things seemed a little curious to me in this Christian community where so many churches, with few exceptions, gave them the cold shoulder. So far as I knew, the army was perfectly orthodox—its members could not be accused of heresy, for they did not even take any stock in the modern sheol. I told them that these church ministers preach of the priceless value of the immortal soul—how, if there is only one soul lost, the period would come when that one soul would suffer more torment, more anguish, more misery, than would overbalance all the happiness, all the pleasure, all the enjoyment of all the beings that hav ever lived and died on this planet. I said: "Why don't they come and help you? Are they honest? They sneer at you because you parade the streets, but to my mind it is no worse to beat tambourines on earth than to play harps in heaven." If I were religiously inclined, I would rather meet with this people in the rink than in those gorgeous temples, with cushioned pulpits, whose preachers strive too often to please the tyrants, for over the ramparts of tyranny has always waved the banner of the church. For my part, I would rather go to hell with honest rags than to heaven with gilded fraud. Senator Wade, from this district, once said, "Heaven might hav a little advantage in climate, but hell had the best folks." I told the girls I believed they could reach a class that the churches could not reach, and did not want to.

A pious lady living one thousand miles from here, in a talk with a friend and sister in the church, said she did not like to associate with the common class—did not like to mingle with laborers and greasy mechanics. Her friend asked her what she was going to do when she went to heaven, where there would probably be some of that class. She answered that she did not know; that in her father's house were many mansions. I suppose she believes that the members of the Salvation Army will hav a separate place fixed up for them—like a rink, with plain board seats. But this same lady professes to be a follower of Jesus, who said, "The foxes hav holes, and the birds hav nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head"—he who associated with the poor, the lowly and the down-trodden.

A few more years will doubtless finish my career, but when the shades of death are gathering thick and fast around my brow, "I would rather hav the satisfaction of knowing that I dried one tear from the cheek of sorrow, than the promis of a golden harp and crown."

EUBANKS, KY., May 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Many thanks for courtesies shown me in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I write for the ideas, the reason of things, not for rhetorical show. I hav but little Liberal literature, and am surrounded by a partisan class of sectarians who are afraid to read Liberal papers. We hear much said about Infidelity and Infidels by a certain class of people, and I desire in these lines to notice that class. It is true that Liberal thought examins the claims of the Bible and all other systems of theology. But the question before us, is, What is Infidelity, and who are Infidels? If I understand the object of Liberals in their teaching, it is to free the people from superstition, priestcraft, and political tyranny, and place society on the foundation of science and natural rights. Any Infidelity in this? Anything new in this teaching? Is it true that history develops this element of teaching in all ages, and that the graves of many martyrs are filled by those great men who were advocates of science and human freedom? But, first, What is Infidelity? Paine says that his idea of an Infidel is, a person who is untrue to himself, his own mind and convictions. As a general rule, the god idea of any age or location is made the test of Infidelity, and this leaves as many foundations for Infidelity as there are gods, systems of theology, books, and creeds. Where Jews and Christians rule, the idea is that an Infidel is a person who disbelieves the claims of the Bible. In giving our own idea of Infidelity, we shall claim the right claimed by a man in talking with a doctor about a sick child. The doctor had no name for the disease, and the man gave the disease a name of his own. The doctor said he never heard of such a name for a disease. "Neither did I," the man said. "But you hav no name for it, and I hav as good a right to giv it a name as you or anyone else." Now, I claim as good a right to hunt up Infidelity and Infidels as anyone else. Infidelity is the opposit of fidelity. Fidelity, says Webster, is "faithfulness, honesty, loyalty." Infidelity, says Webster, is "disbelief of Christianity, breach of trust, unfaithfulness." We are now in search of a class of people who are "unfaithful," dishonest, disloyal, and guilty of a "breach of trust" with the Bible and Christianity. Those who simply disbelieve the Bible, and hav never placed themselvs under its defense, are not subjects of its government in this life. They hav never embraced it, to prove themselvs unfaithful, dishonest, disloyal, and guilty of a breach of trust. But there are two classes of people who are unfaithful, dishonest, disloyal, and are guilty of a breach of trust in the Bible—namely, Jews and Christians. In truth and effect, they are a hot-bed of Infidelity. We now hav them indicted before the world and the God of the Bible, and are ready for the proof. In this court, the prisoners at the bar shall hav the benefit of their own testimony:

Q. Mr. Jew, what say you of that part of the Bible called the New Testament? A. We answer that we do not believe its claims of divinity. We never hav believed Christianity to be divine, and we do not admit the New Testament as any part of our Bible.

Q. Why do you reject the claims of Jesus Christ? A. We hav the best reasons for rejecting him. We had Moses and the prophets to judge his claims. He came among us as one of us, in our own country; lived and died among us. His works were fully manifested in our midst, and, instead of embracing his claims, he was judged guilty of treason by us and put to death. Our reason, also, teaches us that the God of Moses never became a man or part of a man. We believe that the main thing concerning him—that he arose from the grave—is a base falsehood. And we believe that Christians, in claiming to believe the Old Bible, while they do not keep the law of Moses, are guilty of unfaithfulness, dishoncsty, disloyalty, and making a breach of trust.

Christians, therefore, are Infidels.

Q. Mr. Christian, what say you of the Jews and that part of the Bible called the Old Testament? A. A Jew is a bigoted Infidel. They murdered the son of God, and do not believe in Jesus Christ nor the writings of the apostles. They will all go to hell if they do not become Christians. The Old Testament is divine, but it is dead by reason of Christianity—Christ "nailed it to the cross."

So far, so good. Here are two leading parties—and the only parties in defense of the Bible—and each testifies to the other being an Infidel—holding to part of the Bible unfaithfully, dishonestly, disloyally, and guilty of a breach of trust. But what say the Bible and profane history about the Jews and Christians? Does the God of Moses in the Bible teach that the Jews were and hav been faithful, honest, loyal, and true to the book? Are they not, to-day, a scattered example of the vengeance of their own God? Are they not held as a wicked and stiff-necked set of Infidels in the teachings of both the Old and New Testaments? Treason is more odious to the Bible God than alien rejection of Bible claims. The God of the Bible does not stop at treason and rebellion with the Jews, but charges them with wilful murder—that they crucified, unjustly, with malice aforethought, no less a personage than the son of God, whose character shows him to hav been the most wise, innocent, and virtuous man that ever was murdered on earth. Profane history corresponds with these Bible facts about that class of disloyal, dishonest, Infidel murderers, called Jews. And the four-and-twenty elders, with all Christians, here fall before the throne of judgment and cry out, "These things are true and faithful" about the Jews. Let them stop the cry of Infidelity about others, and learn that no murdering clan hav "eternal life abiding in them."

We now come to the other class, called Christians. We shall divide this class into two parties—Catholics and Protestants—and hear their testimony about each other. The Catholic takes his seat on the rock, Peter, and an infallible church, and deposes that all Protestants are heretics; and a heretic being one who has denied the faith, the New Testament pronounces him worse than an Infidel. Then, the Catholic being judge, if I call a Protestant an Infidel, the Catholic says he is worse, because he has "held the truth" as a traitor—unfaithful, dishonest, disloyal. There was but the one, only Catholic church for centuries after Christ established Christianity. Until the traitor, Luther, appeared, there was unity and harmony in Christianity. The Protestants received the Bible from us. We kept it safe and secure through the "dark ages." They hav not only received the Bible from us, but they hav corrupted and changed it to suit all kinds of doctrins. Rejecting the true foundation of the infallible Christian Church, they set up under Jesus Christ as the rock and foundation, and hav proved to be traitors to him by making creeds, sects, divisions, and all kinds of devilish systems. What civil government, we ask, would tolerate men in making and executing all kinds of political creeds among its citizens? The pious, honest, and hard-working masses of the people are imposed on by these creed-mongers. They hav to be taxed to build too many churches and support too many preachers. All the Catholics will fall down before the throne of judgment and say, "These sayings are true and faithful" about the Protestants. Let them stop calling others Infidels, and learn that a heretic, a traitor, a dishonest class like Protestants, are "worse than Infidels."

But what say the Protestants of Catholics? Answer the question, gentlemen. Taking the New Testament as your guide, will you depose and say that Catholics are true, faithful, honest, and loyal to the teachings of the book? Never—never. Darkness hovers over their historic record. They are condemned by both the Jewish and Christian gods as the "little horn" of Daniel's vision, and the seven-headed, ten-horned beast of the thirteenth chapter of Revelation. You Catholics, not only hav you taken a wrong foundation and a false claim of Christianity, but you hav taken the key of knowledge and natural rights from the people wherever you had political power, and your line of unfaithful, dishonest, and disloyal policy has been to force Christianity on the world by the sword. Tell us Protestants that we are a class worse than Infidels? We say, Christ we know and Peter we know, but what and who are Catholics? All Protestants now fall before the throne of judgment and cry out, "These sayings are true and faithful" about Catholics. Let them cease to call others Infidels, and learn and prepare themselvs for the awful judgment and plagues of "the whore of Babylon"—the "mother of harlots and abominations."

The true picture of the Christian and Jewish world is here completed. We hav made no attack on the Bible nor the God of the Bible. We hav no doubt that many good, honest, and pious Jews and Christians, with the Bible in hand, wonder how any sensible man can disbelieve its claims. Now, if this pious class would open the door of truth and history, and count the lives, property, human suffering, divisions, strife, envy, hatred, and the general gloom thrown over science, the freedom and rights of humanity, by the claims of Moses and Jesus Christ, we apprehend they would rather ask, How can any sensible man help being an Infidel, or rejecting the divine claims of the Bible? Complete the record with the fruits of all other systems of theology and their books, look at all the cartoons that may be devised to show human ignorance, superstition, and crime, and I apprehend you might ask, How can any sensible man help being an Atheist? We think we hav convicted the prisoners at the bar of being a hotbed of Infidelity. We hav done this by assuming the Bible to be divine and allowing the parties to testify against each other—and, by their own book and their own testimony, they stand convicted of being untruthful, dishonest, disloyal traitors to the teaching of the Bible.

"Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Grandma.

"When grandma puts her glasses on
And looks at me—just so—
If I hav done a naughty thing
She's sure somehow to know.
How is it she can always tell
So very, very, very well?

"She says to me, 'Yes, little one,
'Tis written in your eye!'
And if I look the other way,
Or turn and seem to try
To hunt for something on the floor,
She's sure to know it all the more.

"If I should put the glasses on
And look in grandma's eyes,
Do you suppose that I should be
So very, very wise?
Now, what if I should find it true
That grandma had been naughty, too?

"But, ah!—what am I thinking of
To dream that grandma could
Be anything in all her life
But sweet and kind and good?
I'd better try, myself, to be
So good that when she looks at me
With eyes so loving all the day,
I'll never want to turn away."

Intelligence and Social Life of Ants.

There are more than a thousand varieties of the little creature known as the ant. But they are described under three families or heads, and the study of them is very interesting.

They are busy little beings, seldom idle, unless suffering from illness. The scriptural advice, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard, consider her ways and be wise," is not inapt, or out of place, and if more people obeyed the injunction there would be fewer idlers about.

Some kinds of ants are born blind, and go groping in darkness all their lives. Others hav what are called compound eyes; that is, the eye is composed of many smaller eyes, or facets, sometimes as many as twelve hundred. Sir John Lubbock, who made ants a study, thought they could not only distinguish colors, but that they perceived colors not known to the human eye. He performed many wonderful experiments with ants, and he believed they could hear and produce sounds not audible to our ears.

They usually hav three classes in their tribes, known as the males, the workers, and the queens, the workers having no wings, and the queens nip off their wings after they hav once used them in flying. They hav a pretty long lease of life, considering their size, some species living seven or more years.

Their homes and villages are models of neatness and order, and they appear to keep servants or slaves, these being the ants of another tribe which hav been captured in battle, and when the slaves die they are buried in a different cemetery from their masters and masters' families.

They seem to hav some knowledge of farming, and the ants of Mexico and Texas know how to clear and prepare ground for agricultural purposes, and then cultivate a peculiar species of food known as ant-rice.

In our own climate, the ant is very fond of aphides, which is the name of the little green lice that infest plants, or rather is fond of the milk or juice secreted by these creatures. Ants seem to communicate with each other by some intelligible signs, and go and come in regular order. They lay out streets, erect homes, and in some places they thatch them in order to protect them from bad weather, performing the different operations of mining, carpentry, and even masonry with the utmost care and skill.

In Brazil there is a species called the carpenter ants, and among them are found regular wood-choppers and well-diggers. The latter hav been known to dig wells a foot in diameter, and thirty feet in depth. They also make roads and pave them with a cement made of clay.

They are very sociable and friendly among themselvs, and although their villages, or communities, comprise thousands and thousands, yet they never fail to recognize each other, or discover an alien or enemy, no matter where they may meet one. They fight with foreigners and strangers, but with their own tribe they are upon the best of terms, and strangers of their own race are received in a very hospitable manner, fed, and entertained with much courtesy and kindness.

They sometimes get into houses, notably the black ant and little red ant, and are very troublesome in destroying food. They are fond of cake and cookies, and many a housewife has been discouraged and sickened at the myriads of uninvited guests that throng the pantry shelves devouring all before them. Borax sprinkled freely upon the shelves will drive them away, and they will not usually trouble dishes placed over water. They dislike black walnut, also, and will shun tables and shelves made of this material.

In the "History of the Berlin Academy" for 1749, in the German "Ephemerides," and also in the Journal de Physique for 1790, may be found strange stories of clouds of winged ants that darkened the air, and moved with a spiral-like motion, seen at various places, and at length falling in such vast numbers that they covered the earth so that one could not step without crushing them.

Of all the lower order of animals, as we term them, not one has probably such intelligence, in proportion to its size, as the little insect called the ant. They display great powers in government, in construction of dwellings, streets, tunnels, cultivation of ant farms, holding slaves, domesticating animals, laying up food for winter use, manufacturing sugar and other articles of diet, erecting hospitals for their sick, showing great interest and affection for their own, and actually exhibiting some moral sentiments generally attributed only to man and the higher order of animals.

Ant life is a very interesting and profitable study, and those who hav watched their habits closely regard them as wonderful creatures, highly intelligent, social in their habits, moral, skilled in mechanical industries, and possessing some traits and gifts that are superior to those of which we hav knowledge.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—How many varieties of the ant are there? Under how many heads or divisions may they be classed? Repeat the scriptural advice concerning the ant. Tell what you can of the eyes of the ant. What did Sir John Lubbock think of the sight and hearing of ants? What of the workers, queens, etc.? their homes and villages? Do they believe in keeping slaves? What of the ants of Mexico and Texas? What are aphides? Can you name other food eaten by ants? What of the Brazilian ants? What of their social habits, fighting propensities, hospitality, etc.? Do they infest houses sometimes? What will drive them away? Where may be found strange stories concerning the flight of ants? Name some of the things that they can do. Is the study of ants interesting? Why so?

Paine Vindicated!

—o—

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

—o—

The New York Observer (Presbyterian) having recently reissued its assault upon the memory of Paine, this pamphlet should be circulated everywhere in vindication.

TOGETHER WITH

A ROMAN CATHOLIC CANARD.

A Fabricated Account of a Scene at the Death-bed of Thomas Paine.

BY W. H. BURR.

This pamphlet shows that the account of Paine's dying moments attributed to Bishop Fenwick (upon which the Observer relies to prove its principal charges) is a forgery, it being impossible that Fenwick could hav written the alleged account.

ELEMENTS
OF
UNIVERSAL HISTORY
FOR
HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.
By Prof. H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C., on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Stenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable; it may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

A BAPTIST minister named Tillerson, residing near Somervell, Tex., recently committed a criminal assault upon a little girl eight years of age. Tillerson is 55 years old, and the editor of the Bosque Citizen says that "he has probably lived long enough."

JACOB SHARP, the convicted briber, was 70 years old on the 6th. He spent the day in jail.

A LANDSLIDE on the shore of Lake Zugersee, Switzerland, precipitated forty houses and two hotels into the lake, drowning over one hundred persons.

THE Rev. Father Dent, a Catholic priest, has been sentenced to seven months' imprisonment in the Erie county, N. Y., penitentiary. He libeled another priest.

THE Georgia railroads refuse to carry negroes in first-class cars. The Rev. W. A. Sinclair, a colored preacher, and his wife were ejected last week on account of their complexion.

YAN PHON LEE, a Chinese youth who has just been graduated from Yale, was married last week to a Miss Jerome, of New Haven, Conn. He is a good-looking young man of more than ordinary intelligence, and she is well-favored and rich.

POWDERLY, general master workman of the Knights of Labor, announces that he will resign his office at the Minneapolis convention to be held in October.

THE death rate in New York city last week was 200 per day.

THE police made 148 arrests for liquor-selling in this city last Sunday.

THE total assessed real and personal property of this city for 1887 is $1,507,640,663—an increase of $86,672,377 over last year.

Two keepers of the Ward's Island Insane Asylum, a New York city institution, hav been indicted on a charge of killing an insane patient.

THE color question is being sharply discussed in the churches just now, and the general sentiment is against mixed worship. Asbury Park, a Methodist camp-meeting station in New Jersey, excludes colored persons.

QUEEN VICTORIA has addressed a letter to Mr. Matthews, who presented to her an address by the loyal Catholics of London. In it the queen says that she has always felt full confidence in the loyalty of her Catholic subjects in and out of Ireland.

MRS. LANGTRY, the actress, has formally renounced her allegiance to all foreign potentates, and has filed an instrument in the office of the clerk of the U. S. circuit court in northern California declaring her bona fide intention of becoming a citizen of this country. She already owns considerable property in New York.

THE United Labor party of this city is holding primaries to elect delegates to the Syracuse convention in August. Among those already chosen are Dr. McGlynn, Henry George, James Redpath, John McMackin, and F. C. Leubuscher. The Socialists are showing themselvs very strong, and it is certain that they will hav a large representation at the convention.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND was invited by the mayor of St. Louis to visit that city during the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, and accepted the invitation. But as members of the G. A. R. hav protested, and as threats of personal violence had been made in case Mr. Cleveland undertook the trip, he has written a second letter recalling his acceptance. Some divisions of the Grand Army refused to parade in Mr. Cleveland's presence. His veto of the dependent pension bill is supposed to hav excited their ire.

THE ORDER OF CREATION.

A Discussion Between

Gladstone, Huxley, Muller, Linton, Reville.

ISAAC (LIKE ABRAHAM) TELLETH A LIE.

And Isaac dwelt in Gerar. And the men of the place asked him of his wife, and he said, She is my sister, for he feared to say, She is my wife, lest, said he, the men of the place should kill me for Rebekah, because she was fair to look upon.—Gen. xxvi, 6, 7.

Odds and Ends.

A FOURTH of July dodge: "Don't spank me, dad; I've swallowed a torpedo."

HONESTY is more precious than gold, though it cannot equal gold in opening the way into a fashionable city church.

IN Hindostan a copper cent is called a "damri." From this probably comes the expression, "It isn't worth a continental."

"IF women are really angels," writes an old bachelor, "why don't they fly over the fence, instead of making such a fearfully awkward job of climbing?"

AN art critic, describing a recent collection of bric-a-brac, says: "The visitor's eye will be struck on entering the room with a porcelain umbrella." This is encouraging to visitors.

"OH, what is so rare as a day in June?"
Asks Lowell. Well, opinions vary;
But the day most rare, we must declare,
Is the twenty-ninth of February.

"O MUM! the' was an' ugly-lookin' tramp kim into the front parlor this mornin' when oi was afther dustin'." "A tramp! And what did you do, Bridget?" "Oi dusted, mum."

THE body of a young girl, mysteriously murdered, has been found on a lonely country road in Ohio. This outrageous infringement on a purely local industry has excited widespread indignation throughout New Jersey.

AN ancient omen says that "if two marriages are celebrated simultaneously, one of the husbands will die." This omen is no doubt verified in every instance; but we are prepared to believe that the other husband will die, too, if he livs long enough.

PHYSICIAN (to anxious wife): "We hav held a consultation, madam, over your husband's case; he is a very sick man, and it might be well to send for a minister, I think." Anxious wife: "Will one be enough, doctor, or would you advise a consultation of ministers?"

"O ROWENA!" exclaimed Voltigern Tapemeasure, dropping on his knees without a struggle, "your beauty fires my heart——" "My daughter," said old Hengist Wheatcorner, entering the room, "I will divide the contract with you; I will fire the rest of him." Which he did.

"YOUNG man," he said solemnly, "are you prepared to go?" "Prepared to go?" repeated the young man blithely. "I should say so; I shipped my family to the country last week for the summer, hav given up my flat and stored the furniture, and taken a room down-town. I'm prepared to go anywhere."

DURING the course of his prayer last Sunday morning a Western minister said: "O Lord! we desire to return more than the usual amount of thanks this morning for the blessings of the week just closed. Especially would we thank thee for the successful organization of a board of trade and for the gratifying outcome of that little South Side deal in which thy servant was interested. But above all we desire to return our thanks for the completion of the new race-track, which, as thou probably knowest, is the finest half-mile track west of the Missouri river."

"IT seems to me," observed the sub-editor, "that the recording angel must hav a pretty easy time of it nowadays." "Why so?" asked his wife. "Simply because if a man does anything good or bad it gets into the newspapers." "Well what of that?" "Why, all the angel has to do is to go over the papers with a pair of scissors."

AN Irishman, writing to his wife, who was still in "ould Ireland," began his letter by making the following surprising statement: "It's a foine country, Bridget, and no mistake. I've this day put phat they call an inshoorance on me loife, an' if I'd fall down a ladder wid me hod an' break me neck to-morry begorra an' I'd get twenty-five dollars a wake as long as I was ded."

"OUR school closed yesterday," says a Dakota paper, "and at the end of the usual commencement exercises the graduating class amused itself by playfully riding the principal of our high school on a rail through our main streets, and then ducking him in a frog-pond back of Baxter's mill. It was a merry occasion, and greatly enjoyed by all who engaged in it. The principal seemed to object at first, but he soon entered into the playful spirit of his pupils and submitted to their sportiv ways. Our boys and girls are full of real Western dash and spirit, and know how to enjoy themselvs."

A VERY slight error of fact or practice will sometimes result in a serious mistake. This was recently illustrated in a school where a pupil who had been impressed with the force and value of double letters—such as double o in "fool," double e in "heel," etc.—was called upon to read the touching poem exhortatory of early rising, beginning: "Up, up, Lucy! the sun is in the sky!" Surprise which soon gave place to hilarity was occasioned when the pupil read the line: "Double up, Lucy! the sun is in the sky," thus giving it a significance by no means contemplated by the poet.

THE SENSATIONAL PREACHER.

From the ancient, quaint phrase of the Bible
He carelessly chooses a text,
And then drifts away in a lecture
That leaves the true question unvexed;
But he catches the ear of his hearers,
Which often is longer than fine,
With a bric-a-brac sermon a layman
Might preach "o'er the walnuts and wine."

To-day he slings mud at officials,
To-morrow he'll handle the press,
In the hope of a free advertisement,
Be it either a kick or caress;
And he mixes the slang of elections
With a patter of tea-table talk:
And instead of the milk of the scriptures,
Is profuse with his water and chalk.

Gems of Thought.

I SEE no use in being a son of God, or even of a virgin, if it makes one wretched and unhappy.—D. M. Bennett.

IN science and philosophy, a man's contributions to knowledge hav a value which is quite independent of his personality. Whoever invented the differential calculus or the binomial theorem, we shall not understand them any better by learning when or where the discoverer lived or what manner of man outwardly he was. Whether nominalism or realism is the truer philosophic standpoint, whether thought is a function of matter or matter has no existence except for thought—these and the like are questions which are capable of investigation on their own merits; and it affords no help to their solution to know when the originator, defender, or impugner of any of them was born and how long he lived, whether his person was comely or homely, whether he was happy in his married life or lived and died in single blessedness.—Principal Caird, D.D.

THE religious aspect certainly has changed. The theological epoch draws near to its close. The impulse given, in the reign of Charles II., when the Royal Society received its charter—an impulse clearly understood as committing the the English mind to natural studies as distinguished from supernatural—has gone on with accelerating motion ever since, until now the books on natural science outrank in power, if they do not in number, the works on theology. The great writers in dogmatic and speculativ theology are of the past. Warburton, Cudworth, Barnes, Taylor, Hooker, are little read; and such interest in them as remains is due rather to their rhetoric than to their reasoning. . . . The working mind of the age turns from theological questions with a kind of disgust; and as no great thinker engages in obsolete or unreal speculations, the literature of theology languishes. To one who remembers the place it held half a century ago, this fact is of profound significance. —O. B. Frothingham.

SWEET EVENINGS COME AND GO.

Sweet evenings come and go, love,
They came and went of yore;
This evening of our life, love,
Shall go and come no more.

When we hav passed away, love,
All things will keep their name;
But yet no life on earth, love,
With ours will be the same.

The daisies will be there, love,
The stars in heaven will shine;
I shall not feel thy wish, love,
Nor thou my hand in thine.

A better time will come, love,
And better souls be born;
I would not be the best, love,
To leave thee now forlorn.—George Eliot.

I HAV been to the old church these last Sundays to hear what the new vicar has to say, and it is queer to hear a gentleman like him tell us that we shall all be burnt in flames forever if we do not think as he bids us think, and then to come to the lecture-room and find that there is no place for hell in all creation, and that the church, which pretends to know everything and to teach us all, is no better than a nigger pow-wow man.—Mrs. E. Lynn Linton.

TAM SAMSON'S weel-worn clay here lies,
Ye canting zealots, spare him!
If honest worth in heaven rise,
Ye'll mend or ye win near him.—Burns.

EVERY evil to which we do not succumb is a benefactor. As the Sandwich Islander believes that the strength and valor of the enemies he kills pass into himself, so we gain the strength of the temptation that we resist.—Emerson.

ALL thoughts of ill, all evil deeds,
That hav their roots in thoughts of ill;
Whatever hinders or impedes
The action of the nobler will—

All these must first be trampled down
Beneath our feet, if we would gain,
In the bright fields of fair renown,
The right of eminent domain.—Longfellow.

THERE was surely something respectable in the sentiment which made Mr. Brassey refuse, however much his riches might increase, to add to his establishment. There is surely something natural in the tendency, which we generally find coupled with greatness, to simplicity of life. A person whom I knew had dined with a millionaire, with his flunkeys standing round the table. I suspect that a man of Mr. Greg's intellect and character, in spite of his half-ascetic hatred of plush, would rather hav been one of the six than one of the two.—Goldwin Smith.

I BELIEVE
That woman, in her deepest degradation,
Holds something sacred, something undefiled,
Some pledge and keepsake of her higher nature,
And, like the diamond in the dark, retains
Some quenchless gleam of the celestial light!

THE WAY PROHIBITION DOES NOT PROHIBIT.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Circuit Court of St. Louis, Mo., has just denied a petition for the incorporation of a faith-cure establishment in that city.

THE New York World has gathered information from the Labor leaders that the Labor parties will hav a candidate for president in the field next year.

THE British commission appointed a year ago to inquire into the merits of M. Pasteur's method of inoculation for hydrophobia hav reported favorably.

SAYS the Memphis Avalanche: "When one finds a paper called the Christian at Work saying that 'a Yankee has just taught ducks to swim in hot water with such success that they lay boiled eggs,' it is about time for the editors of wild Western secular papers to lead in prayer from the amen corner."

A FEW hundred years ago Dr. McGlynn would hav been undergoing torture at the hands of the Inquisition, and if he refused to recant the fagots for an auto-da-fé would soon be collected. As Rome is infallible, and never changes, the only reason it does not do this now is because it cannot.—Christian Advocate.

A COMMITTEE has reported this section before the constitutional convention at Salt Lake City, Utah: "Bigamy and polygamy being considered incompatible with a republican form of government, each of them is hereby forbidden and declared a misdemeanor. Any person who shall violate this section shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 and by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months or more than three years, in the discretion of the court."

THE Italian Catholics celebrated the Feast of the Virgin last Saturday with a parade. A horsecar attempting to pass through the procession, the driver was mobbed, and a policeman who came to his assistance was attacked with swords and badly wounded. Eight of the Virgin's bloodthirsty votaries were arrested and lodged in jail.

THE Philadelphia Press makes this interesting statement: "In Minnesota the number of saloons is diminishing under high license, while in Rhode Island it is increasing under Prohibition. There is a moral in all this, but there is no necessity for stating it. Practical temperance reformers know it, and Prohibitionists wouldn't believe it."

THE clergy of Pueblo, Mexico, hav collected over $200,000 for the coronation of the Virgin of Guadaloupe next December. It is estimated that the total contributions of all the Catholics of the country will amount to $1,500,000. It is no wonder that the people of Mexico are the most impoverished lot of wretches in the universe. Catholicism, sooner or later, will reduce any country to a nation of beggars.

THE Whig, of Quincy, Ill., says that a prayer-meeting was held some nights ago on a farm in that section to ask for relief from a drouth. The meeting lasted till midnight. At that hour a bank of clouds crept slowly out of the southwest, and soon spread over the entire western horizon. The prospect of deliverance from the ruin that faced them drove many of the men delirious with joy, and the meeting, which a few minutes before was of the most lugubrious character, broke up with a dance and a prayer of thanksgiving. But the rain did not come.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL, in a communication published recently in London, says that he has received numerous letters from all parts of America on the Irish Home Rule question, and they all recommend the utmost resistance to Mr. Gladstone's policy. "Inasmuch," says Professor Tyndall, "as a desperate gamester, miscalled a statesman, has chosen to invoke ignorant foreign opinion against the instructed opinion of his own countrymen, it is worth showing that American opinion is not entirely on one side."

WE rejoice over the Chicago report of the new trial for the condemned Anarchists. Every fair-minded man will welcome the news. The judicial utterances and legal rulings of Judge Gary at the trial of last year were a disgrace to the American bench, and entitle him to a place alongside of Scroggs and Jeffries. The conviction of the accused was an outrage against evidence, law, decency, fair play, reason, justice, freedom, human nature, and the Constitution.—John Swinton's Paper.

"THE other day," says a Boston correspondent of the Minneapolis Tribune, "a countryman from Cape Cod sought out the office of Zion's Herald, which is near the top of a large building in Bromfield street, one of the upper small rooms, whose location is not readily learned from the street signs. He was looking for 'Mr. Zion.' He had been a reader of the paper for years without parting from the fallacy that Zion was the name of the editor. On this occasion he wanted to argue a denominational point that the latest issue of the paper had declared. Some jokers encouraged him in his delusion, and warned him that Zion might deny his identity, as he didn't like to be disturbed at his work. Mr. Pierce, the reverend editor, did deny that he was Mr. Zion when the countryman at last found him, and when the latter persisted and refused to be denied, the gentle editor opened the sanctum door and assisted the caller out with almost the traditional force that was common in old-time journalism."

WON'T somebody organize a Society for the Protection of Society from Societies? This would seem to be about the last hope of the republic. So true is it that "in union there is strength," that there seems to be no strength outside of unions. The only free men on record are Robinson Crusoe and his man Friday, and they were free only because there were but two of them. Had there been three, the majority would hav formed themselvs into a society and bullied the other fellow. There are in this country, perhaps, a few million people left who are not yet "organized," and who believe that individual liberty is still worth something. How would it do for them to form an anti-society society? Just now a man cannot exhibit an antique statue without dressing it in sheet-iron clothing, a poor man cannot send his child to deliver newspapers, nor can a pedestrian kick a vicious dog without being made miserable by some society with a long name. One party wants to confiscate your property, and another would compel you to drink water. The poor man is unable to sell his labor or the capitalist to buy it without the interference of some organization. Isn't this abou played out?—Life.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

I was on one of the government gunboats on my way to Richmond, and saw them putting this man, through whom so many—oh, so many!—men had lost their lives by starvation, into Fortress Monroe a prisoner. I little thought at that time that the government would feel it incumbent to treat this traitor with such extreme tenderness that the guard would be ordered to change their army shoes for slippers because the noise of the walking of these keepers disturbed the repose of the distinguished prisoner.

After the excitement caused by the death and funeral of President Lincoln, the trial of the assassins and the hanging of the condemned, the people breathed quietly, and then came the word that the teachers of the schools of the freed people would, if they desired, be given passes to Richmond, and a return ticket, by paying the fare one way. This favor was to hold good for a limited number of days. I thought I would like to see Richmond, but my salary did not admit of much superfluous traveling. I think the fare was at that time seven dollars. I'm not sure but there was another reason in the way. We were to go to Secretary Dana for passes, and though I had never met him, I felt sure that he was prejudiced against me for the part I had taken in getting the teacher of the orphan asylum removed. Unlike Secretary Stanton, Dana was from the East, and Massachusetts people were in favor of the teacher because of her name. I never like to ask favors of prejudice, and so, as one after another of the lady teachers came to me urging me to go, I said. "No, I will not ask the secretary for a pass." "Then," said they, "you cannot go, and we shall not hav half as good a time as if you were with us." But they could not induce me. I said, "Go, and depend upon yourselvs."

The day after the departure of these ladies (teachers) Mrs. Parker, the nurse with the ragged shoes, called for some favor. I said: "Don't you wish to go to Richmond? Can't you get a pass for two? If you can, I will pay your expenses in the city." She said: "Yes, I do; but I hav some soldiers whom I am at work for now so I cannot possibly leave, but I hav a pass for two, just given me by the surgeon-general; I will giv you this, but Miss ——— must go with you, as I hav promised her." "No," said I, "I would not go with her." Mrs. Parker went out, and in an hour or two returned with a pass and transportation to and from Richmond for Mrs. Colman. I accordingly went, surprising the ladies very much, as I would not tell them where I obtained the pass, but assured them that Mr. Dana did not giv it. I arrived in Richmond about seven o'clock in the evening of the day following my departure from Washington. The boat-ride was very pleasant; we were out of sight of land some hours. I hav a stomach that never rebels against the motion of the boat—or did not when I was young. I do not wish to try the water now—alas! that we must grow old or die—and at my age it is, according to scripture, that "the grasshopper becomes a burden," much more the sea. I found a colored boy who showed me the way to the "Teacher's Home," I expecting to find my friends there, but the matron said they came but she refused to take them; she had all she could accommodate. I said: "This home is given by the government, with rations for the time being; by what authority do you take possession of this immense house, take in whom you please, and reject others at this time in the evening, a stranger and alone? You say you hav no bed; you hav a floor unoccupied, and an easy chair which I hav possession of and shall remain in till morning; in daylight I will report myself to the commandant and find what it means." I had "struck the nail on the head;" the madam immediately changed her style, prepared me a very comfortable supper, gave me a bed by myself in a room by myself, with comfortable things for the toilet. This woman, with the teachers, one a reverend, was from one Christian society, and I was from a different one, and so, as they came first into possession, they determined to hold it. It was nice to hav accommodations for any friends who should visit the place; there was but one hotel open at that time, the Ballard House, and its charges were very high. In the morning I found the hotel. Most of my friends were preparing to return to Washington, as the length of their purses was not sufficient to pay five or even three dollars a day. "How did you get here, and where did you stay?" "I came by the boat and stayed at the Home, where I expected to find you all," said I. "Well, but they would not allow us to stay." I answered: "They allowed me to stay; why not know your rights and then maintain them? We will look about, and we shall probably find a home with some nice colored family; if not, we will stay at the Home."

We soon found a colored woman who before the war had kept a large boarding-house; she took us, though she was in comparativly small quarters. She was, however, exquisitly clean, and she gave us excellent food. I wish I could repeat for my readers the very graphic account of the taking of Richmond which this black woman gave us. She said: "We almost despaired, as we heard of one city after another being taken by the Union soldiers, and we feared that in some way—we could not tell how—we had offended God, and so he was going to pass Richmond by and leave us in our slavery. We humbled ourselvs in the very dirt, and, with our faces on the ground, we begged God to forgiv the unknown sin, and send us the Yankee soldiers to free us. And on the Monday morning after Jefferson Davis thought it best to leave Richmond," she said, "while going to my kitchen to prepare my breakfast, I saw coming over the hills a number of soldiers, bearing aloft the flag with the stars and stripes. Oh, how my heart leaped for joy! I ran into the street, and, with all our people in this part of the town, fell upon my knees and shouted Glory! And then when President Lincoln came, some days after, I was standing in my door to look at him; he passed so near me that I could hav put my hand upon him. He turned and looked, and certainly bowed to me. Thank the Lord, I saw our deliverer!"

This woman was a free woman, and owned her house; had earned it by keeping boarders. She had buried her husband and only child the last year of the war, and she grieved greatly that not a piece of black goods could be found in all that city that she could robe herself in as a mourner. Like many another bereaved of husband and child, she felt that sable garments would giv her comfort. Grief is its own comforter, I know right well; nothing else soothes us; finally it wears itself out. I was clad in crape myself at that time, and when I found how much this poor woman wanted such, I gave her my bonnet and cape, and took from her a gingham log cabin sun-bonnet, which seemed rather out of place on my head, as you will see, on my way back to Washington.

A woman once a slave, whose history is so marvelous that it deserves a place among the reputed special providences, was one of the company of teachers, as was also her daughter, who was so free from taint of color that she was educated in a New England academy in the old slave days without her parentage being discovered by professor or pupil.

This woman had given her pass to a lady friend from Philadelphia who desired greatly to visit Richmond, and so must return, as she came, by Baltimore. That city not being under military rule at that time, she required no pass. I tried to persuade a teacher who was going to remain in Richmond some two or three weeks to giv this woman her pass, assuring her that I could and would procure one and send to her, but it was of no avail. When I reached the wharf, ready to take passage on the boat for Washington, this person was there to say good-bye, wishing very much she could accompany us, rather than go alone to Baltimore. As I handed my pass for inspection, the officer said, "Which is Mrs. Colman?" "I am Mrs. Colman," said I. "And which is your nurse?" I knew in a moment how he had read the pass, and, putting my hand on this woman's shoulder, I said, "This is the one." He looked at the handsome mulatto, nicely appareled, with rather an elegant bonnet and nicely fitting gloves, and then at me, with bare hands and a gingham sunbonnet on my head, smiled, but indorsed the pass by saying, "All right; go on board." My nurse did not take, and only that her daughter saw that it was a scheme that I fully understood I might not hav been able to get her to go onto the boat. I handed her my basket, and with a good deal of authority said, "Take it and go on board; what are you thinking about?" Bewildered, she turned to her daughter, who echoed my words, and went onto the boat. An officer of the boat, as she attempted to enter the cabin, stopped her, saying, "No niggers allowed in the cabin." I said, "When was the order given that a lady may not take her servants into the cabin?" "I beg pardon," said the man; "I did not notice that you had a servant." So my good friend, a lady in every sense, even in her dress, had a free passage to Washington in the cabin of a steamboat, and to this day she doesn't know how it came about. She knows that when the inspector looked at my pass he asked which was nurse; I put my hand upon her; and when ordered out of the cabin I claimed her right there as my servant. I told no one how it was done at the time, as in more cases than one I hav found it not best to "let the right hand know what the left doeth," but as more than twenty years hav gone by since this occurred, I will copy for my readers the pass:

> Pass Mrs. Colman vol. nurse to Richmond and return with transportation. SURGEON-GENERAL.
> Washington, 18—.

The writing was in the professional style and troublesome to read, and the inspector read the abbreviation "vol" and, and having inquired, and seen both Mrs. Colman and the nurse, he was sure he had deciphered the writing correctly—but smaller mistakes than that hav sometimes caused great trouble. There were two or three other military stations, but the inspectors read the document the same way; one looked sharp, and asked me what the blind word was, but I did not enlighten him, only said that the other officers had called it "and." LUCY N. COLMAN.

A Colloquy.

Orthodox.—My friend, I fear you are on the wrong road, and that your eternal interests are in jeopardy.

Skeptic.—Perhaps so, and I would be greatly obliged if you would tell me how I can mend my ways and avoid the dangers to which you refer. I try to lead an upright life. I do as I would be done by. I do not steal, nor bear false witness, nor judge in uncharity. I giv to the poor as liberally as my means will allow, and I hold the truth above price, and to it, if need be, would sacrifice every personal benefit.

O.—I concede all this, and, further, that in moral worth you surpass many real Christians, saying nothing of merely professing ones. But you still lack the one thing needful, religion. Without that you can never enter the kingdom of God, nor behold the glory of his presence.

S.—If so, please tell me which of the multitudinous religions I should embrace.

O.—The Christian, of course. It is beyond question the most pure, the most holy, the one and only true faith.

S.—If what you say be true, it seems strange that the good being for so many ages left his poor children, whom he loves more tenderly than an earthly parent loves his own offspring, in ignorance regarding their spiritual necessities, and almost as surprising that the large majority of mankind, after the gospel has been preached to them, should reject its claims and adhere to their ancestors' beliefs. But, granting all you say, to which branch of the Christian church should I connect myself?

O.—With almost any except the Universalist or Unitarian—with any which holds to the essentials of belief, such as justification by faith, the divinity of Christ, the trinity, baptism, and the new birth. New forms and minor articles of faith are of comparativly small moment. The cardinal principles of belief, in regard to which the churches are in substantial accord, honestly professed and practically exemplified in the discharge of the daily duties of life, are all that is required to constitute the Christian.

S.—Will you permit me to ask who has the divine authority for defining the "essentials" of belief? And, further, what differences of opinion in regard to the interpretation and exposition of articles of faith may be safely indulged? You, sir, are a Protestant. As such you believe in justification by faith alone. The Catholic church holds to the doctrin of justification by faith and works. That church exceeds yours both in antiquity and number of adherents. How am I to decide between your respectiv claims? But suppose by "private interpretation" I am guided to an opinion adverse to yours, what then? Or supposing that I am a scholar and logician, and that after vast research and by weighing the strongest arguments, pro and con, I attain the absolute truth of the question, how will those fare who are equally as honest in their search for truth as I, who hav neither the time, means, nor education to indulge in exhaustiv investigation? Must they not accept, as almost invariably they do, the doctrins of the church under whose influence they hav been raised or chance to come? And will he whom they strive so hard to serve acceptably eternally damn them because they are not able to discover the truth for want of light which his providence has denied them? Again, as to baptism, the Roman Catholic and the Episcopalian hold to the doctrin of baptismal regeneration, so also certain members of the Baptist church, while Presbyterians and Methodists regard baptism as simply an initiatory rite. Volumes hav been written on both sides of the question, and yet the divergence of the sects is as great as ever. Who shall decide when preachers disagree? So likewise as to the mode of baptism. Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Methodists baptize by sprinkling or pouring; Baptists, by immersion, which they deem the only true Christian and apostolic baptism. Libraries groan under the weight of books of controversy on this question, and Greek and Hebrew lexicons, the writings of the fathers and classical authors, hav been laid under tribute, but in vain. The question is still undetermined, and is, it would seem, undeterminable. So also of plenary inspiration, predestination, etc. Even regarding the object for which the precious blood of your Lord was shed there is a world-wide difference of opinion between Christian sects. Some say it was shed for the salvation of all men, others for the "elect" only. But why enlarge? Every article of faith on which the Christian world agree is classed among the essentials, and those in regard to which they differ among non-essentials. The reason is obvious. No one sect alone could contend successfully against "the powers of darkness," i. e., honest, searching criticism and unbiased historical investigation. Therefore the sects hav come to a kind of sub rosa understanding by means of which they are enabled to suspend hostilities among themselvs, and unite their forces against the common enemy.

O.—Do you then hold that Christians do not know what doctrins they believe are essential to salvation, and do you charge those who are foremost in every good work with dissimulation and falsehood?

S.—I judge of what they believe by their own creeds as expounded by their best writers. But though we skeptics accept the statements of Christian professors in regard to what doctrins they hold, the logical results which are said to flow from them we often question. For instance, we believe that Presbyterians hold to infant baptism, for they say so; that Baptists deny that ordinance to infants, etc; that the former hold that sprinkling is an all-sufficient mode of baptism; that the latter claim that baptism is not a mode but an act, and that that act can only be performed by immersion; but when either of them tells us that this variance is "non-essential," we dissent. From the Christian standpoint baptism opens the door to the kingdom of heaven—the church—outside of which, according to some—the majority—no one can be admitted to the celestial paradise, while all hold that without its sacred precincts no one is as safe as within them. The same line of reasoning applies to infant baptism. The Catholic church holds that the infant that dies without the benefit of this rite can never enter heaven. We charge no one with dishonesty for holding a belief different from our own. Most Christians, doubtless, think themselvs honest.

O.—After all you hav said, whatever doubts you may entertain, will you not admit that the Christian has this advantage over the skeptic: If the skeptic is right in his belief, the Christian is just as well off as he, whereas, if the Christian doctrin prove true, the skeptic's condition is sad indeed—hence that my faith is, at least, safer than yours? But you say Christians think they are honest. Can a man think he is honest without being so?"

S.—If belief depended on volition and error was not pernicious in its consequences, there might be some force in the argument predicated of the safety of the Christian faith. But belief is not a matter of choice, but of conviction, and false doctrins are prolific of injurious results. We may entertain errors which, at first, seem harmless, or even fruitful of good, but, sooner or later, their baleful effects will be manifest. False views which hav led to ecclesiastical domination are no exception to this rule. Christianity is an outgrowth from Judaism. As a system it must stand or fall with it. By the teachings of synagogs and churches the upas-tree of intolerance has been nurtured and has shed its pestilential influence over Christendom. To prove their loyalty to God nations hav waged wars against nations, neighbor has been arrayed against neighbor, and brother against brother in deadly feuds. Cold, cruel ecclesiastical murders by tens of thousands hav been perpetrated to prepare the world for the reign of the Prince of Peace. The bread of the poor is even now snatched from their mouths to appease the hunger of an insatiate priesthood, and their hard-earned farthings extorted from them by appeals to their superstitious fears for the building and endowment of huge cathedrals. In free America the people are taxed to pay for the erection and adornment of luxurious churches and parsonages by reason of millions and millions of dollars' worth of church property being, by law, exempt from taxation. Thus dissenters are forced to contribute for the propagation of a faith which they esteem pernicious. So also Christians—the Protestants paying for the support of the Catholic hierarchy, and Catholics for building houses of worship for Protestants. Faith has antagonized science, and thereby impeded the general enlightenment of the people. It has cremated witches, butchered heretics, and even now inflames the ignoble passions of men to such a degree that the most worthy are often, to a great extent, debarred from social and business advantages because they cannot, in conscience, subscribe to popular formulas of faith.

But you ask: Can a man think he is honest without being so? Yes, and this is a very dangerous kind of self deception. No one who adheres to a faith through motivs of fear is, in the highest sense of the word, honest. Your argument founded on the alleged safety of your belief is an appeal, not to my reason, but to my apprehension of possible danger. The thoroughly honest man forms his own opinions without regard to personal consequences, and will embrace the truth, as he apprehends it, whenever and wherever found. Belief is not the child of volition, but of conviction. I cannot believe a thing simply because I would like to believe it, but because the evidences of its reality commend themselvs to my judgment. Even if your opinion be safer than mine, I cannot adopt it, much as I might desire to do so, unless by facts and arguments addressed to my understanding I am led to believe it sound. People who hav the courage of their convictions never take council of their fears.

O.—Though severe in your strictures, you are not abusiv, and, though not convinced by your arguments, I confess that if all skeptics were like you I should entertain a higher opinion of that class. Good-bye.

S.—And if all Christians were as much disposed as you to listen in kindness and patience to adverse criticism, I should place a higher estimate on their system. Good-bye. B. W. L.

"Rome's Blow Descends!"

The above head-line, in the biggest kind of big "caps," appeared in the Catholic Sun—one of Dana's "two papers, both daily"—Sunday the 9th inst.

"Great gosh!" I exclaimed, as though the editor were before me, "you don't say so? Who's crushed? Anybody?"

Believing that the force and effect of the blow were discounted long, long years ago, I don't believe anybody was crushed very severely.

"Rome's blows" do not crush as they did when people were more deeply steeped in superstition than to-day, though too deeply to-day; and the Prince of Darkness, old Pecci of Rome, delivers blows that are more or less vain; in this instance, pretty much considerably more than less, I think.

All the "blows" that Rome has on hand at this date, and all she can deliver, I would rather hav descend on me than a single blow from J. Lawrence Sullivan's "right duke"—you bet!

A fig—no, a straw—for old Pecci's "blows," and the "blows" of all other highcockolorums of superstition. Frauds all, from pope to priest, including the Protestant quota, and they know it themselvs, if their poor duped and deluded followers do not.

As the Sun bends the knee so servilly to Rome, to that reminiscence of days when superstition's grip was tighter than to day, old Pecci and his entire gang of leeches—cardinals, archbishops (arch-devils), etc, etc.—I wonder it is not called the Catholic Sun and done with it. Si Slokum.

For Elmina's Defense.

The treasurer of the National Defense Association acknowledges the receipt of the following sums for the Elmina Fund: Mrs. Frank Raymond, $1; Mrs. Avilla Flint, $1; Mrs. Eliza Crittenden, $1; E. Moyer, M.D., $2; Herbert Merrick, $2; Hon. John C. Greene, $5; Miss Grace Carrington, 50 cents; Mrs. Eliza Husted, 50 cents; Thomas Knight, $5; F. G. Welch, M.D., $1; D. Cummins, $5; C. B. Reynolds, $5; Fred. Smith, $1; Rev. G. W. Powell, $1; Mrs. Electa Curtis, $5; Mrs. Hattie Allen, $1; Mrs. A. M. Purdy, $1; J. J. Johnson, $1; A. P. Johnson, $1; Rees John, $1; John McCrory, $1. Other contributions are in the hands of Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., J. P. Mendum, and Elmina herself. It may not be improper to add that the management of the National Defense Association is gratefully appreciativ of the fact that no call has ever been made by it without being heartily and generously responded to. It should be suggested, however, that the earnest work of a devoted Liberal may sometimes be quite a helpful as a money contribution, if not more so. If everyone would do as Mr. E. W. Miner, of Axtel, Kansas, did, who says in his letter to The Truth Seeker (issue of July 9th): "I received three circulars from the Defense Association, and posted one, with clipping from Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, in our post-office, with the notice that I would receive and forward contributions, signing my name, and posted the others in stores," the difficulties which the Defense Association has to struggle against would be very speedily overcome.

Ed. W. Chamberlain, Treas. N. D. A.

News and Notes.

Sunday evening, June 26th, I lecture at New Era, in the camp of our Spiritualist friends, who keep things pretty lively in this part of the country. I spoke in behalf of "Universal Mental Liberty," which in this life or the life to come is the glory of existence. The Secular philosophy includes all worlds, for, no matter how many there are, we can only take one at a time. The continuance of life does not destroy the value of supreme emphasis on what you hav now got. Enjoy the moments as they fly, is just as good philosophy for an angel as for a man.

I had a pleasant time among our ethereal allies who see worlds on worlds and yet behold the beauty of earth. I had a message from D. M. Bennett, who declared that my lecture tour would be a grand success, and that some time I would be an exponent of Spiritual philosophy. I hav a heart for any fate, and, whatever change I may undergo, liberty, science, and humanity will be the noblest joy.

Sunday evening I lectured at Salem to a small audience. The capital city of Oregon is indeed a sluggish town, overburdened with churches and quite under the puritanic rule. But we hav stanch friends here, and I hope for progress. Messrs. Forstner, Tiffany, Hawkins, Willis, and others will giv some light amid the funereal pall, and promis of brighter days. The Rev. Mr. Skiggs, once the Campbellite minister of this place, now a Unitarian, is on the broad road to Liberalism. He presided at the ecture. Some friends were present from quite a distance—John Phillips, of Spring Valley; Asa Strange, of Eola, etc.

Monday I returned to Silverton in order to hear the Rev. Mr. Driver, whom the Methodists pitted against me for debate, but he refused to enter the field. He preferred to take it all alone in his pulpit; and I do not wonder at this, for a more loose theologian I hav seldom heard, although he knows how to talk in a glib and sounding fashion. One of his wild statements was this, that there had been no particle of knowledge of the unseen world given since the resurrection of Jesus. This, of course, rules out the whole of the New Testament, not a word of which was written until fifty years after the death of Jesus, and since it conveys no information, of course it is useless as a revelation. He also said we had no knowledge of moral truth outside of the Bible. At the same time he declared that we could not prove the divinity of the Bible by itself, but by the seal put upon it, like a will in court. How can we prove the divinity of the seal unless we know good and evil? And yet we don't know good and evil outside of the teachings of the Bible. "We must prove the truth of the Bible," says Driver, "before we read it;" and yet the capacity to prove the truth comes only from the reading of the Bible. What a driver that is! I shall certainly drive him when I come back to Silverton July 15th, and giv a lecture on "The Bible."

I spent Monday evening with Robert Scott, a stanch Infidel with the blood and poetry of Burns in his enthusiastic nature. He has two thousand acres of land, a saw-mill, grist-mill, cheese factory, etc. Round about his ranch there is quite a little village. He is not afraid to speak his mind, and the Christians are obliged to respect his rights.

We arrived at 1 o'clock at night. In the early morning we arose and took our way in the sparkling dawn through the big woods to the Soda Springs, where we had a drink of the refreshing beverage. This is a delightful resort, but the roads by which it is attained are so difficult that but few penetrate to the sylvan abode.

From Soda Springs we go on to Malalla, to Wright's Bridge, which we reach in the afternoon. We find flags flying, the band playing, and the beautiful grove full of people. Fully four hundred were present. Here we hav a splendid time for three days. In the afternoon I lecture, and in the evening the young folks dance. They come from every direction, twenty and thirty miles off. Wilbur and Saunders are present from Eagle Creek, and they capture me for a lecture there August 10th and 11th. Mr. Wilbur owns a hall, and we expect to hav a grand time. Robert Devine came from his beautiful prairie paradise snugly packed away in the bosom of the hills—a quiet spot where he has what he calls his "den," in which, after a life of adventure and turmoil, he rejoices amid a pile of Freethought books and papers. Among others is G. J. Trollinger, the "boss whittler" of Oregon. He can whittle anything out of a stick—articles of most beautiful and delicate fashion. I thought he was a Yankee sure, from the Nutmeg State, but he was born in Indiana, and has never been east of that state. He is one of the pioneers of this country, and has staked off twenty-seven hundred acres of land. He has a saw-mill, grist-mill, etc. He gets up at 4 o'clock every morning, and keeps things on the go. With him in the Infidel ranks are Reuben Wright, Silas Wright, D. R. Wells, James Dickey, L. Mayer, Philip Graves, A. B. Klise, Dr. Goucher, T. C. Mack, A. J. Baty, George Knight, Ira Moody, John Carbouric, J. Zeek, Mrs. May, of Canby, G. W. Smith, Rolla Herring, A. J. Casson, B. F. Linn, and a hundred others. Some Christians, however, were present. The Rev. John Darnell, a "hard-shell" Baptist minister, seventy-three years of age, was on the platform at all the lectures, and he stood the bombarding like a man and never flinched. I admire his pluck. He was born to be an Infidel, but circumstances made him a Baptist minister. I think he would preach a pretty sensible sermon.

On the second day we organized, and over one hundred names were enrolled under the banners of Freethought, and so Molalla vies with Silverton as to which shall be the brightest star that blazes on the forehead of the dawn. They will also build a hall, and so when I come again two Freethought temples will greet the sunlight and the starlight. This is splendid encouragement for our pioneer work.

Friday we come to New Era, and take dinner with our noble Liberal friends, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Jesse, who read The Truth Seeker with all their heart and mind, and whose cordial welcome made a delightful hour upon our pilgrim way. Friday evening we lecture again at Salem to a small house, but the courage of such warm-hearted friends as Forstner and Tiffany and a few others makes even this church-ridden city a hopeful battle-field.

They are bound to keep me at work in Oregon, and almost every night is occupied. I shall be at Portland to-morrow; McMinnville and McCay next week; Corvallis, July 10th; Stayton, July 12th, 13th, 14th; Silverton, July 15th; Forest Grove, July 17th; Scappoose, July 19th, 20th, 21st; Seattle, Or., July 24th; Port Angeles, I expect, July 31st; and between these dates Newcastle, Black Diamond, and Franklin; Port Townsend, Aug. 7th, 8th, 9th; Eagle Creek, Or., Aug. 10th, 11th; Colfax, W. T., Aug. 14th; and then Spokane Falls, Pendleton, Union City, Baker City, etc.

The probabilities now are that the grand national Congress will be held at Chicago next November. If so, we hope that every Liberal in the country will make an effort to be there. The present campaign is so encouraging and the interest so great that, without doubt, our coming Congress will be the most important and successful of any, and will giv a vast impulse to our work.

Portland promises to be the chief city of Oregon. She has grown rapidly in the last few years, and now numbers about thirty-five thousand inhabitants. The resources of Oregon are not yet developed. Her wheat and fruit are unsurpassed, and the name "Oregon" is beginning to be a passport to favor in the markets of the world. The building of railroads will open an immense country to settlement, containing some of the richest farming lands on the continent. Our friends, A. F. Neunert, C. H. Saunders, and A. B. Niles, met us at the station, and it did not take long to feel quite at home in this lively camp, where the bustle of preparation was going on for the Fourth of July. I had met Niles at New Era, and so I was not long a stranger in the crowd. It takes only a few minutes to make old acquaintance in this Western land. C. H. Saunders is one of the veterans of our cause—three quarters of a century old, and enthusiastic still. He has a cow that givs six gallons of milk a day, and makes fifty dollars' worth of butter a month. It is enough to make one feel young to own such an animal as that. I must enroll that cow in the Liberal ranks. I don't believe there is a particle of orthodoxy in her veins. She livs for the sake of humanity.

A. F. Neunert is one of our strenuous German allies—always at the front. He has made and lost half a dozen fortunes in this country, but no amount of adversity can keep him at the bottom. He is bound to rise. He is earnest for Freethought, and work is made easy, with so splendid a comrade to smooth the difficulties and provide the sinews of war, in spite of indifference and cowardice, which are too much in the way of progress.

In the golden evening our friend Neunert takes me in his carriage over the big hill near the city, from whence an immense panorama is seen—the winding river, Mt. Hood, Mt. St. Helens, etc.—a magnificent picture, and about two miles beyond we come to "a green and mild declivity," where, in a country mansion, resides our genial enthusiast and bright dreamer, Cornelius Beal, who, amid trees and flowers and fruit, is recuperating age with nature's beautiful life. It was a pleasure to meet with this broad-minded philosopher, this poetic worker, who never gets discouraged, but looks at the bright side, and keeps on with a generous faith in man's boundless good. A gentle reformer is Friend Beal, yet strong in purpose and undeviating in devotion to ideas. He sees good in everything, and hope amid all the shadows of man's devious way.

Our meetings at Portland were well attended Sunday afternoon and evening, and the outlook is encouraging for advancement in the future. Friends came from a distance—Martin Miller, S. C. Scharnhorst, and others, who for years hav been in the picket line of freedom, and, almost alone, hav upheld the principles of radical progress. Col. G. E. Caukin, Mrs. Haight, of East Portland; Ed. Aliskey, Henry Rosefelt, H. C. Schaeht, Dr. Nichols, J. Krats, Mark Levi, J. Harold, G. H. Ward, I. H. Fisk, C. W. Herralt, H. Simm, I. S. Ordway, Dr. Hart, Fred. Witti, Adolph Rebe, Henry Stanforth, Dr. Lewis, Mr. Wheeler, Mr. Hall, Mr. Cole, Lincoln and Krouse; Messrs. Durant, Benheimer, Church, E. Closset, Mason, Battin, Smith, D. W. Horlbing, R. Lax, McClay, and many others are interested in the Freethought work, and this commercial center of the Northwest will, no doubt, hav a flourishing Secular Union.

Monday was a warm, dusty day of music, parade, boom of cannon, etc. Thousands of people were in Portland from the surrounding country. There was quite a display of fireworks on the river in the evening, and at half-past eleven the top of Mt. Hood, seventy miles off, shone with an enormous ball of red fire, the grandest and loftiest illumination on the continent in honor of the national holiday.

Tuesday, July 5th, I come to McMinnville, a pleasant and thriving town of fifteen hundred inhabitants about fifty miles from Portland. This is a somewhat orthodox place. The Baptists are in the lead, and hav a college established for the making of ministers. But they only graduated one minister last year, and so the supply is not very great. I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Booth, who were once good church-members, but are now earnest in the Liberal cause.

I met also D. A. K. Olds, seventy-five years of age, who came to this country decades ago, and who has had a hard fight with fortune, and from infancy, almost, has been a Freethinker. He has won the respect of the community by his straightforward manliness. He has been a noble soldier of liberty. B. F. Fuller; J. E. Brooks; J. H. Olds, of Lafayette; E. N. Ford; J. R. Booth; Littleton Younger; Robert Laughlin and Lee Laughlin, of North Yam Hill; W. J. Garrison; E. T. Wallace, of Amity; L. A. Wilson; Jonathan Bogue; W. T. Kutch; J. W. Cook; S. Richardson; F. M. Boyer, and others are also ardent friends of progress, and my campaign here was one of the best along the route. The Opera House was well filled the first evening, and the numbers increased with every lecture. On the last evening a Secular Union was organized, with a membership of nearly fifty. McMinnville is in the midst of a beautiful farming country. It has a bright future, and I believe that a Freethought hall will some time be one of its chief attractions.

From McMinnville I go, Friday, June 8th, to McCoy, through a country that shines with harvest glory, and where men are busily at work. I am greeted by Joseph K. Sears, one of the most independent of Liberals, and who has no particle of fear in his composition, no matter what the odds against him. He is thoroughly in favor of reform and honesty, and is one of the most respected citizens in the community. I found a pleasant sojourn with him and his family—a good rest—and in the evening at Perrydale, two miles off, in the school-building, gave a lecture to a crowded house. They are constructing three or four new church edifices about McCoy, but evidently Freethought has many supporters. A. H. Denny, Kenneth Campbell, W. W. Stockton, N. H. Greg, John Nutter, Matt Caldwell, Joseph Black, J. J. Hill, etc., are all outspoken Liberals, and so I think we shall be able to hold the fort in spite of the orthodox thunders.

I hav thus been kept busy every night, and wherever I go there is enthusiasm and interest. Tomorrow, July 10th, I am at Corvallis; July 12th, 13th, 14th, at Stayton; July 15th, at Silverton; July 16th, 17th, at Forest Grove; July 18th, 19th, at Eagle Creek; July 20th, at East Portland; July 21st, at Portland; July 22d, at Astoria; July 23d, 24th, at Seattle, W. T.; July 25th, 26th, at Newcastle; July 27th, 28th, at Black Diamond and Franklin; July 29th, 30th, 31st, and August 1st at Snohomish; August 2d to 9th at Port Angeles and Port Townsend; August 11th at Portland; August 13th, 14th, 15th, at Colfax, W, T.; and afterward at Spokane Falls, Walla Walla, Pendleton, Union City, Baker City, Prairie City, etc., but the dates are not yet fixed.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

I.—PHYSICAL MAXIMS.

CHAPTER I.—HEALTH.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

Nature has guarded the health of her creatures by a marvelous system of protective intuitions. The sensitive membrane of the eye resents the intrusion of every foreign substance. An intuitive sense of discomfort announces every injurious extreme of temperature. To the unperverted taste of animals in a state of nature wholesome food is pleasant, injurious substances repulsive or insipid. Captain Kane found that only the rage of famine will tempt the foxes of the Arctic coastlands to touch spoiled meat. In times of scarcity the baboons of the Abyssinian mountains greedily hunt for edible roots, which an unerring faculty enables them to distinguish from the poisonous varieties. The naturalist Tschudi mentions a troop of half-tamed chamois forcing their way through a shingle roof, rather than pass a night in the stifling atmosphere of a goat stable.

Man in his primitive state had his full share of those protective instincts, which still manifest themselves in children and Nature-guided savages. It is a mistake to suppose that the lowest of those savages are naturally fond of ardent spirits. The travelers Park, Gerstaecker, Vambery, Kohl, De Tocqueville, and Brehm agree that the first step on the road to ruin is always taken in deference to the example of the admired superior race, if not in compliance with direct persuasion. The negroes of the Senegal high lands shuddered at the first taste of alcohol, but from a wish to conciliate the good will of their visitors hesitated to decline their invitations, which subsequently, indeed, became rather superfluous. The children of the wilderness unhesitatingly prefer the hardships of a winter camp to the atmospheric poisons of our tenement houses. Shamyl Ben Haddin, the Circassian war chief, whose iron constitution had endured the vicissitudes of thirty-four campaigns, pathetically protested against the pest air of his Russian prison cell, and warned his jailers that, unless his dormitory was changed, Heaven would hold them responsible for the guilt of his suicide. I have known country boys to step out into a shower of rain and sleet to escape from the contaminated atmosphere of a city workshop, and after a week's work in a spinning mill return to the penury of their mountain homes, rather than purchase dainties at the expense of their lungs.

The word frugality, in its original sense, referred literally to a diet of tree-fruits, in distinction to carnivorous fare, and nine out of ten children still decidedly prefer ripe fruit and farinaceous dishes to the richest meats. They as certainly prefer easy, home-made clothes to the constraint of fashionable fripperies. The main tenets of our dress-reformers are anticipated in the sensible garments of many half-civilized nations. Boys, within reach of a free bathing river, can dispense with the advice of the hydropathic school. They delight in exercise; they laugh at the imaginary danger of fresh-air draughts, and the perils of barefoot rambles in wet and dry. They would cast their vote in favor of the outdoor pursuit of hundreds of occupations which custom, rather than necessity, now associates with the disadvantages of indoor confinement. The hygienic influence of arboreal vegetation has been recognized by the ablest pathologists of modern times; avenues of shade trees have been found to redeem the sanitary condition of many a grimy city, and the eminent hygienist, Schrodt, holds that, as a remedial institution, a shady park is worth a dozen drug stores. But all these lessons only confirm an often manifested, and too often suppressed, instinct of our young children: their passionate love of woodland sports, their love of tree shade, of greenwood camps, of forest life in all its forms. Those who hold that "nature" is but a synonym of "habit" should witness the rapture of city children at first sight of forest glades and shady meadow brooks, and compare it with the city-dread of the Swiss peasant lad or the American backwoods boy, sickened by the fumes and the uproar of a large manufacturing town. A thousands years of vice and abnormal habits have not yet silenced the voice of the physical conscience that recalls our steps to the path of Nature, and will not permit us to transgress her laws unwarned.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The reward of nature-abiding habits is not confined to the negative advantage of escaping the discomforts of disease. In the pursuit of countless competitive avocations the Art of Survival is a chief secret of success, but in this age of sanitary abuses our lives are mostly half-told tales. Our season ends before the trees of hope have time to ripen their fruit; before their day's work is done our toilers are overtaken by the shadows of approaching night. Sanitary reforms would undoubtedly lengthen our average term of life, and an increase of longevity alone would solve the most vexing riddles of existence: the apparent injustice of fate, the disproportion of merit and compensation, the aimlessness, the illusive promises and baffled hopes of life. For millions of our fellow-men an increase of health and longevity would suffice to make life decidedly worth living. Health lessens the temptations to many vices. Perfect health blesses its possessor with a spontaneous cheerfulness almost proof against the frowns of fortune and the cares of poverty. With a meal of barley cakes and milk, a straw couch, and scant clothing of homespun linen, a shepherd-boy in the highlands of the Austrian Alps may enjoy existence to a degree that exuberates in frolic and jubilant shouts, while all the resources of wealth cannot recall the sunshine which sickness has banished from the life of the dyspeptic glutton. If happiness could be computed by measure and weight, it would be found that her richest treasures are not stored in gilded walls, but in the homes of frugal thrift, of rustic vigor and nature-loving independence. The sweetness of health reflects itself in grace of form and deportment, and wins friends where the elegance of studied manners gains only admirers. Health is also a primary condition of that clearness of mind the absence of which can be only partially compensated by the light of learning. Health is the basis of mental as of bodily vigor; country-bred boys have again and again carried off the prizes of academical honors from the pupils of refined cities, and the foremost reformers of all ages and countries have been men of the people; low-born, but not the less well born, sons of hardy rustics and mechanics, from Moses, Socrates, Epictetus, Jesus Ben Josef, and Mohammed, to Luther, Rousseau, Thomas Paine, and Abraham Lincoln.

C.—PERVERSION.

Habitual sin against the health-laws of Nature was originally chiefly a consequence of untoward circumstances. Slaves, paupers, immigrants to the inhospitable climes of the higher latitudes, were forced to adopt abnormal modes of life which, in the course of time, hardened into habits. Man, like all the varieties of his four-handed relatives, is a native of the tropics, and the diet of our earliest man-like ancestors was, in all probability, frugal: tree-fruits, berries, nuts, roots, and edible herbs and gums. But the first colonists of the winter lands were obliged to eke out an existence by eating the flesh of their fellow-creatures, and a carnivorous diet thus became the habitual and, in many countries, almost the exclusive diet of the nomadic inhabitants.

Alcohol is a product of fermentation, and the avarice of a cruel master may have forced his slaves to quench their thirst with fermented must or hydromel till habit begot a baneful second nature, and the, at first reluctant, victims of intoxication learned to prefer spoiled to fresh grape-juice. Sedentary occupations, however distasteful at first, are apt to engender a sluggish aversion to physical exercise, and even habitual confinement in a vitiated atmosphere may at last become a second nature, characterized by a morbid dread of fresh air. The slaves of the Roman landowners had to pass their nights in prison-like dungeons, and may have contracted the first germ of that mental disease known as the night-air superstition, the idea, namely, that after dark the vitiated atmosphere of a stifling dormitory is preferable to the balm of the cooling night wind.

In modern times an unprecedented concurrence of circumstances has stimulated a feverish haste in the pursuit of wealth, and thus indirectly led to the neglect of personal hygiene. The abolition of the public festivals by which the potentates of the pagan empires compensated their subjects for the loss of political freedom, the heartless egotism of our wealthy Pharisees, venal justice, and the dire bondage of city life all help to stimulate a headlong race toward the goal of the promised land of ease and independence—a goal reached only by a favored few compared with the multitudes who daily drop down wayworn and exhausted.

But the deadliest blow to the cause of health was struck by the anti-natural fanaticism of the Middle Ages, the world-hating infatuation of the maniacs who depreciated every secular blessing as a curse in disguise, and despised their own bodies as they despised nature, life, and earth. The disciples of the world-renouncing messiah actually welcomed disease as a sign of divine favor, they gloried in decrepitude and deformity, and promoted the work of degeneration with a persevering zeal never exceeded by the enlightened benefactors of the human race. For a period of fifteen hundred years the ecclesiastic history of Europe is the history of a systematic war against the interests of the human body; the "mortification of the flesh" was enjoined as a cardinal duty of a true believer; health-giving recreations were suppressed, while health-destroying vices were encouraged by the example of the clergy; domestic hygiene was utterly neglected, and the founders of some twenty-four different monastic orders vied in the invention of new penances and systematic outrages upon the health of the poor convent slaves. Their diet was confined to the coarsest and often most loathsome food; they were subjected to weekly bleedings, to profitless hardships and deprivations; their sleep was broken night after night; fasting was carried to a length which often avenged itself in permanent insanity; and their only compensation for a daily repetition of health-destroying afflictions was the permission to indulge in spiritual vagaries and spirituous poisons: the same bigots who grudged their followers a night of unbroken rest or a mouthful of digestible food indulged them in quantities of alcoholic beverages that would have staggered the conscience of a modern beer-swiller.

The bodily health of a community was held so utterly below the attention of a Christian magistrate that every large city became a hotbed of contagious diseases; small-pox and scrofula became pandemic disorders; the pestilence of the Black Death ravaged Europe from end to end—nay, instead of trying to remove the cause of the evil, the wretched victims were advised to seek relief in prayer and self-torture, and a philosopher uttering a word of protest against such illusions would have risked to have his tongue torn out by the roots and his body consigned to the flames of the stake.

Mankind has never wholly recovered from that reign of insanity. Indifference to many of the plainest health-laws of nature is still the reproach of our so-called civilization. Our moralists rant about the golden streets of the New Jerusalem, but find no time to expurgate the slums of their own cities; our missionary societies spend millions to acquaint the natives of distant islands with the ceremony of baptism, but refuse to contribute a penny to the establishment of free public baths for the benefit of their poor neighbors, whose children are scourged or caged like wild beasts for trying to mitigate the martyrdom of the midsummer season by a bath in the waters of the next river. Temperance, indeed, is preached in the name of the miracle-monger who turned water into alcohol; but millions of toilers who seek to drown their misery in the Lethe of intoxication are deprived of every healthier pastime; the magistrates of our wealthy cities rage with penal ordinances against the abettors of public amusements on the day when nine-tenths of our laborers find their only leisure for recreation. Poor factory children who would spend the holidays in the paradise of the green hills are lured into the baited trap of a Sabbath-school and bribed to memorize the stale twaddle of Hebrew ghost-stories or the records of fictitious genealogies; but the offer to enlarge the educational sphere of our public schools by the introduction of a health primer would be scornfully ejected as an attempt to divert the attention of the pupils from more important topics.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

But the laws of Nature cannot be outraged with impunity, and the aid of supernatural agencies has never yet protected our ghost-mongers from the consequences of their sins against the monitions of their physical conscience. The neglect of cleanliness avenges itself in diseases which no prayer can avert; during the most filthful and prayerful period of the Middle Ages, seven out of ten city-dwellers were subject to scrofula of that especially malignant form that attacks the glands and the arteries as well as the skin. Medical nostrums and clerical hocus-pocus of the ordinary sort were, indeed, so notoriously unavailing against that virulent affection that thousands of sufferers took long journeys to try the efficacy of a king's touch, as recorded by the unanimous testimony of contemporary writers, as well as in the still current term of a sovereign remedy. A long foot-journey, with its opportunities for physical exercise, outdoor camps, and changes of diet, often really effected the desired result; but, on their return to their reeking hovels, the convalescents experienced a speedy relapse, and had either to repeat the wearisome journey or resign themselves to the "mysterious dispensation" of a Providence which obstinately refused to let miracles interfere with the normal operation of the physiological laws recorded in the protests of instinct. Stench, nausea, and sick-headaches might, indeed, have enforced those protests upon the attention of the sufferers; but the disciples of Antinaturalism had been taught to mistrust the promptings of their natural desires, and to accept discomforts as signs of divine favor, or, in extreme cases, to trust their abatement to the intercession of the saints, rather than to the profane interference of secular science.

The dungeon-life of the monastic maniacs, and the abject submission to the nuisance of atmospheric impurities, avenged themselves in the ravages of pulmonary consumption; the votaries of dungeon-smells were taught the value of fresh air by the tortures of an affliction from which only the removal of the cause could deliver a victim, and millions of orthodox citizens died scores of years before the attainment of a life term which a seemingly inscrutable dispensation of Heaven grants to the unbelieving savages of the wilderness. The cheapest of all remedies, fresh air, surrounded them in immeasurable abundance, craving admission and offering them the aid which Nature grants even to the lowliest of her creatures, but a son of a miracle-working church had no concern with such things, and was enjoined to rely on the efficacy of mystic ceremonies: "If any man is sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." "And the prayer of faith shall cure the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up."

Thousands of the fatuous bigots who prayed for "meekness of spirit" continued to gorge themselves with the food of carnivorous animals, and thus inflamed their passions with the sanguinary, remorseless propensities of those brutes. Luigi Cornaro, the Italian reformer, assures us that it was no uncommon thing for a nobleman or prelate of his century to swallow fourteen pounds of strong meats at a single meal, and that, after invoking the blessing of Heaven upon such a repast, the devourer of meat-pies would rise with his paunch distended "like the hide of a drowned dog." The "Love of Enemies," "forgiveness and meekness," were on their lips; but those fourteen pounds of meat-pie worked out their normal result; and among the carnivorous saints of that age we accordingly find men whose fiendish inhumanity would have appalled the roughest legionary of pagan Rome. Cæsar Borgia, the son of a highest ecclesiastic dignitary, a disciple of a priestly training-school, and himself a prince of the church, seems to have combined the stealthy cunning of a viper with the bloodthirst of a hyena. Four times he made and broke the most solemn treaties, in order to get an opportunity to invade the territory of an unprepared neighbor. His campaigns were conducted with a truculence denounced even by his own allies; with his own hand he poisoned fourteen of his boon companions, in order to possess himself of their property; twenty-three of his political and clerical rivals were removed by the dagger of hired assassins or executed upon the testimony of suborned perjurers. He tried to poison his brother-in law, Prince Alphonso of Aragon, in order to facilitate his design of seducing his own sister; he made repeated, and at last partly successful, attempts to poison the brother of his mother and his own father, the pope.

The heartless neglect of sanitary provisions for the comfort of the poor avenges itself in epidemics that visit the abodes of wealth as well as the hovels of misery. A stall-fed preacher of our southern seaport towns may circulate a petition for the suppression of Sunday excursions, in order to prevent the recreation-needing toilers of his community from leaving town on St. Collection Day; he may advocate the arrest of bathing schoolboys, in order to suppress an undue love of physical enjoyments, or to gratify a female tithe-payer who seeks an opportunity of displaying her prudish virtue at the expense of the helpless; he may vote to suppress outdoor sports in the cool of the late evening, when the inhabitants of the tenement streets are trying to enjoy an hour of extra Sabbatarian recreation—a privilege to be reserved for the saints who can rest six days out of seven, and on the seventh harvest the fruits of other men's labor. But epidemics refuse to recognize such distinctions, and the vomit of yellow fever will force the most reverend monopolist to disgorge the proceeds of the tithes coined from the misery of consumptive factory children. Nor can wealth purchase immunity from the natural consequences of habitual vice. The dyspeptic glutton is a Tantalus who starves in the midst of abundance. The worn-out tradesman, whose restless toil in the mines of mammon has led to asthma or consumption, would vainly offer to barter half his gold for half a year of health. Thousands of families who deny themselves every recreation, who linger out the summer in the sweltering city, and toil and save "for the sake of our dear children," have received Nature's verdict on the wisdom of their course in the premature death of those children.

E.—REDEMPTION.

It has often been said that the physical regeneration of the human race could be achieved without the aid of a miracle, if its systematic pursuit were followed with half the zeal which our stock-breeders bestow upon the rearing of their cows and horses. A general observance of the most clearly recognized laws of health would, indeed, abundantly suffice for that purpose. There is, for instance, no doubt that the morbid tendency of our indoor modes of occupation could be counteracted by gymnastics, and the trustees of our education fund should build a gymnasium near every town school. As a condition of health, pure air is as essential as pure water and food, and no house-owner should be permitted to sow the seeds of deadly diseases by crowding his tenants into the back rooms of unaired and unairable slum-prisons. New cities should be projected on the plan of concentric rings of cottage suburbs (interspersed with parks and gardens), instead of successive strata of tenement flats.

In every large town all friends of humanity should unite for the enforcement of Sunday freedom, and spare no pains to brand the Sabbath bigots as enemies of the human race. We should found Sunday gardens, where our toil-worn fellow-citizens could enjoy their holidays with outdoor sports and outdoor dances, free museums, temperance drinks, healthy refreshments, collections of botanical and zoölogical curiosities. Country excursions on the only leisure day of the laboring classes should be as free as air and sunshine, and every civilized community should have a Recreation League for the promotion of that purpose.

In the second century of our chronological era the cities of the Roman empire vied in the establishment of free public baths. Antioch alone had fourteen of them; Alexandria not less than twelve, and Rome itself at least twenty, some of them of such magnificence and extent that their foundations have withstood the ravages of sixteen centuries. Many of those establishments were entirely free, and even the Thermæ, or luxurious Warm Baths, of Caracalla admitted visitors for a gate-fee which all but the poorest could afford. Our boasted civilization will have to follow such examples before it can begin to deserve its name; and even the free circus games (by no means confined to the combats of armed prize-fighters) were preferable to the fanatical suppression of all popular sports which made the age of Puritanism the dreariest period of that dismal era known as the Reign of the Cross.

The preservation of health is at least not less important than the preservation of Hebrew mythology; and communities who force their children to sacrifice a large portion of their time to the study of Asiatic miracle legends might well permit them to devote an occasional hour or two to the study of modern physiology. We should have health primers and teachers of hygiene, and the most primitive district school should find time for a few weekly lessons in the rudiments of sanitary science, such as the importance of ventilation, the best modes of exercise, the proper quality and quantity of our daily food, the significance of the stimulant habit, the use and abuse of dress, etc.

Such text-books would prepare the way for health lectures, for health legislation and the reform of municipal hygiene. The untruth that "a man can not be defiled by things entering him from without" has been thoroughly exploded by the lessons of science, and should no longer excuse the neglect of that frugality which in the times of the pagan republics formed the best safeguard of national vigor. Milk, bread, and fruit, instead of greasy viands, alcohol, and narcotic drinks, would soon modify the mortality statistics of our large cities, and we should not hesitate to recognize the truth that the remarkable longevity of the Jews and Mohammedans has a great deal to do with their dread of impure food.

Belief in Gods Means Submission to Priests.

One desire dearest to the human heart is the exercise of arbitrary power over the actions of others. Possessing this advantage, unscrupulous men delight to levy contributions upon the industry and resources of all under their sway, and make them subservient to their ease, their interests, and their selfish enjoyments. The priest, ambitious to rule, and yet realizing the difficulty of enforcing obedience on the strength of his own merits, artfully devised a system of superstition whereby he could work on the hopes and fears of the weak, and thus secure not only submission, but respect, love, and a bountiful support. He pointed his dupes to an imaginary awful being enthroned in the skies, at whose name he taught them to bow and tremble, and whose minister and mouth-piece he caused them to believe himself to be. A blind, unhesitating belief in the reality of this dread phantom, and also in that of certain alleged revelations of his, was exacted under dire penalties, for, without such belief, the priest well knew he could exercise no influence, and enjoy none of the honors pertaining to the priestly vocation.

The very fact that faith is demanded as an indispensable condition is positiv proof of fraud. Every religion is a game of confidence, and every priest a confidence man who proclaims what he pretends is the word of a God, and then arrogantly commands everybody, under the penalty of certain damnation, to accept and believe it as such. In order to exercise and increase the credulity of their dupes, these crafty priests invent and announce, under the name, "divine mysteries," propositions of an incongruous character, the dogma of the trinity being a noted instance. One person in three, and three in one; one because it is three, and three because it is one. Can absurdity be carried to a greater length? Yet, we are solemnly assured, it is a godly mystery, incomprehensible to the mere carnal mind. How these sly faith-men must chuckle in private over the bewilderment and submission, the perplexity and admiration, of their poor, awe-stricken believers!

Nowhere, outside of the flimsy assumptions of theology, is doubt discouraged or treated as a crime. A well-established truth loses nothing, and has nothing to fear, from doubt or the closest scrutiny. It is always imposture, and that alone, in the stolen drapery of truth, that dreads and deprecates investigation. All the deductions of science and philosophy cheerfully invite examination, with a view to the discovery of latent errors and the ultimate perfection of knowledge. Men who disbelieve the circulation of the blood or the heliocentric system of the heavens are merely ignorant, certainly not criminal, meriting not our hatred but only our pity. In the domain of theology alone does a different procedure obtain. Here, it is made a solemn duty to abhor all disbelief, and to accept, cherish, and resolutely defend whatever dogmas priestly authority may see fit to inculcate.

In early childhood, when incapable of exercising reason, our helplessness naturally compels us to rely upon authority for all our instruction. Whatever our parents and elders tell us at that tender, confiding age we accept without hesitation as absolute truth. With a little care and training, any falsehood, not too glaring, may then be imposed upon our ignorance and credulity; any absurdity be commended to our favor and made a sacred object of our blind, tenacious faith.

But as we grow older we gather experience, and, little by little, free ourselvs from this dependence upon others for our attainments in knowledge; free ourselvs from the necessity of implicit deference for high authority, and, in time, learn to observe, compare, criticise, and make a proper, independent use of our own reason. In a few years we come to realize that all we hav heard and read is not truth, but very much of it rank falsehood; and this discovery tends to weaken our confidence in the authority which we before had held as infallible. The progress which an individual will make in emancipating himself from the errors incidental to his birth and surroundings will depend on the power of his mental faculties. If these are activ and strong, he will make short work of it, and pass with a rush from mists and fogs into the assuring light of truth, leaving his weaker brother to liv and die in the midst of a cloud of darkness, with never a suspicion of his benighted condition.

Faith being an involuntary state of the mind, being forced upon us whether we will it or not, according to the testimony of our senses and the convictions of our judgment, we are no more accountable for what we believe than we are for hight, weight, or complexion. To reward us for our belief and punish us for our disbelief is not only irrational, but monstrously unjust.

Faith is little else than a stupid credulity that has stultified and enslaved all Christendom. Nevertheless, the great, the indispensable business of your true Christian is to believe, to believe with his whole soul; to believe blindly, tenaciously, and in defiance of all doubts. He has a precious soul to save, which, in default of faith—true, unfaltering faith—must be debarred from heaven, and cast forever into outer darkness, where the only sounds striking his horrified ears will be "weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth." Therefore, he must believe. Besides, his dear mother, his blessed old grandmother, and his aunts and his cousins and his neighbors all, all, believed. Why should he alone prove recreant, disgrace his name, and be jeered as an Infidel? No, no! If there is anything in which he may feel a justifiable pride, it is his inherited faith; his firm, unshaken faith. No absurdity of doctrin, no contradiction of scripture passages, no weight or cogency of reasoning, can shake or unsettle that faith, founded as it is on the everlasting rock of ages. The main duty of his life, as he understands it, is to believe, and that in the face of all opposing proofs and arguments, all such being, in his opinion, mere sophistries devised by that subtle enemy of mankind, the devil. When one of the ungodly presses him to investigate the foundation of his faith, he generally refuses flatly to do it; but when he does happen to make a pretense at such an investigation, he goes about it only to confirm his convictions—to strengthen, to harden, and crystallize that glorious, blessed faith. In triumph he sings:

I am a Christian true,
One whose head is level;
I know a thing or two—
Doubts are from the devil.

In ancient times the race of asses roamed over a wide, grassy plain, where they and their ancestors had enjoyed their freedom from time immemorial, until man made his appearance among them with the bridle. This article, he solemnly assured them, was their only means of safety, declaring it to be a protection against their old enemy the lion; an ornament which no respectable ass could afford to be without; and ultimately a sure guide to a much larger and richer pasture far away over the river.

The silly creatures listened; suffered themselvs to be bridled; and from that day to this they hav been man's submissiv slaves. So

Faith is the bridle the priesthood provide
To slip on the asses they're anxious to ride.

God and Gods.

God!

Who or what is God?

This is what no fellow ever could, or ever can, find out, except in case of a wooden god.

Yet the Christian has the assurance to tell us that he knows all about God!

And he really knows what, that the anti-Christian does not know?

Nothing!

Yet he sticks to it that he knows, because he thinks there is a God; because he believes there is a God; because he hopes there is a God!

How any human being, even though a monster himself, can hope there is such a monster as the Christian's God is made out to be in his own book, surpasseth comprehension.

Hope that such a being exists as the God of the Bible? Holy horror!

Yes, the individual and collectiv Christian thus hopes.

Ask him why, and he will tell you it is because he hopes for a future life; tantamount to saying that he hopes to liv in company with his God!

The Christian prates and prates and ever prates of the goodness of his God!

Yet "God's own book" is damning evidence to the contrary.

"God is love," the Christian will piously tell you, with rolling eyes and long drawn face, and that unblushingly, right in the face of horrors that daily accumulate on horrors' head!

Right in the face of the daily horrors of the mines, of the earthquake, of the railroad, of the steamship, of the cyclone, of the land-slides, of the flames, of the ills that flesh is not heir to, etc., etc., will the pious Christian tell you that "God is love!"

From such love, and we see it manifested every day, the good devil deliver us!

God!

As the great Leviathan of Freethought in this country, Colonel Ingersoll, says of blasphemy, God is a question of geography, I think.

In one place he is one thing or being, in another place another thing or being, and so on until all the places hav been heard from, including the back counties and Boonton, N. J.

Over India, China, Turkey, Christendom, and outlying heathen dependencies and independencies of these several extensiv areas, not forgetting the Mormon kingdom and the red men's reservations, preside sundry and divers gods, each according to the notions of his, her—I believe there are some she-gods; why shouldn't there be?—or its people, and each getting in his, her, or its work satisfactorily—I presume so, in most cases, or bouncing would be in order, and other gods elected.

With few exceptions, these gods are held up as paragons of goodness, notably the Christians' God, and yet, like the latter, are malicious monsters!

Strange that a monstrous God is styled a "God of love and mercy," and a monstrous man is called a monster, without any bones about it!

In some parts of Africa, and in some of the South Sea Islands, gods are worshiped for what they are and for what they are worth—monsters!

These are the only honest people running gods for worshiping or other purposes.

Knowing their gods are monsters, they do not hypocritically set them up as personifications of goodness, but worship them as monsters.

They yell, howl, pray, beseech, implore, and supplicate these gods to let up on them and giv them a chance.

They know their gods are tough cusses, and they are continually on the pray to keep out of their clutches; and there is sense in their proceedings.

But what sense is there in the methods of a people who, setting up a "God of love and mercy," continually howl, yell, and pray for mercy? Why should they be continually crawling and groveling at the feet of a "God of love and mercy?" Why forever be supplicating, beseeching, imploring, and begging for mercy from one "All-Merciful?"

Why, if these methods are necessary to propitiate a "God of love and mercy," not strip off said God's masquerade, let him appear in his true colors, and then grovel with some appearance of reason, like the heathen (?), who do not dress their gods up in sheep's clothing, but let them remain in their natural raiment—that of wolves?

But here we hav the Christian continually praying to his "God of love" that the latter may not lead him into temptation, as though said "G. of l." were always around in some dark corner, with a piece of mince pie thrown out to tempt weak mortals to lay their hooks upon it, or to do some other heinous things!

Oh, that such a God as this should be set up for mankind to grovel at his feet! But, whoa! the God is all right enough, if gods must be maintained at all, for he is like all other gods, heavily down on humanity at large.

The trouble is, that, being a wolf, he is brightly rigged out in lamb's wool, yard wide, and warranted to wash; a bare-faced guarantee, the waters of truth washing away at once the fine snowy fleece, leaving the coarse shaggy hair of the wolf exposed—how quickly the waters of the Zugerzee stripped the lamb's fleece from the wolf's back, only a few nights ago!

Glorious God of the Christians! Forever sitting on the fence, by the water-melon patch, tempting poor, weak mortals to climb over to the other side and feast on the sweets of stolen fruits. Glorious God!

If I state the case wrongly, why does the standard and standing A1, copper fastened, high-hallelujah prayer of Christendom contain the vital clause, "Lead us not into temptation?"

A God that will sneak about, or sit on a fence, trying to tempt weak mortals to sin, being a God, is a meaner thing than a Comstock, if possible. And I don't care who hears me say it.

If St. Colgate should hear me, though, he might rejoice that there was a meaner thing extant than a Comstock, which has tempted hundreds to commit crime, and pounced on them if they succumbed; and I should hate to be the means of causing said saint a moment's rejoicing.

I once read a most affecting story of two little girls who met a horrible ogre in the woods. What they were in the woods for I don't remember, and it doesn't matter, as they undoubtedly had a right to be in the woods, unless trespassing on the property of the ogre—I never saw an ogre, but I presume it is a monster such as two little girls, or two girls as they run, would not care to meet in the woods, or a back street, even. By the way, I hav seen a Comstock—is that anything like an ogre?

Well, the horrible ogre stopped the two little girls, who sized him up for a great, big, ugly thing that walked on his hind legs. They saw he was perfectly horrid, but very shrewdly began to praise and laud him to the skies.

They called him a dear, good creature; the very picture of love and tenderness; a thing of beauty and a joy forever; perfectly lovely, etc.

In short, they just loaded him with taffy of the softest and sweetest variety; and when their stock of confectionery was exhausted, the ogre grinned a gladsome grin, sniffed a satisfying sniff, and, grabbing the two little girls by the back hair, raised them to his cavernous mouth, and downed them as one would a couple of cherries ripe.

I wonder if this story is not applicable to the case of the Christians and their God? I wonder if they are not in the woods, face to face with the ogre, who is constantly devouring them, as at Zug, and in a thousand ways as horrible, notwithstanding the taffy they are as constantly loading him with? I wonder.

Yes, it just occurs to me that it is. Their God—a borrowed God at that—is an ogre, and they know it. But to get on the soft side of him, if possible, they play the vain game of the little girls, and style him "God of love and mercy!" "The All-Merciful!" "The just and bountiful God!" ringing the changes on these in a thousand ways, while he scoops them in ad libitum, ad finem!

When reading of such horrors as at Lake Zug, and countless other horrors daily being recorded, it is enough to make a dog vomit to hear one of our pious God-bawlers solemnly intone his rot—"God is good!" "God is love!" "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb,!" "God watcheth over all, and not a sparrow [English or otherwise, I suppose] falleth to the ground without the fall being recorded!" or words to that effect. Yes, enough to make a dog vomit, I say!

Talk about God's being pleased or displeased with mortals, gracious or angry with, loving or hating them! What bosh! what rot!

When the eagle loves, or hates, or in any way interests itself in the tomtit; when the lion purrs or humps himself on account of the doings of the house rat, and it shall be made plain to me that such is the case, then will I take stock in the assertion that gods interest themselvs in the affairs of mortal men and women, dudes and Boontonites not considered.

In conclusion, I would say that, if I must hav a god, I prefer to hav one of the South Sea Islands variety, fashioned of wood. If he gets too obstreperous, I can dump him in the cellar; if that doesn't hav the desired effect, then into the furnace with him! That would be turning the tables on a god, wouldn't it? SI SLOKUM.

The Liberty of Thought and Discussion.

JOHN STUART MILL "ON LIBERTY."

There is a class of persons (happily not quite so numerous as formerly) who think it enough if a person assents undoubtingly to what they think true, though he has no knowledge whatever of the grounds of the opinion, and could not make a tenable defense of it against the most superficial objections. Such persons, if they can once get their creed taught from authority, naturally think that no good, and some harm, comes of its being allowed to be questioned. Where their influence prevails, they make it nearly impossible for the received opinion to be rejected wisely and considerately, though it may still be rejected rashly and ignorantly; for to shut out discussion entirely is seldom possible, and when it once gets in, beliefs not grounded on conviction are apt to giv way before the slightest semblance of an argument.

Creeds are all full of meaning and vitality to those who originate them, and to the direct disciples of the originators. Their meaning continues to be felt in undiminished strength, and is perhaps brought out into even fuller consciousness, so long as the struggle lasts to giv the doctrin or creed an ascendancy over other creeds. At last it either prevails, and becomes the general opinion, or its progress stops; it keeps possession of the ground it has gained, but ceases to spread further. When either of these results has become apparent, controversy on the subject flags, and gradually dies away. The doctrin has taken its place, if not as a received opinion, as one of the admitted sects or divisions of opinion; those who hold it hav generally inherited, not adopted, it; and conversion from one of these doctrins to another, being now an exceptional fact, occupies little place in the thoughts of their professors. Instead of being, as at first, constantly on the alert to defend themselvs against the world, or to bring the world over to them, they hav subsided into acquiescence, and neither listen, when they can help it, to arguments against their creed, nor trouble dissentients (if there be such) with arguments in its favor. From this time may usually be dated the decline in the living power of the doctrin.

We often hear the teachers of all creeds lamenting the difficulty of keeping up in the minds of believers a lively apprehension of the truth which they nominally recognize, so that it may penetrate the feelings, and acquire a real mastery over the conduct. No such difficulty is complained of while the creed is still fighting for its existence; even the weaker combatants then know and feel what they are fighting for, and the difference between it and other doctrins; and in that period of every creed's existence, not a few persons may be found who hav realized its fundamental principles in all the forms of thought, hav weighed and considered them in all their important bearings, and hav experienced the full effect on the character, which belief in that creed ought to produce in a mind thoroughly imbued with it. But when it has come to be a hereditary creed, and to be received passivly, not activly—when the mind is no longer compelled, in the same degree as at first, to exercise its vital powers on the questions which its belief presents to it, there is a progressiv tendency to forget all of the belief except the formularies, or to giv it a dull and torpid assent, as if accepting it on trust dispensed with the necessity of realizing it in consciousness, or testing it by personal experience, until it almost ceases to connect itself at all with the inner life of the human being. Then are seen the cases, so frequent in this age of the world as almost to form the majority, in which the creed remains as it were outside the mind, encrusting and petrifying it against all other influences addressed to the higher parts of our nature, manifesting its power by not suffering any fresh and living conviction to get in, but itself doing nothing for the mind or heart, except standing sentinel over them to keep them vacant.

To what an extent doctrins intrinsically fitted to make the deepest impression upon the mind may remain in it as dead beliefs, without being ever realized in the imagination, the feelings, or the understanding, is exemplified by the manner in which the majority of believers hold the doctrins of Christianity. By Christianity I here mean what is accounted such by all churches and sects—the maxims and precepts contained in the New Testament. These are considered sacred, and accepted as laws, by all professing Christians. Yet it is scarcely too much to say that not one Christian in a thousand guides or tests his individual conduct by reference to those laws. The standard to which he does refer it is the custom of his nation, his class, or his religious profession. He has thus, on the one hand, a collection of ethical maxims, which he believes to hav been vouchsafed to him by infallible wisdom as rules of government; and on the other, a set of every-day judgments and practices, which go a certain length with some of those maxims, not so great a length with others, stand in direct opposition to some, and are, on the whole, a compromise between the Christian creed and the interests and suggestions of worldly life. To the first of these standards he givs his homage; to the other, his real allegiance. All Christians believe that the blessed are the poor and humble, and those who are ill-used by the world; that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven; that they should judge not, lest they be judged; that they should swear not at all; that they should love their neighbor as themselvs; that if one take their cloak, they should giv him their coat also; that they should take no thought for the morrow; that if they would be perfect, they should sell all that they hav and giv it to the poor. They are not insincere when they say that they believe these things. They do believe them, as people believe what they hav always heard lauded and never discussed. But in the sense of that living belief which regulates conduct, they believe these doctrins just up to the point to which it is usual to act upon them. The doctrins in their integrity are serviceable to pelt adversaries with; and it is understood that they are to be put forward (when possible) as the reasons for whatever people do that they think laudable. But anyone who reminded them that the maxims require an infinity of things which they never even think of doing, would gain nothing but to be classed among those very unpopular characters who affect to be better than other people. The doctrins hav no hold on ordinary believers—are not a power in their minds. They hav an habitual respect for the sound of them, but no feeling which spreads from the words to the things signified, and forces the mind to take them in, and make them conform to the formula. Whenever conduct is concerned, they look round for Mr. A and B to direct them how far to go in obeying Christ.

Stop It!

Mrs. Slenker's arrest, imprisonment, and coming trial should arouse every lover of liberty to defensiv activity. If she be convicted, it will add another to the long list of martyrs that hav been doomed to suffer for trying to enlighten and bless the world, and drive another nail in the coffin of liberty.

Is this nation to be under the control of a church oligarchy, with the villainous Comstock as chief inquisitor, who, with monumental cheek and spurious morality, overrides all sense of justice, liberty, and decency, trampling upon constitutional rights at his sweet will? Shall all discussion of the most important of all questions, upon the proper solution of which depend the weal and woe of all coming generations, be prohibited, and disease, deformity, insanity, and idocity continue to be perpetrated, because one or more low, sensual men can see nothing but obscenity in its investigation?

Will people ever learn that there are no obscene words, the obscenity being always in the mind of the one that perceives it? An intelligent, pure, and refined person sees only beauty in the human form, the highest result of the great artist, Nature's, long continued work, and it awakens in him a feeling of deepest reverence and admiration, while low, vicious, corrupt persons see only obscenity and impurity. One can observe in the external world only what is responsiv to his own nature. Obscenity exists nowhere in the universe except in the mind that perceives it. It is an imaginary demon, ever ready to mar and destroy. Comstock is possessed by this hallucination, and should be placed in charge of some pure people where his better nature could be developed instead of, as now, being allowed and encouraged to wallow in his own filth and resort to all manner of dishonest, indecent tricks to procure the means to feed this morbid, insatiate love of the low and vicious.

If there be any sense left, in a time like this, of what the right to free speech and a free press means; if the citizens of these United States hav not lost all the courage that should descend from sire to son; if they hav any realization of the dangers now threatening our existence as a republic from laws on obscenity, blasphemy, conspiracy, extradition of political offenders, etc., that will blot out all the dearly-bought liberties we hav had handed down to us by a race of men who would never hav submitted as has the present generation to outrages upon individual and vested rights that would sink the oppressions of George III. into insignificance in comparison, let them arouse to action on this matter.

Few, even of Liberals, seem to realize the situation and the true import of all these things; most will chatter of "a question of taste," or "impropriety," or some trivial affair which has nothing to do with the question, which is this, and this alone: Has an American citizen the right to think? Has he a right to express that thought? And has he the right to send that thought written or printed through the mails? If he has not, then liberty in America is dead, and a new republic must be built upon the ashes of our once free, but now fallen, country. If there be any heroism left among us, let everyone, with voice and pen, call a halt to this infamous Comstock raid, that will be so pronounced that even the deaf to the cries of justice shall be made to hear, and, hearing, to obey.

Napoleon Bonaparte's Religion.

Napoleon Bonaparte in an address to the clergy at Breda, in Brabant, May, 1810, denounced the Catholic clergy present and praised the Protestants. The whole speech was printed in a Russian paper and was copied by the Theophilanthropist, of New York. I quote two sentences:

> Had I not met in Bossuet's doctrins, and in the maxims of the Gallican church, with principles that agree with mine, and had not the Concordat been received, I myself should hav become a Protestant, and thirty millions of people would hav followed my example.
> What ignorant idiots you are; prove to me out of the gospel that Jesus Christ has appointed the pope his substitute, or successor of St. Peter, and that he has the right to excommunicate a sovereign.

The Freethought University at Liberal, Mo.

From the Liberal Ensign.

The rarest intellectual feast ever offered to the people of this city took place last week. It was the occasion of the first annual commencement of the first Freethought university in the world. The exercises occupied every evening from June 28th to July 2d. The largest and most enthusiastic audience that ever gathered in U. M. L. Hall greeted the exercises throughout.

On Tuesday evening the exercises were opened with the first annual address of the institution, delivered by G. H. Walser, the founder of the university. The speaker traced the progress of mental liberty for the last two thousand years, personifying most beautifully and appropriately all the various principles and forces that hav been at work, and closed with the Freethought University as the crowning triumph and glory of universal mental liberty.

On Wednesday evening the students exhibited the results of their elocutionary training for the past year. The entertainment was of the highest order and extremely gratifying to all, and would hav done credit to any institution in the land. The participants contested for a Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, which was awarded to Miss Birdie Cowley.

Thursday evening, members of the sophomore class delivered a series of public orations prepared for the occasion. The essays surpassed the expectations of the most sanguin, and demonstrated the superiority of an institution where freedom of thought reigns supreme. The speakers contested for twenty dollars in gold, which was awarded to Miss Emma McRae.

On Friday evening the first annual address to the students was delivered by Prof. C. W. Stewart. The subject of the address was "The Scope of Education," and it was handled in that scholarly and eloquent manner so characteristic of Professor Stewart. He impressed upon the students the fact that education was the work of the great school of life, and that institutions of learning were founded but to prepare us successfully to complete the work of that education. After the address, President Leahy made a few closing remarks, reviewing the work of the past year and expressing his gratification at the successful termination of the first year's work.

On Saturday evening the exercises were brought to a close with the rendition of the celebrated tragedy, "Adelgitha." The drama was given in elegant costume, and was the finest dramatic entertainment ever offered to the people of Liberal.

A number of strangers were in attendance from abroad, and all expressed themselvs greatly pleased with the closing exercises of the first year of the first Freethought university.

New Jersey Ruffianism.

Preachers and lecturers who would sojourn in New Jersey should go armed. Its people are barbarous. A revivalist named Mnason has been conducting meetings in the village of Park Ridge, in that state, and, being hooted and mobbed from the first, has called the residents some hard though meaningless names, such as devils, imps of Satan, etc. Last week the series of indignities which had been put upon Mnason culminated in a mob visiting his house, dragging him out, flogging him with a horsewhip, shearing his hair and beard, and finally ejecting him from the town.

It is needless to characterize this outrage by the use of words. Every believer in human rights can feel more on such a subject than words express. It makes no difference that Mnason is a deluded fanatic. It makes no difference what he thought or said on the subject of religion. Whatever he thought he had a right to stand up and say in his tent, and none but a contemptible coward, with a naturally vicious nature inflamed by religious prejudice, would seek by force to prevent him from exercising that right. His assailants hav placed themselvs in danger of punishment by the law, though it is by no means certain that they will be punished. In New Jersey it is deemed more criminal to "blaspheme" a creature of the imagination than to commit an outrage upon a human being.

The Pope's Irish.

It is bad for the people of Ireland, who are forever holding out their hands to America asking alms, that some of their representativs in this country do not conduct themselvs in a manner better calculated to awaken sympathy. There can be no question that the Irish Catholics of New York and other large cities giv the police more trouble and occupy more of the time of the criminal courts than any other class. People with rabid anti-Irish views claim that these Roman Catholics are bad citizens because they are Irish; and on the other hand, there are those who say that Irishmen are bad citizens because they are Roman Catholics. It could not be truthfully said that either of these views is strictly correct, because many Irishmen make the best of citizens, and there are Roman Catholics who hav thus far behaved themselvs tolerably well; but it must be admitted that the combination of the two—the Irish Catholic—on occasions shows himself in anything but the guise of a desirable person. But he is numerous, he has friends, and he has a vote, and it is a rather bold public speaker, or newspaper, especially if it be a political organ, that will hav the hardihood to say that he is not in every respect a gentleman. He is, in fact, the pet of the politicians, and aspirants to public office who do not take him into account might as well cease to aspire. It will be remembered that in our last presidential election one of the candidates allowed himself to be reckoned a Roman Catholic, and made more or less strenuous endeavors to create the impression that the blood of Finn McCool ran red in his veins. How these laudable efforts were rendered abortiv by the three R's of the Rev. Dr. Burchard, who proclaimed that the opposing party was the party of Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion, is familiar to all.

This persistent and unremitting deference to the Irish Catholic has not had a good result. It has at length produced in his rather obtuse mind the impression that he is the particular pride of this nation, and that Ireland, which sends its tribute to England and its paupers to America, has somehow a claim upon the United States for support and defense. He regards Ireland as the Gem of the Sea, and he looks upon American institutions with contempt as compared with those he has left behind in coming here; nevertheless, he continues to come, and sends for his relativs as soon as circumstances will permit. His chief concern for his mother country is that the stranger with foreign sympathies holds office there; nevertheless, he gets into office here at the first opportunity, and carries his national sympathies and his superstitions with him. Those of his fellow-religionists who are so considerate toward America as to stay away from it, send over their O'Briens to raise a "fund" and to agitate in the United States the question whether some tenant in Ireland should pay his rent or not. As long as the favors are all one way, the representativ is pleased. If, on the other hand, he is offered an opportunity to assist some similar movement, he declines "to mix the cause of Ireland with American politics."

Another peculiarity of the Irish Catholic is that he fails to recognize that other foreigners hav the same rights here as himself. After holding Home Rule meetings in Faneuil Hall to denounce the queen and her minions, which he has an undoubted right to do, he raises a digraceful rumpus and threatens violence because some Englishmen who differ with him in opinion celebrate the queen's jubilee in the same historic building. After walking over other citizens and impeding traffic on St. Patrick's Day, he joins a mob on the 12th of July, and throws bricks and stones at Orangemen who celebrate the battle of the Boyne. In Paterson, N. J., last week Tuesday, when the Orangemen were parading, the Irish Catholic filled the street with riot and confusion. He has so terrorized the Orangemen of New York that the only way they dare to celebrate their great day is to sneak to the wharf by some back street, and go quietly out upon an excursion. There are not policemen enough in the city to protect them in their right to parade.

It is not popular to say anything derogatory to the Irish Catholic. He has a vote, and he numbers millions. The citizens whom it is safe and proper to denounce are the Anarchists. They are few, they don't believe in voting, and they hav hardly a friend in the world. It may, therefore, be the part of policy to denounce the Anarchists and put the Irish Catholic into office. In that way the pope will ultimately become the supreme dictator in politics, as he is now the supreme pontiff in religion.

What the Catholic Church Costs New York.

The Homiletic Magazine givs the statistics of moneys paid by the state of New York, during the past ten years, to eighteen Roman Catholic institutions ostensibly for the support of the poor. They are as follows:

| Year | Amount | Year | Amount |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1877 | $ 577,417 | 1882 | $ 684,519 |
| 1878 | 615,419 | 1883 | 696,838 |
| 1879 | 550 371 | 1884 | 837,462 |
| 1880 | 662.458 | 1885 | 838,719 |
| 1881 | 555,223 | 1886 | 1,055,615 |

Here we hav a total of $7,074,041 in ten years, or an average of $707,404.10 per year. It will be seen that the annual appropriations hav steadily increased, and that while in 1877 the appropriation was something more than half a million dollars, in 1886 it was more than a million. At that rate, in a hundred years the appropriation would be a billion, and the state would be a paradise of paupers.

In Protestant institutions it has been found that children can be cared for at the rate of $50 each per year; and as Protestants are somewhat more civilized than Catholics, it is reasonable to suppose that children in their institutions are as well provided for as in those of their Romish brethren. In spite of that, however, the figures show that in some cases Catholic institutions are paid by the state as high as $110 per year for each child in their charge. This indicates that for every dollar they expend in charity they receive two. With an income of seven millions per annum, and an expenditure of only half of it, a clear profit of three and a half millions is left them to be applied to the building of new churches, parochial schools, and Catholic colleges. One institution alone, the Catholic Protectory, says the Christian at Work, clears $100,000 every year in this sort of "benevolence." It professes to care for 2.000 children, and last year received therefor $242,000 from the state.

The state in the last twelve years has paid Catholic institutions $8,052,528.48. One-half of this, or, in round numbers, $4,000,000, is profit. And it should be borne in mind that many of the inmates of these asylums are kept at work at some productiv industry the proceeds of which are nearly sufficient to support them. It is no wonder that the church blesses poverty!

The $1,055.615 paid to Catholic institutions in New York would provide for 10,000 paupers at $100 per head. If there are in the state, say, 70,000 Catholics, then one Catholic in seven is a criminal or a pauper.

The Protestant and Jewish charitable institutions hav received since 1885, so says the Christian at Work, about $670,000, or a little less in twelve years than the Romish institutions hav every year; and "Protestant institutions support more dependent children than all the eighteen Roman Catholic institutions together." When the church is grabbing millions at this rate, it looks like splitting hairs for the courts to waste their time trying boodle aldermen for taking mere thousands from private corporations. What is still more amazing, the church does not stop to defend these enormous steals. It goes on scheming for more. One bill which has been before the legislature for some years provides for apportioning a part of the public school fund to the schools of the Roman Catholic Protectory, and another one, equally vicious, proposes to incorporate the Kings County Roman Catholic Protectory, and award to it a share in the common school fund, besides surrendering on the part of the state the guardianship of its wards to the Protectory.

The Christian at Work presents these facts to its readers and inquires, "How long can we stand it?" The reply is that we shall hav to stand it just so long as a majority of the people admit the principle that the state has a right to award money to any institution under ecclesiastical control or in which religion is taught in any form.

No Misrepresentation.

The appended letter is from Custer City, Pa.:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your editorials, July 9th, you giv a couple of 'extracts' from the Union Labor platform. Please read the platform, and see if you can find either of them. I hate to see the grand old TRUTH SEEKER following the example of subsidized Christian boodle organs, and misrepresenting things.

"UNION LABOR."

The committee of organization of the Union Labor party of New York city met at Clarendon Hall, June 19th, and adopted a platform. We hav reread the extracts quoted in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and find them correct as published in our issue of July 9th. They are as follows:

"We believe that a protectiv tariff for the benefit of American manufacturers and manufactures is the corner-stone of the prosperity of the nation.

"As the continued prosperity of the community depends upon the physical as well as mental condition of the growing generation, we demand that our young men shall be allowed to practice base-ball, boating, dancing, music, and other athletic sports and amusements without let or hindrance by law, provided it is done without interference with the rights of other citizens."

"Union Labor" evidently had in mind the Union Labor party platform adopted at Cincinnati last February. Whether the two hav any connection or not we are unable to say. There is in New York a United Labor party, which is the George-McGlynn party, or the Anti-Poverty Society. It is said to hav little strength outside of New York. The Union Labor party, on the other hand, as we learn from the Standard, in the West amounts, in some places, to a "respectable body," while in New York, it is, says Mr. George, "nothing whatever except a skeleton organization such as those of the humbug labor parties that were started here during the last municipal election to bleed politicians and resolute for publication." The party claims to hav a following here of some fifteen thousand, with organizations in nearly every district. The two parties, the Union Labor and the United Labor, are certainly much at variance, particularly as regards protection, the restriction of immigration, and the land theory.

Our correspondent will of course see at once that he is under a misapprehension, and that THE TRUTH SEEKER has not "misrepresented things."

Let America Be Represented.

NEW YORK, July 12, 1887.

E. M. MACDONALD, ESQ., EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, My Dear Sir: I hav just received the inclosed invitation and letter from Mr. Charles Bradlaugh:

"COL. R. G. INGERSOLL, My Dear Sir: I should be obliged if you would giv the widest publicity to the annexed invitation. I should be also very much pleased to send you special invitations to any American Freethinkers whose names and addresses you might furnish to me.

"Yours very sincerely, C. BRADLAUGH.

"INTERNATIONAL FREETHOUGHT CONGRESS, 1887.

"By the authority of the Council General of the International Federation of Freethinkers, under the auspices of the National Secular Society (of which I am president), and with the approval and confirmation of the Freethinkers of Great Britain and Ireland in conference at Rochdale assembled, I most earnestly invite you to attend the sittings of the International Freethought Congress, to be held in the Hall of Science, 142 Old street, E.C., London, at 10:30 A.M., on Saturday, September 10th; at 11:15 A.M., on Sunday, September 11th, and at 10:0 A.M., on Monday, September 12th.

"Your early reply will be esteemed a favor.

"CHARLES BRADLAUGH."

I hope that you will publish this, to the end that the Freethinkers of America may be represented in the International Congress.

Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

Presbyterianism—Josephus.

A correspondent sends THE TRUTH SEEKER two questions:

1. When was the Presbyterian church founded?
2. What evidence is there that the passage in Josephus mentioning Christ is a forgery?

It is claimed by Presbyterians, but not admitted by historians, that the Presbyterian church began before the apostolic age. A presbytery is mentioned in the New Testament as long ago as the time when 1 Timothy was written, somewhere between the years 120 and 140. The person who wrote that book uses presbytery thus:

"Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (1 Tim. iv, 14).

The word is of Greek derivation, and was used to designate a body of officers to whom was committed the government of the church. The "elders of the congregation" mentioned in Leviticus iv, 15, is called a presbytery in the Septuagint, the earliest Greek translation of the Old Testament. From which it would seem that the "church of God," as the apostolic church called itself, took its forms from the Jewish church. It merely changed "rabbi" to minister; the bench of elders it called a presbytery, and the lower officers of the synagog reappear as Presbyterian deacons. Thus if we should follow the word back to its original application, we would find that the first Presbyterians were Jews. The claim of Presbyterians that their church as a distinct ecclesiastical organization is the oldest in the world cannot be substantiated. From the time of the apostles, of whom very little is known, down to the Reformation, they are entirely lost sight of, unless it is admitted that they survived in the Waldenses of Italy. But as the Waldenses were practically Roman Catholics until after the Reformation, when they became Presbyterians, their identity with the apostolic church rests upon no foundation. The Presbyterian church, as it is at present, evidently did not exist previous to the Reformation of the sixteenth century. It is the child of John Calvin, and no accurate history could attribute to it an age of more than three hundred and fifty years. Its form of government is old, but that fact no more identifies it with the ancient church than our republican form of government identifies the United States with Greece or Sparta. The Presbyterian church enjoys the distinction of having the most diabolical creed ever invented.

The passage of Josephus relating to Christ is as follows:

"Now there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works—a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles. He was [the] Christ; and when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at the first did not forsake him, for he appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him; and the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day."

The first reason for regarding the paragraph as an interpolation is that everybody capable of forming an intelligent opinion on the subject so regards it. S. Baring-Gould says: "That this passage is spurious has been almost universally acknowledged." Furthermore, Josephus was a Jew who did not believe in Christ, and consequently would never hav made any such admission. It was not found in his writings until he had been dead two hundred years. Up to the time of Eusebius (A.D. 325) none of the church fathers had discovered it, although they had access to Josephus's works, and could hav used it to good advantage in controversy with the Jews if it had been there. Another proof that the passage was not written by Josephus is the fact that it is wedged in where it has no connection with either what goes before it or what comes after it. After the paragraph quoted, the writer proceeds to recount "another sad calamity." The first sad calamity evidently was not the coming of Christ, but something related before he is mentioned, so that the interpolation breaks in upon the narrativ in a most absurd manner.

Josephus mentions one Jesus, the reference to whom bears no evidence of being an interpolation, but he was the leader of a band of robbers, and a horse thief.

Credibility of the Toldoth Jeshu Story.

The Hebrew Standard oracularly says:

"The book known as Sepher Toldoth Jeshu has no critical or historical value whatsoever. It is a spurious compilation of suppressed passages from the Talmud, and the accounts contained in the Talmud are so strongly colored with bias and so much intermixed with fabulous, incredible stories that it is utterly worthless as a historical document. We doubt the Jewish authorship of that spurious compilatiou as well as the authenticity of the Talmudic account."

Does the editor of the Hebrew Standard mean to be understood as doubting the existence of a historical Jesus? It is certain that the Talmud is silent concerning a Jesus crucified under Pontius Pilate, and now the Hebrew editor doubts the authenticity of the Talmudic account of a Jesus who was stoned and hanged a hundred years before. He says the passages relating to that person are fabulous, incredible, and probably spurious. Furthermore, he calls them "suppressed passages." Indeed! Suppressed by whom and when? But it seems they did not stay suppressed, for Baring-Gould has translated them all, and confesses that they relate only to a Jesus who was stoned and hanged about a hundred years before Pontius Pilate. Were they suppressed in the thirteenth century when Raymundus Martini, a Christian publisher, made a Latin translation of a part of the Toldoth Jeshu story from a Hebrew document transcribed by a monk named Porchetus Salvaticus? Were they suppressed when Luther translated the same Latin into German?

Where did Celsus, in the second century, find his account of Jesus, so unlike that of the gospels, and so similar to the accounts in the Talmud and Toldoth Jeshu? Where did Epiphanius, in the fourth century, obtain the information that Jesus was the son of Jacob, surnamed Panthera (answering to Pandera of the Toldoth Jeshu story)? Where did John of Damascus, in the eighth century, get the idea that Panthera was a progenitor of Mary, the mother of Jesus?

The Toldoth Jeshu story undoubtedly contains much that is fabulous and incredible, but so do the gospel stories. Does the Hebrew editor really believe any more of the Gospel of Matthew than of Sepher Toldoth Jeshu? Matthew, Mark, and Luke tell us that Jesus was crucified on the great Passover day. Does the Hebrew editor believe that? Does he not know that the Jews never tried or executed a culprit on that holy day?

But the Talmud and the Toldoth Jeshu make no such vital error; they hav Jesus tried, stoned, and hanged on the day before the Passover. Nor do they tell us that he was conceived by the Holy Ghost; he had a human father, but was outlawed because his mother was not married.

If the Hebrew editor believes there was a Jesus crucified under Pontius Pilate, on the unsupported testimony of the four gospels, would it be impertinent to ask him if he believes that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, and that it is historically true?

Editorial Notes.

THE Sunday Free Press, Scranton, Pa., July 3d, contains an account of the ministerial doings of the Rev. Peter Roberts. The old story—betrayal, crime, desertion. The October grand jury will consider the case, pending which the Rev. Mr. Roberts is under $1,000 bail.

THOSE who wish to know the reason why self-respecting Freethought lecturers decline to debate with the Rev. Clark Braden are referred to a pamphlet by B. F. Underwood, entitled, "The Kind of Man Clark Braden Is." Also to anyone acquainted with Braden's character for truth and veracity.

THE case of the United States against the two Harmans and E. C. Walker has been transferred from Topeka to Leavenworth, and adjourned until the October term of court. The United States attorneys in Kansas and Virginia seem to be averse to working in hot weather. These are cases, however, in which official laziness is a virtue.

J. R. MONROE, in his Ironclad Age, begins an editorial note thus: "Anarchy, after getting a fair hold upon the managers of the 'Secular Union' didn't seem to be satisfied." There are some editors who don't seem to be satisfied unless they can work into their papers occasionally an insinuation that is rather worse than an outright falsehood.

DURING a thunder shower at Bellaire, Mich., the other day, the lightning struck the center-pole of the Adventist camp-meeting tent, while, as the Kalamazoo Gazette says, "all the other bad places escaped." It is believed that the lightning was late in getting around, having been originally aimed at Mr. Reynolds's Freethought tent, which was at one time erected in that vicinity.

Now is the season in the Catholic churches for collecting the pope's Peter's pence. Catholics are also to be taxed to get up a jubilee and celebrate Pope Pecci's fiftieth anniversary as a priest. The Catholic Union and Times remarks that "the holy father is entirely dependent on the charity of the Christian world." If every member of his church should giv the "holy father" one cent, it would net him the comfortable sum of $2,000,000. As he is well along in years, it would seem that by the practice of strict economy this sum should carry him through and bury him in tolerable style. The pope is the prince of beggars.

DR. CLEMENCE S. LOZIER, chairman of the New York State Committee of the Woman Suffrage party, reports to THE TRUTH SEEKER that the committee are rejoicing at their success in the case of Mrs. Lucy Sweet Barber, of Alfred, Allegany county, who voted in the last year's election, and was arrested and bound over to appear before a United States commissioner. The State Committee conducted Mrs. Barber's defense, and secured a dismissal of the case. Then the enemies of woman suffrage resorted to the state court, and asked the grand jury to indict Mrs. Barber, but the arguments of her counsel convinced the jury that no law had been violated, and the complaint was again dismissed. Mrs. Barber is free, and only awaits the coming of another election day to vote again. The Suffrage party say they expect thousands of women to follow her example, as the way to the polls now seems to be clear. Mr. Hamilton Willcox, 146 Broadway, New York, is prepared to furnish information how to proceed to all women who apply to him at that address.

MR. ISRAEL W. GROH is the author of a pamphlet, "Is the God of Israel the True God?" recently published by the Truth Seeker Company. Mr. Groh, previously to writing the pamphlet, was a member of the St. Paul Reformed church at Schaefferstown, Pa. The pamphlet appeared about June 1st, and on the 15th the author received a notification from the president of the consistory of that church to appear on the 18th and answer questions about his pamphlet. Mr. Groh duly appeared before minister and elders, and after an interesting discussion, in which, it may be believed, Mr. Groh asked as many conundrums as he was called upon to answer, the matter was settled by the direct question from the pastor: "Do you believe in the God of the Bible and the creed of the church?" The accused answered that he did not, and explained that upon joining the church he had professed to believe without having investigated, and that subsequent research had changed his mind. Here the examination ended, and on July 10th Mr. Groh and his wife were formally excommunicated for heresy. Whereby the church loses a good and intelligent man and Mr. Groh loses—nothing.

Mrs. Slenker's Trial Adjourned.

July 14th, 5 P.M.—The indictment is made out at last, and of course it is accusatory of mailing obscenity, etc., but the trial will be deferred till October. So I shall hav to liv with the sword of fate suspended over me several months more. But the discussion the subject of reform will in the mean time receive will no doubt do enough of good to more than balance my personal disquietude.

Kind letters from everywhere encourage and sustain me. I thank one and all for help and sympathy, and hope great good for humanity will grow out of it all.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

A Truth Recognized.

From the Independent.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, which boasts of being the chief organ of the avowed Infidels, has a correspondent who has been studying Spiritualism in Boston. He reports it as the result of his investigations that "the Spiritualists, I find, are all Infidels," but the Infidels are not all Spiritualists. That is probably very near the truth.

Letters from Friends.

WILSEY, KAN., June 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I did think I was a Freetrader, but after reading the articles on "Protection to Labor," from Van Buren Denslow, my faith has been terribly shaken, and unless some able person refutes the ideas put forth by Denslow, I must change my opinion on at least one political point. I desire that some one will take up the question and giv the readers of this grand paper an opportunity to weigh both sides. Yours truly, J. S. LIGHTY.

WEST UNION, O., July 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Having had the bonds of superstition and priestcraft stricken from my mind, I now feel, like one of old, that I am out of the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity. Realizing that I am free indeed, I shall not lose an opportunity that I may hav to tell the good news to others. Believing that the orthodox religion is the greatest curse that has ever blighted this beautiful world of ours, I want to be one of those with whom there is no compromise. I do everything I can against them, and ask no quarter, for which I am heartily hated by the narrow-minded, superstitious bigots. We hav a few earnest workers here in this hot-bed of bigotry who will keep the lamp of liberty and Freethought burning brightly.

I hav been aud am doing some missionary work, and find a few who are Liberally inclined, nearly all young men. Will send you a list of names for sample copies of your excellent paper. I think it the best thing I hav ever come across. R. J. WILSON.

BARRE, MASS., June 25, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please say to W. V. Cope, Eureka, that I think the reason "why the monkey is represented in so many of the pictures" of Watson Heston is because Dr. Adam Clark, the great, famous Methodist commentator, decided that the serpent that tempted Mother Eve in the garden of Eden was an orang-outang, alias monkey; and that Heston, anxious to hav his illustrations perfect and full, realized that they would not be complete if he omitted the monkey, the fourth person in the godhead or trinity; for Hamlet left out of "Hamlet" could not be more disastrous to the play than the serpent (Satan) left out of the creeds to the world of orthodox clergy. The old devil is everywhere; he goeth about everywhere in some form, seeking whom he may eat up. Don't you remember when the sons of God assembled on a certain occasion that Satan was there also? Where is he not? No picture could be complete without him; therefore, our faithful artist does well never to omit him. He is always prowling around, especially at Methodist camp-meetings and ministerial calls. He "loves a shining mark, a signal blow!" He wants ever to know what is going on; how, when, and where to best seize his prey and "drag him down to chains, darkness, and despair."

By no means, Mr. Heston, dispense with the monkey, alias orang-outang, alias Satan, devil, and forty more significant titles; for he is as indispensable to the success of the pictures as is his presence to the orthodox clergy, who draw their salaries by professing to see his satanic majesty standing constantly before them, ready "like a roaring lion" to eat up somebody. ELLA E. GIBSON.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., July 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been pleased with the discussion about reforming the spelling of English in THE TRUTH SEEKER by Mr. Pikard and Mr. Bodge. I agree with them in the desire and belief that such a reform is of the greatest importance, and is within reach if earnestly sought for. I do not agree with them in details, but, as there is a wide difference in the ranks of spelling reformers as to the number of new letters required, and the uses to be made of certain forms, there is nothing either surprising or discouraging in the fact that these correspondents of yours do not agree in these matters. Spelling reformers know that there is time and room for growth, and that gradually we are approaching each other.

My object in writing to you, however, is not to explain my own theories about this important matter, but to call the attention of Messrs. Pikard and Bodge to the fact that I should be willing to contribute to the scheme proposed by Mr. Pikard to purchase a small font of phonetic sorts to be owned by the Truth Seeker Co., and to be used in making our favorit paper a vehicle of culture in this department of human progress, and still more delightful to ourselvs.

By means of it we could illustrate the different notions of different thinkers and inventors in alphabetics and orthoëpy. All the young readers of our Liberal paper would be interested in it, and by its means would cultivate a taste and habit in the correct pronunciation of words. Until in general use, a phonetic alphabet is practically a most instructiv and facinating puzzle for boys and girls. If you will, Mr. Editor, accept a phonetic font of type from your readers, I am sure we will get you such a nice one and keep it in such constant use that you will yourself come (cum) at last to fall in love with it, if not with its donors.

Out of some twenty-four rules for improving the English spelling, THE TRUTH SEEKER, some ten years ago, adopted two, I think, for use throughout the paper. Many of us would be pleased if the editor should conclude to add one or two more, or to enlarge the scope of the rules he has adopted.

When you start your list of subscribers to the phonetic fund, set me down for $5. W. C. ALBRO.

FINDLAY, O., July 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As your aim is to tell the truth and do justice to all, I want to correct a statement in your paper in regard to Rev. Mr. Brown, of Allentown, N. Y. Now, there is such a thing as a minister being grossly misused, and I think this is one of them. The church people undertook to run the minister, and the minister was one of that kind of men that wouldn't be run; and they were bound to get rid of him and trumped up a charge against him because he was away over night and happened to hav a girl with him of about ten years old, and very slender and delicate at that. The girl being afraid to sleep alone, he got a room with two beds in it and they both occupied the same room; yet there was nothing wrong or sufficient to make such a stir about, it is believed by everyone of the outsiders of the church, and they had the right kind of sympathy, for they raised him the salary that the members refused to pay. It only shows to what low means church people will go to get rid of a preacher when they want to get rid of one; at least, that is the opinion of an Infidel and the worldly people of his own town. I take this matter up because I saw an account in THE TRUTH SEEKER that the Rev. Mr. Brown was having a church trial for indiscriminately kissing the girls; the girls in this case were were all not over ten years old. He is a man very fond of children, but for no immoral purpose. Had he made more fuss over some of the older ones, it is believed there would hav been no stir made. As I am probably the only reader of your paper that is acquainted with the affair, I wish to make the correction, and let the readers know how the matter stands to an unprejudiced eye.

I am, for justice, H. W. HEVERLY.

KENT, O., July 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to say that a man in our midst has "fallen by the wayside"—one who has drunk in the essence of science, whose brain has been made a receptacle or storehouse of knowledge; one who has filled the various positions of educator of science and of theology; one who has studied with an honest, inquiring mind both ancient and modern literature, and has been led by pure thoughts and pure desires to search out the great mysteries of natural, and what hav been termed supernatural, causes; a man whose reasoning powers stand high up on the ladder of reason; one whose honesty of purpose has been financially tested by his refusal of large salaries to advance the cause of certain creeds and religious dogmas and promote the unfounded faith and principles to be taught in church and seminary, but who has battled for the truth regardless of opposition, from higher motivs than simply to supply his physical necessities and cater to unfounded faith in others; who is now striking daggers to his hearers, who love to worship something they know not of sooner than to even respect that which their reasons should dictate to be good and noble. Such is the man who dispenses knowledge from the pulpit of our Universalists' church. I am glad to say he takes the path marked out by his reason, guided by science and well-demonstrated truths. He listens not to the opinion of others, but deals out such precepts and principles as he deems to be true and just. Allow me to say that I think one such man can do more good in enlightening mankind than many ultra-extremists and Radicals.

He courts not the favor or opinion of others, but proves his own in a gentle, easy, and becoming way, such as none can take offense at.

Is it not too true that those who hav been brought up under orthodox instruction and who in after years learn the fallacy of such superstition drop into a disbelief that is not beneficial or reasonable?

Does not reason, many times, tell us of things that argument cannot prove? Is it not best to be Agnostic in what we know not of? Is it policy or right to deny the existence of a supreme ruler or a "sweet by and by" simply because we cannot prove, or perhaps conceive of, such to our satisfaction? Is there such a thing as premonition? If so, what is the cause? I hav grave doubts of the spirit of man living alone and separate from the physical body, and yet I see those in whom I hav confidence, those who are honest in their dealings and who hav minds seeking for knowledge, who say they know there are spirits who converse and make themselvs known to man. Must I believe them deluded or dishonest? May there not be many a natural law by which mind and matter are separated, or can be made to harmonize in the past and present, or in the future, and still be unknown to man? Are there not new laws and new forces being developed by us, unknown to those in past ages?

Is not conservatism in all things preferable to radicalism in any? While everyone has the right to believe as he may, is it not our duty to respect such belief, if not detrimental to good morals and an injury to ourselvs? Is it right to discard the opinion of another until we investigate fully its truth? A. D. SWAN.

AMSTERDAM, N. Y., July 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges xxi, 25).

Here we find Israel in a complete state of Anarchy; and, perhaps, entirely unable to account for it. Nor do we find from the meager account that blood flowed more freely at that time than when kings with iron tyranny swayed to and fro the submissiv Israelites.

Now, these questions I ask, and in good faith: Are we unconsciously drifting toward Anarchy? Is it a natural result of social evolution? Can the individual check the natural course of social evolution, any more than society can exist without the individual? Why I ask this is, that just now so many individuals are making the grandest efforts of their lives to shoo away Anarchy. If it is the natural result of social evolution, then I, for one, do not intend wasting energy on the inevitable; or, in common parlance, shall refuse to be one of the shooers.

Look in the past, and what do we see? It is not yet a decade of years since one hundred thousand people made an unprecedented appeal to hav a law revoked that had cast D. M. Bennett and E. H. Heywood in dungeons. More than twelve thousand letters were addressed to the president, beseeching him to pardon the former. This was an earnest appeal for the Anarchy of individual morality; that is, the right to print and circulate thoughts on morality as entertained by the individual. "No restrictiv laws" was the cry.

When we cry too much law, as thousands, yea, hundreds of thousands, do; when we succeed in repealing just one obnoxious statute; when we tell people to violate the law to do away with it—as, for instance, the hotel-keepers of your city were recently advised by eminent counsel to do—has not just one more step been taken toward Anarchy?

Has it not been said, and wisely, too, that the advance of nations lies in the repealing of laws, not in their enactment? Then, must not nations advance through what seems to be but a kind of Anarchal evolution?

If the time comes—and who say it will not come—when more laws are repealed than enacted, Anarchy then must be inevitable.

Some of our most brilliant and logical minds hav almost as much as intimated this. Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, whose thorough knowledge of law no one will deny, has said, in one of his heartfelt sermons to the struggling masses of laborers, that, after all, with every recourse to law, they soon will discover how little can be accomplished by it.

Now, I do not mean to infer that Mr. Ingersoll has even as much as inhaled the dilute aroma of Anarchy; but does he not intimate that a greater, a grander sense of justice must exist among men than that which law can giv, before men will cease stealing each other's labor by a system in whose shadows the faded reflections of chattel slavery are totally lost, when alongside this huge monster—white slavery?

Is it not possible that he in the dim distance sees that coveted haven of human love, plenty, and rest, whither our colossal social ship is quietly drifting, yet cannot name it?

There are others, too, who are ever activ in the struggle against law. Drs. Foote, Sr. and Jr., in making their able appeal to the legislature of this state not to pass another of Comstock's infamous bills, bitterly fought law; and, if successful, they hav but scored another victory for Anarchy. Though they may be displeased, or, even still more, disgusted, with my attempt to taint their acts with Anarchy, yet to prevent the enactment, to rescind, to condemn, to violate a law, is it not Anarchal? Perhaps I do not rightly understand Anarchy; but the geueral diagnosis of it is the gradual doing away with law, when finally that state shall be reached, as in Israel; "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes."

From Kansas, what do we hear? Well, only that the individual and law cannot harmonize. E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman recognized the priority of natural law over man's. To elaborate further: that divine and artificial law are powerless to change natural law. Hence, their autonomistic marriage, which is but a struggle for Anarchy.

Later still, and what do we hear from Virginia? That law is justice, and justice is law? No; but that law has invaded the most sacred right of the individual—the right to tell to another the opinions held on sex matters, under seal. Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker is a human sex evolutionist, and has the same right to express herself in understandable English—yes, just as much so—as the fish, bird, or dog sex evolutionist has to express himself.

Here, there—yes, almost everywhere—comes the unison cry: "Defend her against the tyranny of law with thought and action, pen and purse." This cry, though a supremely just one, is but the cry of Anarchy. It is the struggle against law by a combination of individuals determined to hold forever the inviolability of individuality. Here the Anarchist and individualist hav fraternally locked arms to rescue individuality from the destroyer—law. Am I right?

Dr. McGlynn, who scorns the pope and his church law, and bravely accepts excommunication rather than yield up his cherished individuality, has defied law, seeking freedom through that same Anarchal road that leads to a future as mute as the past

As I said before, these few questions are asked in good faith, and from a point of information. It is possible that a few people hav discovered the direction in which we are drifting, and hanging men, imprisoning women, and cursing babes will no more arrest the natural course of things than it can to restrain the earth from making its daily revolutions. RAY D. CHAPMAN.

SANTA ANA, CAL., June 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav never been partial to Mrs. Slenker as a writer, as she advocates the doctrins of Malthus, which were always very offensiv to me. But I hav never doubted her sincerity and integrity, nor the purity of her motivs, and as I desire to enjoy the right of free speech on all subjects, and upon all occasions, I hav always held sacred the right of all others to the same privileges.

And now that Mrs. Slenker is under arrest, my sincere and heartfelt sympathy is extended to her, and I must say I look upon her as a martyr to the cause of common humanity, and all should rise and speak out in her defense, and if necessary spend their means freely to that end. But, they say, she has used language unmusical and unacceptable to ears refined. While I am sorry for her own sake that such is the case, I must frankly confess that it is none of my business, and is the business of no one else but herself, and if people don't like it they are not obliged to read it.

She had a perfect right to select her own language to clothe her ideas, and if her motivs were pure, the words could not be impure.

Tho axiom underlying all law is that the motiv qualifies the deed. It is in law called malicious mischief to destroy the property of another, but previous malice must be proved to hav existed, else the prosecution must fail, for one might destroy another's property in an attempt to do the owner thereof a kindness, and one could not justly be punished for an attempt to do good. Therefore should it be proved that Mrs. Slenker was trying to do good, she cannot lawfully be condemned to punishment on account of the language she might hav used.

The mere killing of a human being is not murder; the motiv prompting must be considered, and that will qualify the deed. One may justly take the life of another in self-defense. But if it be proven that an evil motiv prompted the deed, then an indictment for murder will hold.

So, then, in the case of Mrs. Slenker, if it shall be proven that she used obscene language with the intent to overthrow morality, and corrupt society, then under the law the indictment will hold, and she must be sentenced accordingly; but on the contrary, if it be proven (as I think it will) that she was laboring to elevate mankind and benefit the race, then must the jury decide, Not guilty, and the defendant will be acquitted.

While I hold that crimes should be suppressed by law, yet I am against the centralization of that power in the general government. It works great hardship and injustice to the accused by taking them far from home, where they are not known, and where it is often difficult to procure necessary witnesses, greatly increases all expenses, and givs them entirely into the power of those who, not knowing them, may be prejudiced against them, treat them with unnecessary severity, and perhaps render an unjust decision in their case. Everyone accused before the law should be tried as near home as convenient, by an unprejudiced jury of his peers, and by the general government.

I am opposed to Comstock, to the Comstock law, and to the corporation established to enforce the same. Their existence is a menace to republican government.

Free speech, free assemblage, and mails inviolable are indispensable to the perpetuation of liberty on this continent. The slimy serpent of priestcraft, which is the parent of all despotism, is slowly and under plausible pretexts twining his horrid folds around these bulwarks of liberty, and unless we rouse ourselvs speedily to a sense of the danger we are in it will soon be too late, and the sun of freedom will either set in a sea of blood, or rise baptized in blood to a new life.

I must speak one word of approval of your treatment of the Anarchists. You are doing nobly. Let us hav justice to all. I am no Anarchist, but I hav paid $3 to assist to get a new trial. I hav read their speeches before Judge Gary, and I can tell you they are noble and good men, unjustly condemned, and hanging them will be murder of the basest kind—murder which will stain a nation, unless we speak out, They are not guilty!

In regard to Mrs. Slenker, I will pay $1, and more if necessary, to sustain her, and see that she is not crushed. To her friends I would say, Take no heed of Mother Grundy, but extend the hand of kindest sympathy and love to the gentle, the pure, and the good. Let not the slightest reproach fall upon the breaking heart of one who has voluntarily placed herself in the front of the battle to receive arrows the enemy hav hurled at you. We must not desert those who, like D. M. Bennett and Mrs. Slenker, bravely meet the enemy and fight the battle for human emancipation.

Talent, Or., June 27, 287 E.M.

Mr. Editor: Mr. S. P. Putnam has shaken up the dry bones of the churches, and also of stagnant Liberalism, in this (Rogue river) valley, by delivering three lectures in Ashland, one at Central Point, one at Medford, and three in the U. M. L. Hall here. The U. M. L. Hall has a free platform where nobody is debarred from speaking his honest opinions on account of race, color, religion, or sex. We hav sent out challenge after challenge to the sky-pilots of this valley to come and defend their particular superstition on this free platform, but none of the regulation Andover cut has so far accepted our invitation.

But honor to whom honor is honor is due—if none of the regulation cut ever had the courage to stand up for Jesus on a free platform, four Salvation Army cranks stood it for three meetings, and then they came to the conclusion that the spirit of the Lord would not manifest in that Infidel hall, with Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll looking down upon their silly contortions. But, Mr. Editor, this is why they quit all at once—we kept them busy explaining Bible contradictions, and they had to go home to study their Bible first, and so, you see, the spirit of the Lord had a poor show. In fact, some of our sanctified Christians got up and left the hall, and now the regulars and the irregulars love us as you know a Christian can love.

And now, Mr. Editor, as some of your correspondents write to you about the phenomena of Spiritualism, I will say that myself and family hav given it some investigation, and since Mr. S. P. Putnam has given us a new God in place of the old one, I will giv the God of which this force called Spiritualism speaks; and I think he will compare very favorably with Mr. Putnam's new God. The following lines of poetry were produced in a trance at one of our circles, and signed, "Lakeman:"

Our god is in the flowers; 'tis in the blade of grass;
It breathes us gentle whisperings whene'er the spot we pass.
It tells us of a grander life, one better, more sublime,
Which is to teach us nobler thoughts than we dream of at this time.
The full unfoldment of the soul is taught by simple flowers,
Which through the kissing of the dew, the sweet, enchanting showers,
Springs forth a bud, and then the fragrant bloom
Which in itself is beauty adorned by rich perfume.
So are our lives while on this plain
Only waiting for the showers which are an angel train.
They come, but not with golden harp to sing to Christ all praises;
They come and bring sweet love, the weaker one upraises;
They come, but not to favor some, others send to torment endless,
To writhe in everlasting pain, devoid of peace or love, friendless;
But with love and aspiration that reach to realms above,
Where all is pure and lovely, and naught abounds but love;
Where all are taught progression, to scale the winding stair;
Where each will gather bright truths, which the higher ones prepare;
Get illumination from the stars to crown the earth with light,
Which teaches mankind to be just; which teaches right is might;
Which says to pope and monarch, Go bow before the rod
Of equal rights which is to rule, for that is to be God.
We teach the plan which is to make a mortal man a man indeed,
Which is to not cast on a Christ a load of sin, a hideous deed,
But liv a life of useful acts, a garden where to sow
A plant for true humanity, which will forever grow.

Of course, some of our Materialistic friends will laugh when they read this, but I cannot help that. I hav done the same before I became an investigator. I do not know that spirits produce this force and intelligence; neither do I know that they do not do it. So, for want of a better name, we call them "spooks."

Boston, Mass., July 3, 1887.

Mr. Editor: In the last Truth Seeker you publish an article headed, "Features of the Queen's Jubilee," to some statements of which I beg leave to take exception.

Speaking of the queen, you say, "She is their sovereign by divine right, transmitted to her from the deity through the offices of his ministers. At least, such is the theory." Please giv your authority for this statement. I am an Englishman, born and brought up there, and hav received, perhaps, a somewhat limited education, but never before heard or read of such a theory. On the contrary, hav always understood that our kings and queens were appointed to the office of head of the nation by the nation's representativs, according to a fixed rule or law. Indeed, the oath administered to members of Parliament distinctly states they shall be "loyal to her majesty, as by law appointed." The rule is that the eldest son, or, lacking a male, the eldest daughter of the last or some previous incumbent shall be appointed, subject to certain conditions, viz., that he shall be sane and morally fit to govern, and shall profess a belief in the Protestant religion. Divinity has nothing to do with the appointment any more than it has with the appointment of a king or president of these United States. In neither case is the candidate appointed directly by the whole people, but by a few who are supposed to represent them. In each case there is a rule or restriction on their choice. Our rule being more stringent than yours, our representativs are less free to put in the wrong man than yours are. I refer you to the Tilden steal, for instance. Your rule simply states that the candidate must be nativ-born; ours goes further and says he must be a lineal descendant of some previous incumbent, and also comply with the conditions I hav named. If the candidate fulfils these conditions, not all the bribery or corruption in the world will keep him out. This may hav happened in the barbaric ages, but it is not likely to happen in our time.

One king did think he had a divine right to rule, and lost his head in trying to convince the people of it. There may hav been others since who hav thought the same; if so, they hav been wise enough to keep it to themselvs.

There is one other statement in your article I wish to speak about. You say, "If the American people wished for the continuance of monarchy in England, they were very inconsistent in fighting against it in this country." I never had the time nor the inclination to read book histories of nations, for I hav an idea that the best of them are unreliable. My information of the past is gained from the writers in the public press of the day. If these giv wrong information, some other writer is sure to attack the untruth and try to stop the damage done, while your writer in book shape givs no room for the opponent's case. All histories are partial and biased. How many histories of your late civil war are there? and which one of them is the real, true one? Now, as far as my limited information goes, the rebellious colonists in this country did not fight against monarchial institutions as such, but against a "wrong" done them under that system, just as the Southern people fought against a wrong done them under republican institutions, and still remained republicans. So I believe the majority of the colonists were still monarchists even after their successful rebellion, but were unable to adopt that system of government for the same reasons that they did not adopt a state religion. There were too many "isms" in their politics, the same as in their religion.

There never was a system of government devised but what wrong could be done under it. I am living in a community that constantly boast that their town is the center of the universe. They call it the Hub. They boast they hav got the best system of education in the world, and that they are possessed of the "cradle of liberty." Yet it is only a few days ago this "cradle of liberty" was surrounded by a howling mob, who threatened its destruction because a few of their fellow-citizens claimed the right to meet in it and express their honest opinion.

I don't decry your republic because of this intolerance. We hav it in England; it is everywhere. It appears to be omnipotent; it seems to hav always existed, and promises never to die. It exists in every community, no matter under what system of government. I was a republican long before I lived under the Stars and Stripes. I am one still, but I confess my ideal republic has not been realized. I am disappointed in yours, but I hav faith that it will be better in the future. True liberty and freedom is not generally accepted here. I fail to find any more of it here than in England. We may all get it, perhaps, in the sweet by-and-by.

Thomas Rayner.

[Our correspondent should remember that the sovereigns of England hav the crown placed upon their heads by a bishop of the church, and he should regard the expression to which he objects as having reference to that fact. Theoretically, as remarked, a sovereign of England is such by the grace of God—"Dei gratia," to put it in the form in which it appears upon the coin of the realm. Mr. Rayner's second objection involves some discussion, but it is generally believed that the Fathers of our Republic had a republic in view. It is a matter for regret that our institutions are not all that has been hoped or claimed for them.—Ed. T. S.]

Mr. Editor: I cannot longer refrain from adding my word of heartfelt sympathy for dear Mrs. Slenker. She has always been doing good for everybody whenever she could, all through a long life, and now, in her old age, must be attacked by the bloodhounds of Christianity. We Liberals must not allow her to be imprisoned for a term of months or maybe years; her surroundings are densely thick with ig norance and superstition, and I am afraid it will go hard with her. But her cause is ours, and we must stand by it and let these bigots see that we will defend each other because "we know our rights and dare maintain them."

Respectfully, Mrs. E. M. Hansson.

Baker's Corner, Ind., June 21, 1887.

Mr. Editor: Inclosed find $2. Please forward three copies of Aunt Elmina's "Little Lessons for Little Folks." The remaining 80 cents is a donation to Mrs. Slenker from Mrs. Rachel H. Baker, an old subscriber to The Truth Seeker. She is now in her seventy-fifth year and a confirmed Spiritualist, having some thirty years ago experienced what, to her mind, was conclusiv evidence for this belief, and notwithstanding she and Mrs. Slenker would differ widely on this subject, she is a Liberal in the true sense of the term, and a humanitarian, too; therefore, she sympathizes deeply with Mrs. Slenker in her dark days of persecution, being more capable of doing so from the fact that she herself has, to some extent, had a taste of this bitter pill, having since her early days been a Freethinker, and likewise been a strong advocate of equal suffrage. Her father was disowned by the society of Friends on account of entertaining views too Liberal for the church's circumscribed sphere. This circumstance had a tendency to encourage her in her Freethought ideas, and so by degrees she became what is termed a confirmed Infidel; and she, with the helping hand of her companion, has succeeded in rearing a family, six of whom are living, all grown to the age of manhood and womanhood, and I am proud to say none hav any affinity for the orthodox church, as the writer of this letters happens to be a member of aforesaid family.

Farlinville, June 30, 1887.

Mr. Editor: As Mrs. Elmina Drake Slenker has been arrested as a law-breaker, and as she does not seem disposed to dodge the issue, it is eminently proper that the public should know just what that issue is—that they should know what she has done

Mrs. Slenker has for years been before the public as an author, critic, and educator, and her talents hav been acknowledged to be of a superior order. But she has been engaged in other work besides this, and those who hav known her best in this new field are the ones who can testify to her sincerity, honesty, perseverance, and pure intentions.

I hav enjoyed the privilege of being one of her correspondents for the last five years. She has been enthusiastic in her advocacy of "Alphaism," and had quite an array of facts in support of her pet theory. But in order to get at all the bottom facts, she requested her correspondents to communicate their own private experiences or the well-authenticated experiences of others touching the cause of birthmarks, hybridization, in the vegetable as well as the animal kingdom, in order to ascertain the value, force, and extent of pre-natal influences. Experiences flowed in that were varied, unique, and interesting, but here a new difficulty had to be met. As her correspondence widened it took in a class of persons who had very interesting experiences and facts to relate, but were unacquainted with the scientific terms ordinarily used in medical books, and the only way to get at what they knew was to let them tell their story in their own way. (And here I would remark, parenthetically, that a person who has investigated would be surprised at the small number of men and women of ordinary intelligence who can converse intelligently on physiology, especially sexual physiology; not because they do not know, but because they are not acquainted with the proper scientific terms with which to convey their ideas.) And in relating their experiences they sometimes used words that I had only heard used by the baser sort of people, and because of such association they were shocking. But Elmina said: "If I can obtain the facts in no other way, let them come that way. If diamonds are buried in filth, we dig for them just the same."

These letters of experiences hav been sent to those of Elmina's correspondents who desired to investigate that subject, and no others; she never sent them to any but those she believed to be sincere. And now, as to the result of this work of hers, I will say that I do not know of a single instance where it has worked mischief, but I do know of families that hav been made happier by this correspondence. I know of a husband and wife who quarreled like cats and dogs who now liv together with mutual respect. I know of one young girl on the very verge of ruin who was saved by the counsel, advice, and information given her by Elmina and her corps of correspondents; and I know of thousands of others who are living in misery and degradation, and are peopling the world with a generation of vicious and incapable children, all through ignorance, who might become good and useful citizens by a little wholesome information about themselvs. Whatever Elmina has done has been prompted by a pure and noble purpose, and she stands before us to-day a noble example of unselfish and untiring devotion to the best interests of humanity. "The very head and front of her offending hath this extent—no more."

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Rome Wasn't Built in a Day.

The boy who does a stroke, and stops,
Will ne'er a great man be;
'Tis the aggregate of single drops
That makes the sea the sea.

Not all at once the morning streams
Its gold above the gray;
It takes a thousand little beams
To make the day the day.

Upon the orchard rain must fall,
And soak from branch to root,
And buds must bloom and fade withal,
Before the fruit is fruit.

The farmer needs must sow and till
And wait the wheaten head,
Then cradle, thresh, and go to mill,
Before his bread is bread.

Swift heels may get the early shout,
But, spite of all the din,
It is the patient ho'ding out
That makes the winner win.

The Strength of the Hills.

My thoughts go home to that old brown house,
With its low roof sloping down to the east,
And its garden fragrant with roses and thyme,
That blossom no longer except in rhyme,
Where the honey-bees used to feast.

Afar in the west the great hills rose,
Silent and steadfast, and gloomy and gray,
I thought they were giants, and doomed to keep
Their watch, while the world should wake or sleep,
Till the trump should sound on the judgment day.

I used to wonder of what they dreamed
As they brooded there in their silent might,
While March winds smote them, or June rains fell,
Or the snows of winter their ghostly spell
Wrought in the long and lonesome night.

They remembered a younger world than ours,
Before the trees on that top were born,
When the old brown house was itself a tree,
And waste were the fields where now you see
The winds astir in the tasseled corn.

And I was as young as the hills were old,
And the world was warm with the breath of spring,
And the roses red and the lilies white
Budded and bloomed for my heart's delight,
And the birds in my heart began to sing.

But calm in the distance the great hills rose,
Deaf unto raptures and dumb unto pain,
Since they knew that Joy is the mother of Grief.
And remembered a butterfly's life is brief,
And the sun sets only to rise again.

They will brood and dream, and be silent as now,
When the youngest children alive to-day
Hav grown to be women and men, grown old,
And gone from the world like a tale that is told,
And even those Echo forgets to-day.

Memory Gems.

From the Works of Thomas Paine. To be learned and recited by the children.

He pities the plumage, but forgets the dying bird.

His natural rights are the foundation of all his civil rights.

Lay then the ax to the root, and teach governments humanity.

Man was his high and only title, and a higher cannot be given him.

Natural rights are those which always appertain to man in right of his existence.

Civil rights are those which appertain to man in right of his being a member of society.

When it becomes necessary to do a thing, the whole heart should join in the measure, or it should not be attempted.

The duty of man is not a wilderness of turnpike gates, through which he is to pass by tickets from one to the other.

Man did not enter into society to become worse than he was before, nor to hav less rights than he had before, but to hav those rights better secured.

When a set of artful men pretended, through the medium of oracles, to hold intercourse with the deity, as familiarly as they now march up the back stairs in European courts, the world was completely under the government of superstition. The oracles were consulted, and whatever they were made to say became the law; and this sort of government lasted just as long as this sort of superstition lasted.

When I contemplate the natural dignity of man, when I feel (for nature has not been kind enough to me to blunt my feelings) for the honor and happiness of its character, I become irritated at the attempt to govern mankind by force and fraud, as if they were all knaves and fools, and can scarcely avoid feeling disgust for those who are thus imposed upon. ## Correspondence.

WEST SUTTON, MASS., July 11, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I write to tell you how we spent the Fourth of July. I invited some of my acquaintances to visit me. We had presents. Among them were rockets and Roman candles. We sang "America," and would hav read the Declaration of Independence, but did not hav it at hand.

"The Story Hour" has been put in our village library. I like it very much. I read some of it to my grandmother, who is almost eighty-seven years old. I wish all boys and girls could hav a copy of it, but if they are too poor to buy one, it is a good thing to hav it in the library, so that all can read it.

This being my first letter, I will close now, hoping the rest of the correspondents will write and tell us how they spent the Fourth of July. Yours with respect,

LUOY W. PHELPS.

[That was an excellent way of spending the anniversary of our national Independence, and another year we trust it will be very generally observed in the same manner, and the reading of that great document, the Declaration of Independence, should not be omitted. Some time we will print it in the Children's Corner, that all may hav a copy for preservation.—ED. C. C.]

GREENCASTLE, IND., July 6, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I suppose you will be surprised to get a letter from me, but I hav started three letters to you, one piece of poetry, and a piece of prose, but never had patience enough to finish them; but I will try and get this one sent off before I think of it. My papa is a jeweler by trade, and of course I am trying to be saleslady for him, as he hires no one, and I am very proud of my situation in life, and not only my life, but of my father's life, as he neither drinks, smokes, nor chews, and it is almost needless to mention my mother's life, because she is always happy. You may think this letter sounds rather old for a girl of eleven years, but I am old in my actions and talk. Just one month from to-day is my birthday, and so far in my years it is the happiest day of my life. I had a splendid time here the Fourth of July—baby shows, dancing picnics, and fireworks. I try to be good and go to Sunday-school like my school-mates, but it was not born in me to sit singing hymn after hymn, and hear a preacher. About a month ago, two of my school-mates were up to my house, and the Bible was on the table. One of the girls stepped up and took it, and she and the other girl looked at it, and then would say something about the pictures; then they would look at me to tell them something. All I could say was, "Yes," and nod my head.

Well, for fear you are like other people—impatient of reading nonsense—I will close for this time. I remain,

Your true friend, IDAH BOLEY.

P.S.—I hope this will be good enough to put in print.

Mrs. Jessie Brewster writes: "I think you you are doing a grand and good work, and I like to be allowed to help in any small way I can."

[We are obliged to our friend for her good opinion, and hope ever to deserve it. She will please accept our thanks for her interesting article, and we assure her she will always find a hearty welcome in the Corner.—ED. C. C.]

About Monkeys.

In the warm, forest-clad land of Africa there liv a great many kinds of monkeys. They are divided into tribes and families that differ from each other as much as the different races of men. There are large and small, fierce and gentle, tailed and tailless tribes. If we were to dig down into the earth ever so far under the great African forests, we should still find the bones of monkeys, showing that those who liv there now are but the children of others who hav lived and died in the same place through countless generations. The farther we dig down, however, the more difference do we find between the remains of the old monkeys who lived here ages ago and of those who hav recently died.

Nothing in this world of ours ever stands still. The conditions of life hav been and are continually changing. Animals and plants must change too, and become adapted to the new conditions, and so they hav been departing more and more from the original forms until new species hav been modified from the old; and the old forms, not being so well adapted to their changed surroundings, were worsted in the struggle for life, and hav been gradually crowded out of existence. In this way whole tribes and families hav become extinct, and new ones taken their places.

You can easily see how naturally this would come about if you will imagin the climate in any warm country to be from year to year growing colder. It would be reasonable to suppose that those animals who chanced to hav the thickest coat of fur and hardy constitutions would survive those not so favored. As the cold increased the weaker and more delicate animals would die, vegetable food would become scarcer, and the animals who survived would eat more flesh and thus become stronger and fiercer. Those among them who were strongest and best formed for swift running would hav the advantage in obtaining food, and in this way a very different animal would be modified, and grow up from the old stock that inhabited the warm climate. This illustration is very imperfect and will not bear close criticism, but it will serve to show you how those changes may come about.

It is among those extinct tribes of monkeys who hav been exterminated by some such means that we must look for the early progenitor of man. Not a trace of him has yet been found. Some great and wise men, however, hav devoted their whole lives to the study of this subject, and are able to giv us an idea of what our ancestors were like when they lived and moved and had their being on this earth centuries and centuries ago.

As time goes on, and you children hav grown to be old men and women, and hav each of you done all you can toward the further enlightenment of our race, the world will then only begin to realize the debt of gratitude it owes to Mr. Charles Darwin for his long years of patient search after truth, and the light he has thrown upon our origin, that most interesting question to all people of intelligence.

Ages ago, so long that your young minds cannot grasp the length of time, there lived, probably, in the forests of Africa a strange, ape-like creature, who had descended from the catarrhine monkeys. They walked upon two legs as we do, but their feet were quite differently formed, and were more like hands. The great toe was much shorter, and projected at an angle from the side of the foot as our thumbs do from our hands. This enabled the creature to use his feet in climbing the trees in which he lived. He could grasp the branches with his feet as easily as with his hands, and could swing himself from branch to branch with great rapidity. His arms were very long, a tail depended from his body, and he was completely covered with hair. The males and females both had beards. Their hearing was very acute, and they had sharp-pointed ears, which they could move about in any direction; if a slight noise attracted their attention, they could direct their ears to that point, and thus be quickly warned of approaching danger. Their eyes were very peculiar, having a third eyelid, which could be drawn very rapidly across the eyeball, such as you hav observed in birds.

These creatures were very fierce, and sometimes fought each other in a dreadful manner, using their great canine teeth as weapons.

This animal was the ancestor of mankind, and I am afraid this is not a very flattering picture I hav drawn of our relativ. But if some spirit medium would only confer upon us a real benefit, by materializing him for our better acquaintance, a cautious interview with him might reveal to us some very excellent qualities that do not appear in the picture. In any case, Mr. Darwin tells us we should not be ashamed of him. This is what he says: "The most humble organism is something much higher than the inorganic dust beneath our feet, and no one with an unbiased mind can study any living creature, however humble, without being struck with its marvelous structure and properties."

JESSIE BREWSTER.

QUESTIONS.—What of the race of monkeys? By what means do new species appear on the earth? State how great changes sometimes come about. Where must we look for the progenitors of the primitiv man? To what scientist do we owe a debt of gratitude? What can you tell of the ancient ape of Africa? Describe his appearance. Who was this strange creature supposed to be the ancestor of? Should we be ashamed to own an ape for an ancestor? State what Darwin says. Which is superior—inorganic dust or organic matter? What is the Bible idea of the origin of man? Is it sensible or reasonable? Ought we to accept unreasonable stories as facts?

BY MISS SUSAN H. WIXON.

Over a hundred fine illustrations.

FREETHOUGHT NOVELS.

The Heathens of the Heath. A finely written Radical romance. By Wm. McDonnell, author of Exeter Hall, Family Creeds, Day of Rest, etc. 500 pages. Price reduced. Paper, 90 cents; cloth, $1.25.

All in a Lifetime. A Romance. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. "The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks." Price, $1.50. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

The Dying Agnostic.

Nay, weeping friends, I want no priest
To mar my peace with bootless strife,
Ere Death's cold kindness hath released
Me from the prison-house of life.
Too oft his craft to scorn I've laughed
To send him now a suppliant cry;
Serene I drain the welcome draught,
And, smiling, tell you, "Thus I die!"
Yea, though the darksome shades of death
Are closing fast around my head—
Though well I know my failing breath
Will leave me soon with half unsaid—
My brain is clear, my will is strong,
From superstition still I'm free;
Nor tear-filled eye nor faltering tongue
Shall wring one recreant word from me.

Nay, wherefore weep? Your God, you say,
Is love supreme, enthroned above.
Can the mistakes of life's short day
Then separate me from that love?
Your creed you mock with idle fears
When mourning o'er my future lot;
You do but waste your bitter tears
On one who knows he needs them not.

And when beneath the daisied sod
You lay away my worn-out frame,
Pray let no black-robed "priest of God"
Advance for me to heaven a claim.
Rather let one who shared my faith
Tell of the truths I loved indeed,
How Reason's lamp illumed my path,
How "to do good" was all my creed.

And aye the stars will shine as clear,
The grass grow green, the loud wind swell,
As o'er the saint God holds most dear,
O'er me whom men dub "Infidel."
And whether life or naught may be
Beyond the grave's mysterious gate,
Guarded by Death, awaiting me,
I bow submissiv to my fate.

—George Gubertson in the Secular Review.

A Good Temperance Story.

Jack was full of clams and beer. The beer was nothing new in Jack's experience, but the clams were something of a novelty to him. He had been spending the Fourth at Glen Island, and had partaken so freely of both the solid and the liquid that he was puzzled as to which to attribute his unsteady gait. It was 1 o'clock in the morning. He had just left the elevated railroad, and was zigzagging homeward with his white hat on the back of his head and his hands in his pockets, singing softly to himself:

The Man in the Moon is looking, love;
He's winking, love; he's blinking, love;
And each little star will tell——

Here Jack ran against a tree and lost the thread of his song. After recovering his hat, which had rolled in the gutter, Jack resumed his journey, and, turning up a quiet side street, climbed up a front stoop, and sat down upon the topmost step. The moon was shining brightly, and paling the street lamps. The horizon was lit up with a glow like that of a prairie fire, and the chimneys across the way stood out black and distinct against the glowing background. From far down the street he could hear a party of serenaders singing an old song which sounded familiar to him. Jack was beginning to get sobered. He put his hollowed hand behind his ear and listened. Yes, although he could not hear the words, the serenaders were so far away, he could supply them himself:

There's a heart beating for somebody,
Lighting the home he loves best,
Warming the bosom of somebody—
Warming the bosom of somebody, oh!

and the "Oh!" came wafted down the street in a tuneful little cadence which died away like a sob in the distance. The song brought to Jack's remembrance an old-fashioned farmhouse on a Vermont hillside. There were horse-hair chairs in the room, and a picture of Washington and his family on the wall. In the corner stood a little melodeon with a squeaky bellows, the complaining of which he could hear even now through all the intervening years. Before the melodeon sat a young girl whose blue scarf matched the color of her eyes, and who was playing the very tune he had just heard. The "Oh!" at the end of the song came softly to him out of the past, and it seemed to Jack to hav something of regret in it. Jack took off his hat and ran his hands through his hair. He lapsed into reminiscence again, and remembered how he had married the blue-eyed girl and brought her to the big, roaring city; how the babies had come one after another until they had three; how his "little woman's" eyes had lost some of their luster from weeping, and how he stayed out o' nights drinking beer when he should hav been home looking after the welfare of his wife and babies. By this time Jack was thoroughly sobered and repentant. He felt in his pocket for his latch-key, but the key wasn't there. He didn't care to ring the bell, because he was afraid of his wife's anger. The window had been left up because the night was warm, but he thrust his hands between the blind slats and tried to undo the fastening. A low growl made him withdraw his hand quickly. Then it occurred to him that it was only his setter dog, and he whistled softly to the dog and the animal whined a recognition. After struggling with the fastening until he succeeded in unfastening the window, he lodged on the window sill, when he tried to climb in, and, loaded as he was, teetered back and forth, at the imminent risk of tumbling into the stone basement below. At last he rolled into the room with a thump which shook the whole house. He had just gathered up his bruised body and placed it upon the sofa, when the door opened and his wife made her appearance.

"So you've returned, hav you," said she, sarcastically, while her eyes blazed like ardent coals. "The baby is sick with the croup upstairs, but of course you don't care anything about that. We might all be taken down with the cholera and you wouldn't know anything about it. I suppose you've had a very pleasant time to-day with your friends and are as drunk as usual. This thing has gone on as long as it is possible to last. I am perfectly satisfied that you hav been unfaithful to me, and I hav sufficient grounds for a divorce. Get down, Rover. I could curse you, sir. Even the dog is a better protector than you are. I hate you. That's what I think of you," and she struck him a blow in the face with the flat of her hand which made his head ring. "Oh, you deceitful wretch, if I had a pistol I would shoot you," she continued.

Jack gritted his teeth together and clenched his hands. He half arose from the sofa and then his good sense prevailed, and he resumed his seat. The door closed with a bang behind his wife, and he was left alone in the room with the dog.

"Old fellow," said Jack, taking the dog's silky ears in his hands and looking down into the dog's brown eyes, "old fellow, things is getting mighty warm around here, aren't they?"

The dog thumped his tail and emitted a short bark.

"And somebody's to blame, eh, old fellow?"

The dog put his forepaws on Jack's knees and whined.

"The little woman exaggerates my weaknesses, but in the main she's about right. What d'ye think?"

That unfailing barometer of a dog's emotion, his tail, played a tattoo on the floor, and he executed a dance on the parlor carpet inviting a frolic.

"No, Rover, there's no funny business about this. This affair is serious. There's got to be a reformation. You remember old man Luther had a reformation, don't you? Yes, I suppose you do. Well, here's what's going to reform—going to giv up beer and clams and stayin' out nights. Back, old fellow, lie down in the corner," said Jack, as he opened the door on a crack and listened. A faint sound as of sobbing came down the stairs. Jack closed the door and resumed his seat.

"It's raining up stairs. I'm afraid the little woman will get wet. Now, I'm going to take off my shoes and see if the roof leaks. You lie right down there in the corner and keep still till I come down," said Jack, speaking to the dog, who slunk off into the corner in a shamefaced way.

Then Jack stole softly up-stairs and peeped into the room, where sat his wife with her face hidden in the bedclothes. She was sobbing violently, and Jack's heart was touched. Jack walked up to her and placed his hand upon her shoulder.

"Little woman!" said he.

Louder sobs, but no answer.

"Little woman," he resumed, trying to swallow his throat, "I've been a big brute to you and the children, but if you'll try to overlook what I've done in the past I'll try and do better in the future."

"Oh, Jack, I struck you!" came from the bedclothes in smothered accents.

"Never mind that, little woman. It didn't hurt me."

Jack sat down upon the side of the bed and drew his wife upon his knee. She hid her face upon his shoulder, just as she had often done in the olden times in the house upon the Vermont hillside.

"Do you think you can giv me another chance?" said Jack.

"It was all my fault, Jack, and I'm very sorry."

"Well, we'll call it square then, and start in again. What d'ye say?"

"O Jack!" was the only reply, and then there followed a sound which had something of sweetness and requital in it, and borne on the wind from half a mile away came the refrain:

Warming the bosom of somebody, oh!

—Sun.

An Address to Women.

O ye women! idly waiting
For the tides of fate to bring Into some fair sheltered harbor
Every goodly thing,

Think you that the world's rich treasures
Unto you will come,
While ye stand there idly waiting
With closed lips and dumb?

No, the wide fields of ambition
Are not man's alone;
You may reap the waiting harvest
If you will but come.

More, the chains that long hav bound you
You may rend in twain,
But your own emancipation
You yourself must gain.

Woman scorned, and bound, and fettered
More than slave of old,
Not the less ner fetters gall her
That they be of gold.

Down through all the centuries saddened
By our tears in vain,
Comes the edict: Man, your master,
Over you shall reign.

This, the measure of the justice
Where the people rule—
Woman classed with child and savage,
Lunatic, and fool;

Crushed her highest aspirations,
Still unquenched her thirst—
Through her holiest, purest, noblest
Attribute, accurst.

How much longer shall we listen
To a siren song,
While the great world throbs with anguish,
Oh, how long? how long?

Up and doing, O ye women!
And, with voice and pen,
Will we wrest our rights inherit
From the hands of men,

JESSIE STARK CROW.

Literary Notes.

Andrew D. White will conclude in the August Popular Science Monthly his account of the astonishing superstitions of the Middle Ages respecting diabolical influence in the production of storms.

Science, the weekly publication heretofore printed in magazine form, has doubled the size of its pages and now appears as a 16-page quarto. On account of the saving of labor and paper which this change of form involves, the price per annum is reduced from $5 to $3.50. Our worthy friend Henry J. Thomas, who used to contribute a good many bright things to these columns, is a regular writer for Science.

Prof. Richard A. Proctor says of Dr. Janes's "Study of Primitiv Christianity," in Knowledge (London, Eng): "Readers of Knowledge will find much to interest them in Mr. Janes's carefully thought out and well-written treatis. He presents much of the evidence to which we hav directed readers' attention. He has also collected much matter on which we hav not hitherto touched. The subject of the origin and progress of Christianity is very fully and fairly considered. . . . He givs his reasons and shows how he has weighed them. He does not mislead by dogmatic assertion." For sale by the Truth Seeker Company. Price $1.50.

We are requested to announce that Prof. Nathaniel N. Pierce, Psychometric Counselor and Healing Medium, of Philmont, N. Y. (formerly of Putnam, Conn.), also the Great American Traveler and Truth Teller, author of "the Book of Books, being Directions for Cleansing the Blood and Curing All Forms of Disease that the Human Family is subject to Without the Use of Any Medicin Whatever," declines to be a candidate for the chief executiv of the United States in 1888. Having, as he states, accepted the presidency of the National Dog-annihilating Society, with a capital of ninety million dollars, his attention will be so taken up with the business thus involved that he does not feel that he could do himself justice in a political canvass. He complains that the public clamor expressed through letters and otherwise urging the presidency of this country upon him has caused him much annoyance, and his decision is final. Meantime, he will devote himself to selling the "Book of Books" at 30 cents per copy.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

A DISPATCH from St. Petersburg, Russia, states that on the 10th inst. a mob composed of members of the Greek Catholic church attempted to assassinate the Grand Duchess Elizabeth, who is a Protestant and refuses to join the Greek church.

STEPNIAK, the celebrated Nihilist author, will visit the United States in September.

ALFRED KRUPP, the celebrated German gunmaker, died on the 14th. He was 75 years old.

THE German crown prince, who was reported to hav cancer of the throat, is getting well.

THE Prohibitionists of Iowa hav put a state ticket in the field with N. G. Farnham at the head.

THE French people of New York celebrated on the 14th the anniversary of the fall of the Bastile. There was also a great celebration in Paris.

THE engineers of the elevated railroad in Brooklyn are on strike. The managers of the road refuse to arbitrate and are replacing the strikers with non-union men.

JOHN LEBERRY, a licensed preacher of the Methodist church, has swindled the citizens of El Paso, Texas, out of about $6,000. His piety is reckoned as something extraordinary.

THE School of Philosophy has opened for the season at Concord, Mass. The philosophers hav been discussing Aristotle.

OF the 37 men, women, and children who were in the yacht Mystery when she was upset in Jamaica bay, near Brooklyn, on Sunday, July 10th, only 10 were saved.

AN excursion train and an oil train collided at a crossing near St. Thomas, Ont., on the 15th. The cars took fire from the engin, and a dozen people were either crushed to death or burnt alive.

JACOB SHARP, the convicted briber, has been sentenced to four years in the penitentiary, and to pay a fine of $5,000. His health is very feeble, and he probably will not survive the imprisonment.

A RUSSIAN prince named Eristoff has recently made an offer of marriage to the widow of Frank Leslie, the publisher, and was refused. The Marquis de Leuville is understood to be the accepted suitor of Mrs. Leslie.

A CONVENTION of the National Colored Press will be held at Louisville, Ky., August 9th. There will be reports and discussions on the "Power of the Negro Press" and on the "Religious, Educational, and Social Status of the Negro."

THE inflamed weather of last week was followed on Sunday by terrific thunder squalls. Several boats were upset, and some lives lost. The spire of a church in Brooklyn was blown off, and lightning struck a church in Jersey City. At Carlisle, Pa., trees and houses were swept through the streets by the wind.

THE Rev. Mr. Dale, a Methodist preacher and temperance advocate of Peterboro, Pa., having been misrepresented by a saloonkeeper, proceeded to the latter's place of business the other day and gave him a severe whipping. He further offered to whip the whole liquor element of the town. This Christlike proceeding so pleased Mr. Dale's congregation that they at once raised his salary.

JEFFERSON DAVIS has given an interview to the Baltimore American, in which he states that the federal government, in 1861, entered into a conspiracy to assassinate him. To this end, he claims, two desperate characters were released from a Pennsylvania prison and offered a reward of $100,000 if they would effect his decease. He had, he claims, a miraculous escape from the hands of these ruffians.

ISAAC AND HIS WIFE ENJOY THEMSELVES.

And behold, Isaac was sporting with Rebekah his wife.—Gen. xxvi, 8.

Odds and Ends.

HALF a dozen dresses do not make a woman, but they often break a man.

IF all men were to pay as they go, there would be less going and more paying.

ENGLAND may be "mistress of the C's," but she has never yet been able to master the H's.

A SMALL boy will do a good deal of work for a little money this time of the year. The circus season has come again.

A FRENCHMAN in London claims to hav discovered a certain root which allays hunger and thirst. He probably refers to the root of all evil.

"ONE swallow," pathetically, but not originally, remarks an exchange, "does not make a summer." True. But several swallows may bring about a fall.

PROFESSOR: "What end has a mother in view when she whips an incorrigible child?" Senior Vassar girl rises, blushes, and sits down.—Christian Intelligencer.

NEWS comes from Georgia to the effect that a man in that state is living "pleasantly" with his eighth wife. This shows the value of trying again if at first you don't succeed.

A MINISTER in Somerset county, Me., has his sermons printed monthly, and sends them to his sick parishioners every week. The result is that there is very little sickness in his church.

MOTHER (sadly): "Well, I suppose poor dear Mrs. Field is in heaven now." Mathematical son: "Oh, no, mamma! it takes three days to resurrect, and she won't be in heaven until six o'clock to-night."

"WHAT'S the matter, Pat?" "More fun in the family this morning, sor." "Yes; twins again?" "No, sor. Faith, and its triplets this time." "You're getting on." "Gettin' on, is it? By hivins, sor, I belave the next'll be quadrupeds!"

IN a prayer-meeting, not long since, in New Hampshire, a worthy layman, speaking of some eminent missionary, said that "he was a poor boy taken out of the streets and put into the Sabbath-school by a good lady—his father being a drunkard and his mother a widow!"

THOSE two celebrated preachers, Rev. Dr. Bacon and Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, were once disputing on some religious subject when the former accused the latter of using wit in his sermons. "Well," said Mr. Beecher, "suppose it had pleased God to giv you wit, what would you hav done?"

COUNTRY editor (to his wife): "Well, those down-East people are great geese. They are still hunting for the buried treasure of Captain Kidd, the pirate. All they hav found so far is a jug with eleven cents in it. That seems to represent the savings of the old pirate's life-time." Editor's child: "Pa, what kind of an editor is a pirate?"

BREVITY produces some very remarkable specimens of what the philosophers call nominalism. One of our correspondents had occasion to go into a store to inquire for Dr. Abercrombie's works, "The Intellectual Faculties," and "The Philosophy of the Moral Feelings." When he asked for them the bookseller solemnly replied: "I know I haven't any moral feelings, and I doubt whether I hav any intellectual faculties."—Ex.

"BEAUTIFUL!" said the drummer. "Sixty birds in two hours, and only missed two shots." A quiet gentleman sitting in a corner of the hotel office put down his paper, rushed across the room, and grasped him warmly by the hand. "Allow me to congratulate you, sir," he said; "I am a professional myself." "Professional sportsman?" "No; professional liar."

"MOTHER," she said with a heart that beat Loud as her tones of woe,
"To you the secret I'll repeat,
This cold world cannot know—
Lay thy hand on my throbbing brow—
Nay, shrink not from the theme—
Oscar has come for two weeks now,
And never said 'ice cream.'"

A SENSIBLE little girl asked her mother the other day how it was that Adam and Eve came to leave the Garden of Eden, and was told that the devil entered the garden in the form of a serpent and tempted them, and God banished them. The little child pondered over the reply for a few moments, and then looking up, said: "Mamma, why didn't God send the devil away instead of Adam and Eve? They were in the garden first."

LOUIS XIV. was one day conversing about the authority which kings hav over their subjects. Count de Guiche ventured to remark that this power had its limits, but the king, who would not hear of it, passionately replied: "If I commanded you to throw yourself into the sea, you ought without hesitation to jump in head foremost." The count said not a word, but turned on his heels and walked toward the door. The king asked him, in surprise, where he was going. "To learn to swim," was the reply. Louis XIV. burst into a laugh, and there the matter ended.

HER name was Sniggs—it didn't suit
Her rich esthetic nature,
And so she thought she'd hav it changed
By act of legislature.

She sought a limb—a legal man
With lots of subtle learning,
And unto him she did confide
Her soul's most painful yearning.

He heard her through—he asked her wealth,
He pondered o'er her story,
And then he said he would consult
His volumes statutory.

She sighed and rose—he took her hand
And sudden said, "How stupid!
I did forget the precedent
Of 'Hymen vs. Cupid!'

"Just substitute my name for yours."
The maiden blushed and faltered—
But in two weeks she took her name
To church and had it "altared!"

Gems of Thought.

IT is curious how much fish hav to do with these remarkable miracles performed in olden time, and that is doubtless a very good reason why they are all of such a fishy character.—D. M. Bennett.

I SAY sometimes that all goes by wager-of-battle in this world; that strength, well understood, is the measure of all worth. Giv a thing time; if it can succeed, it is a right thing.—Carlyle. [NOTE.—This is a cardinal point with the late Seer of Chelsea, but I cannot indorse it with a safe conscience, and I put it down that my younger readers may sharpen their wits by thinking out the question.—C.]

THERE is a vast deal of charity amongst our fellow-creatures—both that which consists in the giving of alms, or rather dinners, to those who are not in need and of that which covers or excuses a multitude of sins, provided always the sinners be agreeable people of the stronger sex. Let a woman—the victim, we will say, of one of these pleasant diners-out—who has been led by her softer nature into the commission of a single fault, throw herself on the mercy of this same generous, allowance-making society, and she will find she might as well hav thrown herself from the roof of a London house on the area railings in the street below. . . . How many a lonely, sorrowing women, eager but to prove the sincerity of her repentance, has wailed in agony for forgivness on earth, which will only be granted her in heaven.—Melville's White Rose.

"JUST so!" remarked George, bitterly. "Any man you don't choose to count a gentleman, you look down upon! What hav you got to do with gentlemen. I should like to know?" "To admire one when I see him," answered Mary. "Why shouldn't I? It is very seldom and it does me good." "Oh, yes," rejoined George contemptuously. "You call yourself a lady, but—" "I do nothing of the kind," interrupted Mary sharply, "I should like to be a lady, and inside of me, please God, I will be a lady, but I leave it to other people to call me this or that. It matters little what anyone is called."—George Macdonald's Mary Marston.

MAN mav do with impunity, in every part of this enlightened nation, that which, if woman does it, is to her worse than death. And it is considered a matter of course. It is something to which there is scarcely any objection, and yet it is simply an implication that woman is not the equal of man, else it would never be that that which will bring disgrace and social infamy to one may be tolerated in the other without anything derogatory to his character.—Underwood's Essays and Lectures.

IT becomes no man to nurse despair,
But in the teeth of clenched antagonisms
To follow up the worthiest till he die.
—Tennyson's Princess.

I FIND that Mr. Talmage has the disease that seems to afflict most theologians, and that is a kind of intellectual toadyism that uses the names of supposed great men instead of arguments. It is perfectly astonishing to the average preacher that anyone should hav the temerity to differ, on the subject of theology, from Andrew Jackson, Daniel Webster, and other gentlemen eminent [peradventure] for piety during their lives, but who, as a rule, expressed their theological opinions a few minutes before dissolution. These ministers are perfectly delighted to hav some great politician, judge, soldier, or president, certify to the truth of the Bible, and to the moral character of Jesus Christ.—Ingersoll's Tilt with Talmage.

OFTEN what a man takes for the dictates of conscience is nothing more than a whiff of impulse, a caprice, a crotchet, which an undisciplined mind cannot distinguish from the deliberate decision of a competent intelligence; and the more irresistible the impulse, the more sudden and vehement the caprice, the more it is likely to represent itself to his imagination as an imperious command of the monitor within. There are some persons who can no more discriminate between a desire and a duty than others who hav a mere smattering of arithmetic can cast up a long addition sum right. Yet these are precisely the characters most prone to be dogged and persistent in their noxious blunder, and to dress it, both to themselvs and to the world, in the gaudiest guise. W. R. Greg.

To test all assertions by adequate evidence, to extricate the truth from involvments of imperfect language, to push inquiry by every method—these are prime essentials of human progress. Of equal necessity is the removal of all checks to the liberty of expressing opinions. If these objects hav the importance that Mill attributed to them, his labors for their promotion would alone entitle him to be accounted a benefactor of the race.—Dr. A. Bain.

THERE is no use speculating on "what might hav been," except when it helps us to direct what may be.—Chas Gibbon.

PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT IN THE PLAN OF SALVATION.

Respectfully suggested to the Andover Theologians.

Notes and Clippings.

Now that Krupp, the German gun-founder, is dead, says the Philadelphia Press, he will probably be canonized.

EIGHTEEN Congregational ministers died in Vermont last year, and their average age was seventy-six years and nine months.

THE Toronto Mail says that skepticism is taking a deep hold of the more enlightened part of the French population of Lower Canada.

"PA," inquired Bobby, who was reading the paper, "what is a 'stony glare?'" "It is the expression which comes over a man's face at church," explained the old gentleman, "when the contribution-box is held before him and he has neglected to provide himself with ten cents in change."

THE Italian League of Freethinkers, with headquarters at Naples, numbers about two thousand. The League was formed a year ago; its president is Prof. Giovanni Bovie, a member of the Italian Parliament. Early next year the League proposes to publish a weekly journal, to be called L'Esame.

THE priest of Canicatti, a large town in the province of Girgenti, Sicily, recently caused to appear beside him in the pulpit a young man whose face was blacked, whose head was furnished with two large horns, and who had a long tail from the end of which crackers went off. The priest informed his flock that this figure was the devil, and a great panic ensued. Women and children present at this unseemly comedy were injured in the crush.

IT is generally understood, and, we reckon, correctly, that a woman will hav the last word. At any rate, it is corroborativly affirmed that when a rural editor recently remonstrated with the principal contributor to the "Poet's Corner" for writing on both sides of her paper, she quietly retorted: "Well, and don't you print on both sides of yours? There, now, that settles it."

IN Algeria there is a small stream which the chemistry of nature has converted into true ink. It is formed by the union of two rivulets, one of which is very strongly impregnated with iron, while the other, meandering through a peat marsh, imbibes gallic acid, another ingredient in the formation of ink. Letters and other manuscript matters are satisfactorily written with this singular natural compound of iron and gallic acid.

LAST year a Russian peasant, living near Odessa, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for blasphemy. A correspondent of the London Times was recently present in the appellate court of Odessa while the peasant's appeal was being heard. He writes as follows: "The appellant's offense was this: Tired and weary after a long day's labor in the harvest field last year he entered the village tavern and drank a glass of vodkha After this appetizer he was supplied with a small meat roll, called in Russian 'pirog.' The peasant found the 'pirog' such excellent eating that he exclaimed: 'I would rather kiss the girl who made this pirog than the icon!' The latter is the sacred picture never absent from any Russian habitation, before which it is usual for visitors to uncover and cross themselvs. The peasant's exclamation was highly complimentary to the cook of the tavern, but the parish priest, to whom it was reported, heard and judged it in a different light. Hence the prosecution and sentence. The peasant, whom I saw enter the box and devoutly cross himself before the 'icon' in court, was a middle-aged, jovial, and good-tempered looking man, who appeared much relieved by the court reducing the original sentence to one month's arrest."

ALTHOUGH the presbytery failed to find a verdict of guilty in the case of the Rev. Mr. Todd, of Manassas, Va., charged with ministerial conduct, the citizens of Manassas refuse to acquit him and hav held a mass-meeting at which denunciatory resolutions were passed. A number of affidavits giving instances of alleged immorality on the part of Todd were read, accompanied by the statement that they had been sent to the presbytery and suppressed by that body. The citizens hope that their resolutions will induce the Rev. Mr. Todd to leave town.

WILLIAM B. OAKLEY, of Pittsfield, Mass., has been found guilty of the crime of incest with his two daughters, Alfreda, aged seventeen, and Isadore, aged thirteen. The testimony showed that for several years past, when Alfreda refused to obey him her father would whip her with a strap and kick her. The girl did not dare to reveal their father's conduct, because he had threatened to kill them if they exposed him. Alfreda finally told the story in March last to her mother, and Oakley was soon after arrested. Two physicians testified that the girls had been terribly abused. Oakley, who is forty-five years old, carried his Bible into court with him every day.

AT the Anti-Poverty meeting last Sunday night Dr. McGlynn said: "I hav no quarrel with the Catholic church and her sacraments. I should advise you all to enjoy the sacraments, as I myself no longer can. But if any priest or bishop or pope [hisses] should make it a condition of your receiving the sacraments that you shall giv up your belief in the justice of this work, or surrender any of your political or individual rights, then refuse to receive the sacrament under any such unjust enforced limitation. Just tell the ecclesiastical machine that strives to impose such conditions to mind its own business. Never sacrifice your inalienable rights to any ecclesiastical dictation whatever. If they should try by strategy, and other arts that I know they may use, to stop you from attending these meetings by refusing absolution at the confessional unless you giv the meetings up, then you can say to the priest who seeks to carry out the attempt to stifle the movement, 'Father, you can keep your absolution.'" At the Socialist meeting the same evening Col. R. J. Hinton said: "There is no longer any free discussion in labor organizations; they are priest-ridden and prophet-ridden bond slaves of McGlynn and George. And now half a dozen meet in the back parlor of a hotel and presume to dictate the policy of the Labor party. This clique decide that certain men in the party are too radical, certain principles are too premature, and proceed to sit upon these men and principles. They presume to do thus, and look back with confidence to the 68,000 votes which the party once received as an index for the future." Last fall Colonel Hinton was one of Mr. George's most effectiv and zealous campaign orators.

The University of Illinois.

To those working for the separation of church and state there is a case in Illinois that may be of interest. For there the question of the legal right to perform religious services in the public schools is assuming such shape that it will soon be brought before the courts for decision.

In the spring of 1885, a student at the University of Illinois, at Champaign, was suspended indefinitly from the privileges of that university because he absented himself from the religious services performed daily in the college chapel. He had paid all fees required of him, and in the four years of his attendance at this university he had never been charged by the faculty with any misconduct or delinquency, so that there was no accumulation of charges against him, but his suspension was due wholly to this one cause.

The chapel exercises consisted at that time of voluntary responsiv reading of the New Testament, of the repetition of the Lord's Prayer, and in announcements, and occasionally a short lecture was added, so that the chapel exercises consisted mostly of religious services, and these were so connected with the other business of chapel that attendance upon the one necessitated attendance upon both. There was in this case no refusal to attend any of the exercises other than the religious services, but willingness to attend was expressed were these services omitted or separated from the legitimate business of chapel.

An excuse from further attendance at chapel was offered upon the condition of signing the following petition:

WHEREAS, At the daily assembling of the students of the Illinois Industrial University in the apartment called the chapel religious services are held, to wit, the reading of the New Testament scriptures and the recitation of the Lord's Prayer; and,

WHEREAS, Attendance upon and the listening to any religious services is repugnant to my religious convictions, and in violation of what I conceive to be my rights of conscience,

Therefore, I, ——— ———, a student of mature age, of said university, respectfully ask of the regent and faculty thereof that I may be excused from attending and listening to such religious services.

This the student refused to sign, mainly upon the ground that he had no religious convictions for the chapel exercises to be repugnant to; that by signing it he would be merely asking a favor of them, and would be admitting the right of the faculty to require his attendance upon the religious services, a right which he denied; that by the constitution of the state the faculty was prohibited from requiring attendance upon religious services; that it was absurd to require a petition for an excuse from an exercise which he was under no obligation to attend; that it had no authority to require of him his reasons for non-attendance at chapel.

Upon receipt of these objections to signing the petition, the faculty, April 30, 1885, suspended him indefinitly from the privileges of the university.

A petition for the restoration of his rights in the university was presented to the board of trustees. In support of his petition, an argument was submitted in which it was maintained that the university had no right whatever to compel students to attend religious services, such compulsion being in violation of the constitution of the state of Illinois. The university was founded and has been supported by the state, and all of its property, its purposes, and its management are under the exclusiv control of the legislature, subject, however, to such limitations as are contained in the constitution. The legislature cannot authorize the board of trustees or the faculty to violate the constitution. Nor can the latter do any act as agents, employees, or officers of the state which the legislature could not authorize done. The faculty has no power not given it by the constitution and laws of the state.

The constitution in the third section of the Bill of Rights provides:

> The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination, shall forever be guaranteed. . . . No person shall be required to attend or support any ministry or place of worship against his consent, nor shall any preference be given by law to any religious denomination or mode of worship.

By the constitution of the state, then, all people are guaranteed the privilege of the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, or, if they may choose, of the non-exercise of religious profession and of non-worship. Any interference therewith, in the way of discrimination or preference, even by legislativ enactment, is, by the express words of that instrument, prohibited. The taxes by which this university is supported are gathered at large from a population characterized by dissimilar religious beliefs, observances, modes of worship, and preferences. With such a public furnishing the money to sustain the university, and supplying it with the students in attendance, and having equal rights to the full and equal enjoyment of all of its privileges, it is manifestly impracticable and impossible to devise even a limited measure of religious services for adoption in the university upon which all the different sects and classes could harmonize. The only alternativ, therefore, to preserve the benefits of the constitutional guarantees in letter and spirit, and to secure to all absolute equality of right in matters of religious predilection, must be to exclude from the university all religious services performed as university exercises. If religious services cannot legally form a part of the university exercises, students certainly cannot be legally compelled to attend them.

Under a clause in the New York constitution* identical with the one in the constitution of Illinois, the superintendents of public instruction, including Hon. John A. Dix and John C. Spencer, hav in a uniform series of decisions, extending over a period of nearly fifty years, held that religious exercises could form no part of the public school exercises nor be regulated by the school disciplin.

It would be impossible to frame a general proposition in the English language, were it expressly intended to prohibit compulsory attendance upon chapel in this university, which would attain that object more completely and with more certainty than the one in the constitution cited above, which reads: "No person shall be required to attend or support any ministry or place of worship against his consent." For the reading of the Bible and the Lord's Prayer, as conducted in chapel, constitutes religious worship, and the chapel, when occupied for that purpose, is a place of religious worship within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition above quoted. Could any one find warrant for a doubt on this point? If the acts referred to are not religious worship, what are they? And if they are acts of religious worship, what is the place, the chapel, where they are performed but a place, for the time being, of religious worship? Any place, while religious services are being held there, is a "place of religious worship" within the meaning of the constitution.

The constitution, it will be especially noted, says nothing as to the ground upon which the refusal of consent to attend a place of religious worship must be based. It does not say that it must be based upon religious convictions or conscientious scruples, as the faculty seem to suppose. The sufficiency of the ground of refusal is left entirely with the individual, and no one can go back of such refusal to demand the reason for it. It was sufficient that attendance be against his consent. Whether the objections be founded upon religious convictions, conscientious scruples, or mere cussedness was no one's business but his own. Any official inquiry concerning this would be an impertinence as much as would be an inquiry concerning one's politics.

Article 8, Section 3, of the constitution of Illinois provides:

> Neither the general assembly, nor any county, city, town, township, school-district, or other public corporation shall ever make any appropriation or pay from any public fund whatever, anything in aid of any church or sectarian purpose, or to help support any school, academy, seminary, university, or other literary or scientific institution controled by any church or sectarian denomination whatever; nor shall any grant or donation of land, money, or other personal property ever be made by the state, or any such public corporation, to any church or for any sectarian purpose.

It is evident that if the reading of the New Testament and recitation of the Lord's Prayer by members of the faculty, as officers of the university, constitute sectarian teaching, or if such exercises are held for a sectarian purpose, then the university is thereby converted into a sectarian institution, and the institution itself, its property, and all the funds appropriated by the legislature to its support are perverted to an unlawful use.

Of what conceivable use are these exercises if they are not for the purpose of teaching religion? If they are not for that purpose, of what use are they, and why is their abolition objected to by Protestants alone, while Agnostics wish them abolished and Catholics and Jews want them either changed or abolished? If they are not sectarian teaching, and are not for a sectarian purpose, why do a certain group of denominations object to their abolition, and certain other sects want them either changed or abolished?

By reading the Bible and recitation of prayer they are teaching by their actions and example—the strongest possible way of teaching—that there is a God; that he answers prayers, and that the Bible is inspired.

Teaching the truth of these propositions is sectarian teaching with respect to Agnostics and unbelievers. And they, considering such exercises sectarian and unjust, organized the American Secular Union, one of the objects of which is to procure the exclusion of all religious exercises from the public schools. By reading the New Testament and repeating the Lord's Prayer the inspiration of the New Testament and the divinity of Christ are taught. Such teaching is sectarian with respect to the Jews.

Reading King James's translation of the Bible, and repeating the Lord's Prayer is sectarian teaching with respect to Catholics, who believe the Douay Bible to be the only correct English translation. Attendance upon such services is a sin in the eyes of Catholics. The reading of even the Douay Bible in the schools, without note or comment, is not allowed by the Catholic church. That church prefers to hav no religious exercises to having the Protestant service. In many school districts of this country there has been physical violence between the two contending parties, the Protestant teachers using violence to enforce attention to the exercises, and Catholic parents using force to restrain the teachers.

In Hartford, Connecticut, the school board decided that when over one-third of the pupils in one room were Catholics, they might withdraw into another room and hold Catholic services. In fact, in nearly every city where the Catholics hav much political power there is an angry contest perpetually going on, in which both parties consider the practice in question as sectarian.

Again, the first section of the constitution quoted above says, "Nor shall any preference be given by law to any religious denomination, or mode of worship." By the religious services in the university the state is giving preference to the Protestant denominations over all others, and is giving preference to the Protestant mode of worship over that of the Catholic and the Jew.

To invent any form of religious worship that will not be objected to by some religious denomination as well as the non-religious portion of the community, who may be supposed to hav some rights, is absolutely impossible.

For these reasons, all religious services performed as university exercises are unjust and illegal, and by performing them the faculty is perverting the university and all of its funds to an unlawful purpose.

This student's claim to reinstatement in the university rests upon the facts: that absence from religious services was the only offense with which he is charged; that compulsory attendance upon such services is expressly prohibited by the constitution of the state; that the faculty has no right to demand reasons for refusing such attendance; that the performing of these services as university exercises is illegal, and prohibited by the state constitution; that compulsory attendance upon an illegal service is illegal.

The board of trustees referred the case to Hon. Geo. Hunt, attorney-general of the state, who, after citing the resolution of reference and the facts in the case, givs the following opinion:

> The question here raised involves the right of the trustees and faculty of the University of Illinois to hold chapel exercises in the manner and form substantially as they hav hitherto been held, and the validity of the rule requiring the attendance of all students on said exercises unless excused therefrom.
> He contends that the rule referred to is void on account of being in conflict with that portion of Section 3, Article 2, of the constitution of the state of Illinois which declares that "no person shall be required to attend or support any ministry or place of worship against his consent; nor shall any preference be given by law to any religious denomination or mode of worship."
> It is evident that, so far as his rights are concerned, only the first part of the above-cited clause of the constitution is involved.
> By Section 1 of the act to provide for the organization and maintenance of the university it is provided that the board of trustees shall hav power to make and establish by-laws for the management of the government, in all of its various departments and relations, of the Illinois Industrial University. By Section 2 of the by-laws of the faculty, adopted by the trustees, it is provided that "the faculty of the university, subject to the direction of the board of trustees, shall hav general control of the disciplin and studies of the university, and shall make in that behalf from time to time such regulations as they may deem expedient. It is under this power that the regulation with regard to chapel exercises was adopted.
> I do not believe that the constitutional objection urged is well taken, or that any of his constitutional rights are violated by the rule in question. That rule does not require him to attend any ministry or place of worship against his consent. In the first place, he was not required to attend the university. His attendance upon that institution was purely voluntary. Attendance upon the university was not even one of his rights as a citizen of Illinois. It is, on the contrary, only a privilege accorded to such persons as come within the conditions prescribed in the statute and imposed by the laws of the state and the by-laws of the faculty acting under authority of law. It is presumed that the trustees are competent to decide what regulations are proper for the government of the institution, and the law givs them the power to enforce obedience under penalty of forfeiture of said privilege on account of disobedience. Students are admitted to said university for the purpose of instruction and disciplin, and in accepting the privilege of attendance thereon, either tacitly or formally agree to conform to the regulations for the government of said institution. It is unnecessary to say that disciplin is essential to every educational institution, and that this disciplin must be administered by those in authority.
> The general rule is that whenever any person joins an organization, or accepts a privilege, he consents to obey the rules of the organization, and fulfil the couditions of the privilege. He has no right to say that he will obey part and still continue his membership in the organization, and the enjoyment of the privileges conferred thereby. He is under no obligation to join and subject himself to the regulations prescribed, nor is he under any obligation to remain. But so long as he does remain, the obligation which he voluntarily took remains in force unless released by the powers which imposed it.
> I find among the rules for the government of the students the following: "9. Each applicant for admission shall sign

*The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination or preference shall forever be allowed in this state to all mankind.—Const. of N. Y., Art. 1, § 3.

the following promis of good conduct: 'I, the undersigned, ——, wishing to become a student in the Illinois Industrial University, hereby promis that during my connection therewith I will perform all duties with fidelity, will yield loyal and immediate obedience to all lawful authority, and at all times will strive to maintain a gentlemanly (or ladylike) demeanor, in public and in private, always mindful of my own good name and of the fair fame of the university which I seek to join."

On entering the university every student agrees, in accordance with the foregoing, to yield loyal obedience to the lawful authority of the institution.

In the case in question the student assented to this, and for nearly six years had yielded obedience before he seems to hav discovered that the exercise in question was an abridgment of his rights as a citizen. He, doubtless, at the same time yielded obedience to many other rules which were restrictions upon his liberty as a citizen, and which, had he not been a student in this institution, would not hav been binding upon him. It cannot be denied that the faculty might properly require his punctual attendance upon all recitations, that it might also forbid him to visit neighboring cities during certain days of the week, or at certain hours of the day.

These would be restraints upon his personal liberty, and yet no one would deny that they might be enforced even if such enforcement required the expulsion of anyone who refused obedience.

But the rule in question is not in any proper sense compulsory in my opinion. He could attend chapel exercises if he wished, or if he did not so wish he would be excused upon request; and the rule requiring such request was a proper regulation, and was an infringement of no natural of legal right.

I do not think that the other constitutional questions raised by the petitioner hav any bearing upon the case. Any discussion of them will, therefore, be unnecessary.

I am of the opinion that the trustees and faculty had the right to adopt the rule in question, and for continued refusal to obey it they might suspend the student from the privileges of the university.

This opinion of the attorney-general the trustees adopted as their own, and the action of the faculty was sustained. This opinion is one of the most logical and pointed documents ever issued by the department. See with what ease and grace he sweeps away the decisions of Hon. John A. Dix and John C. Spencer, of New York, with "I do not think the other constitutional questions raised by the petitioner hav any bearing upon the case. Any discussion of them will therefore be unnecessary." Thus answering three of the points raised, he proceeds with the second; his first point in answer to which is that attendance upon chapel was not compulsory, because attendance at the university was voluntary, and not even one of his rights, but "only a privilege accorded to such persons as come within the conditions prescribed in the statute, and imposed by the laws of the state and the by-laws adopted by the trustees, acting under authority of law." Ostrich-like, he confidently sticks his head into the darkness created by his learned use of the term "privilege," and cries "Therefore." He brings us then to the question, whether a student at a state school has a right of attendance which he may enforce by law, or only a privilege which the trustees and faculty may deny at pleasure. Of course, in a private institution, it would be purely a privilege. But the university being a public institution, supported by the state, all persons having certain specified requirements of age, character, education, and upon payment of certain fees and signing the agreement to obey all "lawful authority," hav a right to be admitted, and that right can be enforced by law.

A public privilege, when all the lawful conditions are fulfilled, becomes a right. In the present case all these conditions were fulfilled, and so long as he obeyed all "lawful authority," he had a right to remain in attendance. At last the starting-point has been reached, and we are brought to the question of the legal authority of the faculty and trustees to adopt the rule requiring attendance upon religious services. This is the question at issue, and the only question at issue. But what has the learned gentleman to say upon this question, or in reply to the arguments of the petitioner? With that wisdom and profundity characteristic of the small man in a big office, he says: "It is presumed that the trustees are competent to decide what regulations are proper for the government of the institution, and the law givs them the power to enforce obedience under penalty of forfeiture of said privilege on account of disobedience." Of course, they are "presumed" to be competent, but is this presumption of such a nature that it cannot be questioned? The attorney-general seems to think so, as he steadily avoids the question. The idea of the infallibility of the board of trustees and faculty was never before known to exist outside of the minds of the members of these honorable bodies. The legislature is also presumed to be competent to enact such laws as are "proper" for the government of the state, but do the courts hold such presumption a bar to the consideration of the question of their constitutionality? The entire argument of the petitioner was upon the question of the lawful authority of the trustees and faculty to adopt the rule in question, and for the purpose of showing that they had no such authority. But what has the argument of the attorney-general to say concerning this point—the only point at issue? Absolutely nothing! He loaded his gun with the puff-ball "privilege," but long before it reached the mark the dust had settled, and the constitution still reads: "No person shall be compelled to attend a place of religious worship against his consent."

The attorney-general further says: "The rule in question is not in any proper sense compulsory in my opinion. He could attend chapel exercises if he wished, or if he did not so wish he could be excused upon request, and the rule requiring such request was proper," etc. Could he be excused upon request? No. Only by signing an untrue statement—a statement that such exercises were "repugnant to his religious convictions." Only by begging for the privilege of enjoying a natural right guaranteed him by the constitution, and this to be enjoyed not as a right, but as a favor. Only by doing that which the law clearly gave him the right to refuse to do, viz.: the giving of the reasons for refusal of attendance upon religious services.

Secularism.

From the Independent Pulpit.

Several people hav asked me the meaning of this term.

Secularism is the religion of humanity; it embraces the affairs of this world; it is interested in everything that touches the welfare of a sentient being; it advocates attention to the particular planet in which we happen to liv; it means that each individual counts for something; it is a declaration of intellectual independence; it means that the pew is superior to the pulpit, that those who bear the burdens shall hav the profits, and that they who fill the purse shall hold the strings. It is a protest against theological oppression, against ecclesiastical tyranny, against being the serf, subject, or slave of any phantom, or of the priest of any phantom. It is a protest against wasting this life for the sake of one that we know not of. It proposes to let the gods take care of themselvs. It is another name for common sense; that is to say, the adaptation of means to such ends as are desired and understood. Secularism believes in building a home here, in this world. It trusts to individual effort, to energy, to intelligence, to observation and experience, rather than to the unknown and supernatural. It desires to be happy on this side the grave.

Secularism means food and fireside, roof and raiment, reasonable work and reasonable leisure, the cultivation of the tastes, the acquisition of knowledge, the enjoyment of the arts, and it promises for the human race comfort, independence, intelligence, and, above all, liberty. It means the abolition of sectarian feuds, of theological hatreds. It means the cultivation of friendship and intellectual hospitality. It means living for ourselvs and each other; for the present instead of the past; for this world rather than for another. It means the right to express your thought in spite of popes, and priests, and Gods. It means that impudent idleness shall no longer liv upon the labor of honest men. It means the destruction of the business of those who trade in fear. It proposes to giv serenity and content to the human soul. It will put out the fires of eternal pain. It is striving to do away with violence and vice, with ignorance, poverty, and disease. It livs for the ever present to-day, and the ever-coming to-morrow. It does not believe in praying and receiving, but in earning and deserving. It regards work as worship, labor as prayer, and wisdom as the savior of mankind. It says to every human being: Take care of yourself so that you may be able to help others; adorn your life with the gems called good deeds; illumin your path with the sunlight called friendship and love.

Secularism is a religion—a religion that is understood. It has no mysteries, no mummeries, no priests, no ceremonies, no falsehoods, no miracles, and no persecutions. It considers the lilies of the field, and takes thought for the morrow. It says to the whole world: Work, that you may eat, drink, and be clothed; work, that you may enjoy; work, that you may not want; work, that you may giv and never need.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Our London Letter.

We are given to understand that the state God was very well pleased at the performances lately celebrated in his West End house. His vicegerent, the queen, and all the high priests convey that idea, and so no doubt it is correct. They ought to know, being so constantly in communication with him. But if such be the case, he must be a very one-horse deity to find any gratification in such tomfoolery. It is stated that formerly he was very indignant at having the house of prayer turned into a den of thieves, but he has evidently changed his opinion on the subject, or else he has been deposed in favor of a more pliable God, better suited to the spirit of the times. The real fact of the matter, as it appears to me, is that those who were concerned in the "thanksgiving" service do not believe in any description of supernatural being; the only God they hav any faith in being the one known as "Mammon," and him they worship with all the fervor of which they are capable.

That eminent and sincere preacher of the gospel, Alderman Fowler, has been fairly well exposed by certain ungodly members of Parliament, and there can be very little reasonable doubt that he is quite as capable of a disreputable job as any New York alderman. The evidence given before the committee on the petitions in favor of coal and wine dues certainly did not show that his hands were very clean, and his impudence in seconding the motion to punish one of his subordinates must hav taken the House somewhat by surprise. What splendid examples of morality are shown by these eminent and devout Christians! It is not surprising that they so strenuously, though vainly, use their best endeavors to stem the tide of "Infidelity." They hate its advance because it is a purer system than the one they profess, and under no other religion than Christianity could they so openly and successfully carry on their nefarious practices. As "Jesus pays for all," those who profess to believe in him can safely practice any rascality without imperiling their chance of an eternal paradise, and this doctrin they fully carry out.

Considerable stimulus is being given to the Freethought party by a few of the chief working members, and there is every reason to believe that greater advance will be made this year than has been for some time past. Efforts are being made toward more thorough organization, the means taken appearing favorable for the end to be gained. Unfortunately, the bulk of Freethinkers are none too well endowed with this world's goods, and are ill able to afford to buy the literature or subscribe toward the expenses of the lecturers, who themselvs are men who hav to work for their livelihood, but who, unlike the "ministers of the most high," hav in many cases gone considerable distances to address meetings without any remuneration whatever. You would not find many "men of God" doing that; the vast majority would complacently allow a congregation to be damned without putting out the smallest effort to save them unless well paid for doing so.

Sunday Base Ball Playing Legal in Missouri.

State of Missouri against Christ Von der Ahe, charged with violating the Sunday law.

The defendant is prosecuted under Section 1,578 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

"Every person who shall either labor himself or compel or permit his apprentice or servant or any other person under his charge or control to labor or perform any work, other than household offices of daily necessity, or other work of necessity or charity, or who shall be guilty of hunting game or shooting on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not exceeding $50."

To understand the policy and scope of the Sunday laws on our statute books it is necessary not only to look at the section under which this prosecution is carried on and which only prohibits "labor or work" by any person or by his servant or by anyone under his control (other than the household offices of daily necessity or other works of necessity or charity), or hunting game or shooting on Sunday, but we must look at sections 1,580 and 1,581 in connection with it.

Section 1,578 prohibits work and labor of a servil character, or manual work or labor, and hunting game or shooting on Sunday. Section 1.580 prohibits horse-racing, cock-fighting or playing at cards or games of any kind on Sunday. "Games of any kind" following the special words "playing at cards" means playing at any game of cards, dice, or games of a light character. In a word, it means gambling games, not games like base ball.

Section 581 prohibits the exposure to sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise, etc.

In none of these sections do we find recreation or entertainment, such as the evidence shows the game of base ball as conducted by the defendant in this case, prohibited. On the contrary, the fact that some pleasures, sports, and games are prohibited, and base ball is not, is an intimation by the legislature that there was no intention to prohibit the game. If any recreation or entertainment, even of a moral character, was carried on or conducted in a loud or disorderly manner on Sunday, it would be illegal; but the evidence in this case shows that no disorder or disturbance was committed, but that the best of order prevailed, and the neighborhood was not annoyed or disturbed.

The People against Wm. Dennin (42 Supreme Court reports of New York, page 327) was a case where the defendant was arrested for playing base-ball on Sunday. There the statute is much broader than ours. The statute under which he was prosecuted reads as follows: "All shooting, hunting, fishing, horse-racing, gaming or other public sports, exercises, pastimes, or shows upon Sunday, and all noise disturbing the peace of the day are prohibited." There servil labor, trades, manufactures, and mechanical employments are prohibited likewise. The evidence shows that the base-ball playing was in private grounds, and no noise disturbing the peace of the neighborhood resulted therefrom, and the court decided that the defendant committed no offense under the statute in playing base-ball, and discharged him.

Our Supreme Court in 1876 decided that hunting game on Sunday was not a work or labor within the statute, and discharged the defendant, who had been convicted of hunting under the Sunday laws (State against Carpenter). Since that case was decided our legislature has made hunting game a violation of the Sunday law. But they hav not prohibited, either expressly or by construction, base-ball carried on decently, orderly, and quietly on Sunday.

I might say in addition to this that the game was a reasonable sport and use of nature's powers, and while the evidence showed that money was taken and money paid to the players, it in my mind is not within the meaning of this statute any more than would be the playing of any piano player or singer that might come into the home of a citizen on Sunday to contribute to his entertainment. I therefore find the defendant, under the laws and the evidence, not guilty, and discharge him.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

I.—Physical Maxims.

CHAPTER II.—STRENGTH.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

Bodily vigor is the basis of mental and physical health. Strength is power, and the instinctive love of invigorating exercise manifests itself in the young of all but the lowest brutes. The bigot who undermines the health of his children by stinting their outdoor sport as "worldly vanity," and "exercise that profiteth but little," is shamed by animals who lead their young in races and trials of strength. Thus the female fox will train her cubs; the doe will race and romp with her fawn, the mare with her colt. Monkeys (like the squirrels of our northern forests) can be seen running up and down a tree and leaping from branch to branch, without any conceivable purpose but the enjoyment of the exercise itself; dogs run races, young lions wrestle and paw each other in a playful trial of prowess; even birds can be seen sporting in the air, and dolphins on the play-fields of the ocean. In nearly all classes of the vertebrate animals the rivalry of the males is decided by a trial of strength, and the female unhesitatingly accepts the victor as the fittest representative of his species.

Normal children are passionately fond of athletic sports. In western Yucatan I saw Indian girls climb trees with the agility of a spider-monkey, and laughingly pelt each other with the fruits of the Adansonia fig. The children of the South-sea Islanders vie in aquatic gymnastics. Spartan girls joined in the foot-races of their brothers, and by the laws of Lycurgus were not permitted to marry till they had attained a prescribed degree of proficiency in a number of athletic exercises. Race-running and wrestling were the favorite pastimes of young Romans in the undegenerate age of the republic; and, in spite of all restraints, similar propensities still manifest themselves in our school-boys. They pass the intervals of their study-hours in competitive athletics, rather than in listless inactivity, and brave frosts and snowstorms to get the benefit of outdoor exercise even in midwinter. They love health-giving sports for their own sake, as if instinctively aware that bodily strength will further every victory in the arena of life.

The enthusiasm that gathered about the heroic games of Olympia made those festivals the brightest days in the springtime of the human race. The million-voiced cheers that hailed the victor of the pentathlon have never been heard again on earth since the manliest and noblest of all recreations were suppressed by order of a crowned bigot. The rapture of competitive athletics is a bond which can obliterate the rancor of all baser rivalries, and still unites hostile tribes in the arena of pure manhood: as in Algiers, where the Bedouins joined in the gymnastic prize-games of their French foemen: the same foemen whose banquets they would have refused to share even at the bidding of starvation. In Buda-Pesth I once witnessed a performance of the German athlete Weitzel, and still remember the irrepressible enthusiasm of two broad-shouldered Turks who crowded to the edge of the platform, and, with waving kerchiefs, joined in the cheers of the uncircumcised spectators.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

The "survival of the fittest" means, in many important respects, the survival of the strongest. In a state of nature weakly animals yield to their stronger rivals; the stoutest lion, the swiftest tiger, has a superior chance of obtaining prey; the stouter bulls of the herd defy the attack of the wolves who overcome the resistance of the weaker individuals; the fleetest deer has the best chance to escape the pursuit of the hunter.

A state of civilization does only apparently equalize such differences. The invention of gunpowder has armed the weak with the power of a giant; but the issue of international wars will always be biased by the comparative strength of sinew and steadiness of nerve of the men that handle those improved weapons. In the last Franco-Prussian war the French were favored by an undoubted superiority of arms, but they were utterly beaten by a nation whose sons had devoted their youth to gymnastics. The arms of the Gothic giants were of the rudest description: hunting-spears and clumsy battle-axes; but those axes broke the ranks of the Roman legionaries, with their polished swords and elaborate tactics. For the last two thousand years the wars that decided the international rivalries of Asia, Europe, and North America nearly always ended with the victory of a northern nation over its southern neighbors. The men of the north could not always boast a superiority in science or arms, nor in number, nor in the advantage of a popular cause; but the rigor of their climate exacts a valiant effort in the struggle for existence, and steels the nerves even of an otherwise inferior race. "Fortis Fortuna adjuvat," said a Roman proverb, which means literally that Fortune favors the strong, and which has been well rendered in the paraphrase of a modern translator: "Force begets fortitude and conquers fortune." Nor is that bias of fate confined to the battles of war. In the contests of peace, too, other things being equal, the strong arm will prevail against the weak, the stout heart against the faint. Bodily strength begets self-reliance. "Blest are the strong, for they shall possess the kingdom of the earth," would be an improved variation of the gospel text. The Germanic nations (including the Scandinavian and Anglo-Saxon) who have most faithfully preserved the once universal love of manly sports, have prevailed against their rivals in the arena of industry and science, as well as of war.

An American manufacturer, who established a branch of his business at Havre, France, hired American and British workmen at double wages, maintaining that he found it the cheapest plan, since one of his expensive laborers could do the work of three natives. In the seaport towns, even of South America and Southern Europe, a British sailor is always at a premium. American industry is steadily forcing its way further south, and may yet come to limit the fields of its enterprise only by the boundaries of the American continent. From the smallest beginnings, a nation of iron-fisted rustics has repeatedly risen to supremacy in arms and arts. Two hundred years before the era of Norman conquests in France, Italy, and Great Britain, the natives of Norway were but a race of hardy hunters and fishermen. A century after the battle of Xeres de la Frontera, the half-savage followers of Musa and Tarik had founded high schools of science and industry. And, as the fairest flower springs from the hardy thorn, the brightest flowers of art and poetry have immortalized the lands of heroic freemen, rather than of languid dreamers. The same nation that carried the banners of freedom through the battle-storm of Marathon and Salamis, adorned its temples with the sculptures of Phidias and its literature with the masterpieces of Sophocles and Simonides.

Physical vigor is also the best guarantee of longevity. Nature exempts the children of the south from many cares; yet in the stern climes of the higher latitudes Health seems to make her favorite home; in spite of snowstorms and bitter frosts the robust Scandinavian outlives the languid Italian. In spite of a rigorous climate, I say, for that his length of life is the reward of hardy habits is proved by the not less remarkable longevity of the hardy Arab and the manful Circassian, in climes that differ from that of Norway as Mexico and Virginia differ from Labrador. Men of steeled sinews overcome disease as they brave the perils of wars and the hardships of the wilderness; hospital-surgeons know how readily the semi-savages of a primitive borderland recover from injuries that would send the effeminate city-dweller to the land of the shades. Toil-hardened laborers, too, share such immunities. On the 25th of March, 1887, Thomas McGuire, the foreman of a number of laborers employed at the night-shaft of the Croton Aqueduct, fell to the bottom of the pit, a distance of ninety-five feet, and was drawn up in a comatose condition, literally drenched in his own blood. At the Bellevue Hospital (city of New York) the examining surgeon found him still alive, but gave him up for lost when he ascertained the extent of his injuries. Both his arms were broken near the shoulder, both thighs were fractured, his skull was horribly shattered about the left temple and frontal region, six of his ribs were broken and their splinters driven into the lungs. There seemed no hope what ever for him, and, after the administration of an anesthetic, he was put in a cot and left alone to die. To the utter surprise of the attending surgeon, the next morning found the mass of broken bones still breathing. His fever subsided; he survived a series of desperate operations, survived an apparently fatal hemorrhage, and continued to improve from day to day, till about the middle of June he recovered his complete consciousness, and was able to sit up and answer the questions of the medical men who, in ever increasing numbers, had visited his bedside for the last three weeks. As a newspaper correspondent sums up his case: "His strong constitution had repulsed the assaults of death, till finally the grim monster went away to seek a less obstinate victim." And, moreover, the exercise of athletic sports lessens the danger of such accidents: a trained gymnast will preserve his equilibrium where a weakling would break his neck.

According to the mythus of the Nature-worshiping Greeks, the darling of Venus was a hunter (not a tailor or a hair-dresser), and the gift of beauty is, indeed, bestowed on the lovers of health-giving sports, far oftener than on the votaries of fashion. Supreme beauty is country-bred; the daughters of peasants, of village squires, of fox-hunting barons, have again and again eclipsed the galaxies of court belles. Country boys have won hearts that seemed proof against the charm of city gallants. "I have seen many a handsome man in my time," says old Mrs. Montague in Barry Cornwall's "Table Talk," "but never such a pair of eyes as young Robbie Burns kept flashing from under his beautiful brow." "Women will condone many a moral blemish in a suitor," says Arthur Schopenhauer; "they will pardon rudeness, egotism, and intellectual poverty; they will forgive even homeliness sooner than effeminacy. Instinct seems to tell them that in the result of marriage a mother's influence can neutralize any defect but that."

C.—PERVERSION.

The history of Antinaturalism is the history of a persistent war against the manlier instincts of the human race. Buddha and his Galilean disciples considered the body the enemy of the soul. According to their system of ethics, Nature and all natural instincts are wholly evil; the renunciation of earth and all earthly hopes is their price of salvation, and the chief endeavor of their insane zeal is directed against the interests of the human body. The gospel of Buddha Sakiamuni, and its revamp, the "New Testament" of the Galilean messiah, abound with the ravings of an anti-physical fanaticism as unknown to the ethics of the manly Hebrews as to the philosophy of the earth-loving Greeks and Romans. The duty of physical education and health-culture was entirely ignored in the gospel of the life-despising Nazarene. "A healthy mind in a healthy body," was the ideal of the Grecian philosopher. A world-renouncing mind in a crushed body, was the ideal of the Christian moralists. The sculptors and painters of the Middle Ages vied in the representation of cadaverous saints, hollow-eyed devotees, and ghastly self-torturers. Physical training was tolerated as a secular evil indispensable for such purposes of the militant church as the hunting of heretics and the invasion of Mussulman empires; but its essential importance was vehemently declaimed; the superior merit of sacrificing health to the interests of a body-despising soul was constantly commended, and the founder of the monastic orders that superseded the pagan schools of philosophy did not hesitate to enforce their dogmas by aggressive measures; the wretched convent slaves had to submit to weekly bleedings and strength-reducing penances; their novices were barbarously scourged for the clandestine indulgence of a lingering love for health-giving sports—wrestling in the vacant halls of their cloister-prison, or racing conies on their way to their begging-grounds. The Olympic festivals were suppressed by order of a Christian emperor. The fathers of the church lost no opportunity to inveigh with rancorous invectives against the pagan culture of the manly powers, "so inimical to true contriteness of spirit and meek submission to the yoke of the gospel." The followers of Origenes actually practiced castration as the most effectual means of taming the stubborn instincts of unregenerate boys. Their exemplar, who had recommended that plan for years, came at last to suspect the necessity of eradicating a germ of worldliness in his own mind, and proceeded to accomplish that purpose by emasculating himself. The anti-physical principle of European Buddhism manifests itself likewise in the fanaticism of the Scotch ascetics who raged against the scant physical recreations of a people already sufficiently afflicted by climatic vicissitudes and the parsimony of an indigent soil. It still survives in the bigotry of those modern zealots who groan at sight of a horse-race or wrestling-match, and would fain suppress the undue worldliness of ball-playing children. Manly pastimes were banished from the very dreams of a world to come; and while the heroes of Walhalla contest the prizes of martial sports, and the guests of Olympus share in the joyful festivals of the gods, the saints of our priest-blighted heaven need the alternative of an eternal hell to enjoy the prospect of an everlasting Sabbath-school.

> Trials of strength and of skill,
> Rewarded by festive assemblies,
> Feasts in the halls of gods, where the voice of the muses
> Answered in songs to the ravishing lyre of Apollo, quotes a German poet from the Vulgata, "when suddenly," he adds, "a gaunt, blood-streaming Jew rushed in with a crown of thorns on his head and a huge wooden cross on his shoulder, which cross he dashed on the banquet table of the appalled gods, who turned paler and paler till they finally faded away into a pallid mist. And a dreary time then began; the world turned chill and bleak. The merry gods had departed; Olympus became a Golgatha, where sickly, skinned, and roasted deities sneaked about mournfully, nursing their wounds and chanting doleful hymns. Religion, once a worship of joy, became a whining worship of sorrow."

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

But Nature had her revenge, and the despisers of their own bodies became so truly contemptible that in comparison the rudest barbarians of antiquity seemed respectable men. The neglect of physical exercise avenged itself in loathsome diseases, the perverted instincts exploded in vices; the monkish self-abasers became caricatures of manhood: bloated, whining, mean, and viciously sensual wretches, the laughing-stock of foreign nations and the curse and disgrace of their own. Physically, mentally, and morally, the earth-despising convent drone represented the vilest type of degeneration to which the manhood of our race has ever been degraded, and the enforced veneration of such monsters, as exemplars of perfection, has perverted the ethical standards of mankind to a degree for which our present generation is as yet far from having wholly recovered. The love of athletic recreations is still smirched with the stigma of the Middle Ages; "respectability" is too often mistaken for a synonym of pedantry and conventional effeminacy; parents still frown upon the health-giving sports of their children; vice still sneaks in the disguise of saintliness and world-renouncing aversion to physical recreations.

The degeneration of many once manful races has reached an incurable phase; the listless resignation to physical abasement and decrepitude. Earth has spurned her despisers; millions of priest-slaves in southern Europe have lost the inheritance of their fathers, and have to till the soil for aliens and despots. The arbitrament of war has made them taste the lowest dregs of national humiliation; the life-long worshipers of whining saints appealed in vain to the God of Battles, and were forced to eat dust at the feet of the despised Infidel and heretic. The ships of the Spanish Armada were consecrated by a chorus of ranting priests commending them to the miraculous protection of heaven; and heaven's answer came in the blast of the hurricane that buried their fleet in the depths of the sea. The same nation once more invoked the aid of the saints for the protection of an armament against the great naval powers of the nineteenth century. The ships were ceremoniously baptized with the most fulsomely pious names: "The Holy Savior of the World," "Saint Maria," "Saint Joseph," "The Most Holy Trinity," and sent forth in full reliance on the protection of supernatural agencies. But in the encounter with Nelson's self-relying veterans the sacred bubble at once collapsed. St. Joseph's impotence howled in vain for the assistance of the Holy Ghost. The Savior of the World could save himself only by a shameful flight, and the Most Holy Trinity succumbed to a decided surplus of holes.

E.—REDEMPTION.

In the work of physical regeneration Nature meets the reformer more than half-way. Our children need but little encouragement to break the fetters of the fatuous restraint that dooms them to a life of physical apathy. They ask nothing but time and opportunity to redeem the coming generation from the stigma of unmanliness and debility. Physical and intellectual education should again go hand in hand if we would promote the happiness of a redeemed race on the plan that made the age of Grecian philosophy and gymnastics the brightest era in the history of mankind. Physical reform should be promoted by the systematic encouragement of athletic sports; every township should have a free gymnasium, every village a free foot-race park; by prize-offers for supremacy in competitive gymnastics wealthy philanthropists could turn thousands of boy topers into young athletes. We should have athletic county meetings, state field-days, and national or international Olympiads.

Educational ethics should fully recognize the rights of the body. We should admit the unorthodox, but also undeniable, truth that an upright and magnanimous disposition is a concomitant of bodily strength, while fickleness, duplicity, and querulous injustice are the characteristics of debility. We should teach our children that a healthy mind can dwell only in a healthy body, and that he who pretends to find no time to take care of his health is a workman who thinks it a waste of time to take care of his tools.

News and Notes.

I lectured at Corvallis Sunday, July 10th, to a fair audience, afternoon and evening. But Corvallis is a slow-going place for Liberalism at present. There is much indifference, owing to the fact, perhaps, that Corvallis is a little bit out of the way, and doesn't feel the pulses of the "wide, wide world." However, it expects ere long to be one of the great main lines of travel from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Ten million dollars is now ready, I believe, to complete the railroad through western Oregon to Boise City, connecting with the Northwestern Railroad, and being a continuation of the Oregon and Pacific, which runs from Albany through Corvallis to Yaquina Bay, making a new trans-continental route which will open immense tracts of country to the inroads of civilization. This will giv new life to Corvallis, and so progress and Liberalism. However, I found a whole team in my friend B. F. Hyland, the son of a clergyman, but packed with Liberalism like a summer-day with sunshine. A half-dozen like him would revolutionize Corvallis. Mr. Wheeler is another splendid ally. These are the only two who take THE TRUTH SEEKER or Liberal journals in this place, and they show the vigorous impulse of constant communication with the world-wide movement of Freethought. I always find my best success where THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator hav preceded me, and so I see that our solid work for the future depends upon the increase of their circulation.

I was glad to meet with friends from the vicinity —Mr. Hodges, Mr. Clark, etc.—and I don't leave Corvallis with discouragement. I shall return again and hav a larger audience.

I was pleased also to meet Mr. I. T. Ford, of Independence, postmaster of the place, against whom the Christians hav waged a bitter warfare on account of his outspoken Liberalism, but without success. He stands his ground, and the community is in his favor. I hope to lecture at Independence on my next tour. From all indications, I expect to prosecute the campaign again, after the next Congress, along the Pacific states. They are full of promis.

From Corvallis I come to Stayton, where I giv three lectures July 12th, 13th, and 14th. The orthodox element here is one of the most bitter I hav met. There was an intense desire to do me physical violence. Some thought I ought to be mobbed and hung. I reckon a few of them thought I had horns and hoofs. However, we hav stanch men here, and they don't scare worth a cent, and we went right ahead. All the lectures were crowded, and I gave an extra address in the grove, to which, also, there was a large attendance. We organized a Secular Union with forty good names for the start. Wm. Sims, Otto Schellberg, T. J. McCary, Dr. Matheson, Captain Waters, H. N. Cooper, I. H. Cooley, Frank Roe, George Gaspel, Wm. Brown, N. R. Adams, and others are our "Marion's men" in these Oregon forests, and the enemy will find an unbroken front.

I want to speak a word for McCary, who presided at the Liberal meetings and is president of the Union organized here. He is teacher in the school, of recognized ability, but the orthodox are going to make a hot fight against him and remove him, if possible, on account of his fearless advocacy of Freethought. He made burning, eloquent addresses at my meetings in defense of his position. If the orthodox do remove him, it will only open a larger field of usefulness; for I believe he would make a brilliant success on the Freethought platform, and such men we now need in our ever advancing work.

The orthodox of the vicinity wanted a debate with Clark Braden, and they sent him a telegram to "come on." I instantly refused to meet him, on the ground that he was no gentleman, and by his own base methods was ruled out of the lists of honorable warfare; and I took occasion at Stayton and Silverton to expose this theological tramp, and I think that even the Christians are ashamed of his company—at least, every Christian lady and gentleman. At the close of my lectures at Stayton a challenge was given me for debate. I instantly accepted it, with the condition, which was granted, that I should choose a time not included in my present engagements. As these take almost every evening until November 1st and the meeting of Congress, the debate will not come off until my next tour; but unless the orthodox party back down, the debate is as certain as anything can be in the course of human events.

Silverton friends greet me at Stayton—Fitzgerald, Davenport, Wolford, McIntosh—and in the early morning (Friday) we take a drive for Silverton over the beautiful Waldo hills. This is one of the loveliest farming sections of Oregon, and is a rural paradise, indeed, of splendid fields, orchards, groves, etc. We stop at Ralph Geer's, a famous pioneer of this country, whose deeds of strength are among the legends of the land. We gather fruits, flowers, etc., for a merry hour, but in the midst of the very sunshine of our joy Fitzgerald meets with a sudden fall, and a swift, terrific vision of death appears which I shall never forget. The awful shadow passes away, and life triumphs; but it leaves my friend Fitzgerald weak and on a bed of suffering—a noble friend, indeed—frank, brave, genial—the life of the company—generous, open-hearted—a comrade whom we love; and so our deepest sympathies are with him and his noble wife, whose charming home has been to me a rest and inspiration. Nowhere hav I had a more delightful welcome. The lights and shadows come; but these all shall only knit more closely the ties of fellowship, and make our humanity sweeter and nobler, and sorrow shall be the minister of kindness and hope.

In the evening I lectured to a crowded house, nearly a third of the audience being obliged to stand. I spoke in reply to the Rev. Mr. Driver on the genuinness, authenticity, and inspiration of the Bible. I think our Christian friends hav heard some facts about the history of the Bible of which they never dreamed. The discussion has done good, and I only wish that the Rev. Mr. Driver would meet me in debate. But he will not. I hav challenged him, but he finds that "discretion is the better part of valor."

I am up with the early worm on Saturday morning—not, however, to be caught by the early bird. With one of Marshbank's good teams, Homer Davenport takes me over to Woodburn, eleven miles off, for the morning train to Portland. It was a beautiful drive in the jeweled dawn, the woods and fields growing luminous and fiery in the advancing day. At Woodburn I strike my friend Scott, of the Liberal host, and on we go to Portland. Here again I meet my friends the Saunders, Niles, Beal, etc., and rest myself awhile. Saturday afternoon I come to Forest Grove, and here I get the enthusiastic greeting of T. G. Todd, who keeps our forces in motion at this point in spite of much indifference. I am now at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Buxton this happy Sunday morning, and pleasant surroundings and genial hospitality make my pilgrim pathway full of cheer and hope. I lecture this afternoon and evening, and doubt not I shall hav a good reception in this old camping-ground of friend York, where his ringing voice has been heard. Next week I am busy—Monday and Tuesday evenings at Eagle Creek; Wednesday at East Portland; Thursday at Portland; Friday at Astoria; Sunday next at Seattle; Monday and Tuesday, July 25th and 26th, at Newcastle; July 29th, 30th, and 31st and Aug. 1st at Snohomish; Aug. 4th and 5th at Port Angeles; Aug. 7th, 8th, and 9th at Port Townsend; Portland, Aug. 11th; Colfax, W. T., Aug. 13th, 14th, and 15th; and then I expect to be at Spokane Falls, Walla Walla, Pendleton, Union City, Baker City, Prairie City, and thence to Emmett's and Boise City, Idaho. I expect to be in Salt Lake City Sept. 24th and 25th for the convention of the Liberals of Utah, and from thence by way of Colorado and Nebraska to Chicago for the national Congress in November.

Testimonials Wanted.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A letter from Mr. H. E. Dewey, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 23d, applauds Elmina's work and cites two instances in which her efforts hav resulted in benefit and happiness to others. Many similar cases must be known to Elmina's friends, and it would greatly aid and strengthen her and be a deserved tribute to her devotion if the reports of such cases were collected. I therefore ask each and all who hav experienced benefit from her work, or who know of others so benefited, to send a statement to that effect. Such statement should be authentic, and within the positiv knowledge of the writer. I expect this request will bring me a large number of such testimonials which I can use to advantage, while respecting the wishes of those who indicate that they wish their communications treated as confidential.

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN,
Treas. N. D. A, 120 Broadway, N. Y.

Mrs. Slenker's Attorneys.

The question is often asked, "Do you know anything of Elmina's attorneys?" For the information of all who are interested in the case we hav the pleasure of presenting the following extract from a letter from Prof. Thomas N. Conrad, ex-president of the Virginia Agricultural and Mechanical College: "The law firm of Ronald & Heermans, of Blacksburg, Montgomery county, Va., stands well, and deservedly so. Chas. A. Ronald, the senior member of the firm, is sixty years of age, was a soldier in the Mexican war, and was the senior colonel in the famous "Stonewall" brigade, and was its actual commander in a number of its battles. He is a lawyer of thirty-five years' experience, was at one time the commonwealth's attorney of his county, and twice represented the county in the legislature. He is a Democrat in politics, an eloquent advocate, and a gentleman of high standing and ability. Charles A. Heermans, the junior member of the firm, is forty-five years old, the present commonwealth's attorney for the county, a journalist of fifteen years' experience, has a large acquaintance in the state, of commanding influence, a Republican in politics, and a rising man of southwest Virginia.

"There are few firms possessing greater advantages and capable of rendering more efficient service to any cause they espouse."

In addition to Messrs. Ronald and Heermans, both this law firm and Mrs. Slenker are in correspondence with the treasurer of our National Defense Association, who is also an able lawyer. E. W. Chamberlain, Esq., has been a constant attendant at the meetings of the Defense Association, has taken a deep interest in its work, and is thoroughly conversant with the prosecutions which hav taken place under the Comstock law, and he is especially familiar with such cases as might properly be called persecutions. Those who are contributing money for Elmina's defense are entitled to know these facts, and it is with much pleasure that we spread before our readers what we hav learned from Professor Conrad in regard to the local counsel and what we know ourselvs of one who is in constant correspondence with the defense.

THE St. Stephen's Home for Orphans and Homeless Children in East 28th street, this city, is soon to become a parochial school. The Home was founded by Dr. McGlynn to provide for the poor children of the parish, contrary to the wishes of the church authorities, who wanted him to build a parochial school. It is said that the New Dorp, Staten Island, Home, also founded by Dr. McGlynn for poor children, has already been broken up and will soon be sold.

Bible Astronomy and Evolution.

Without a doubt, immense progress has been made in all the physical sciences during the last two centuries; indeed, it may be truly said that methodized knowledge has accumulated with far greater rapidity since the printing press has revealed the facts to the multitude than in all previous history. Science is distinguished from common knowledge in this—that whereas science uses the facts which are commonly known, it does more, it arranges and organizes them.

Of the sciences, none has greater fascination to the speculativ mind than astronomy. Its truths are discovered by careful observation, and by even more careful mathematical calculations. It has been well observed that all science, to become accurate, must be expressed in terms of mathematics. In that case, astronomy may be regarded as a fairly exact science. And so indeed it is. The astronomer may predict with absolute certainty many astronomical phenomena a hundred years before their happening. To the very hour he can foretell the next transit of Venus.

But while it is true that to-day such wonders may be performed, it was not always so.

It is perfectly plain to the most superficial student of the Bible that the writers of its various fragmentary essays knew nothing of astronomy.

The writer of the first chapter of Genesis had no idea either of the distance of the stars from the sun or the earth, or of their magnitude. He appears to hav thought that this earth was the only world, and all the heavenly bodies unimportant auxiliaries The universe to him consisted merely of this earth, which he believed to be walled about on every hand by an overhanging, arch-like, solid firmament.

When the poet Thompson finely wrote:

> With what an awful, world-revolving power,
> Were first the unwieldy planets launch'd along
> Th' illimitable void! Thus to remain
> Amid the flux of many thousand years,
> That oft had swept the toiling race of men
> And all their labored monuments away,
> Firm, unremitting, matchless in their course,
> To the kind tempered change of night and day,
> And of the seasons ever stealing round,
> Minutely faithful,

he was expressing from a poetic point of view an aspect of the astronomical phenomena following the alleged creation which was quite beyond the grasp of the writer of Genesis.

No idea of the "illimitable void" through which the multitudinous stars continually coursed appears to hav entered his thoughts. To him the earth was flat, and the sun, moon, and stars fixed in the heavens like sun burners, or electric lights on the roofs of theaters or great halls.

And the writer of the book of Joshua was no less ignorant, for according to him, at the command of Joshua the "sun and the moon stood still," a statement which is absurd on the face of it, since, so far as this earth is concerned, the sun does not move, but the earth revolves around it. It is a declaration, moreover, which could only hav been made in an age of supreme ignorance of the elementary principles of astronomy. Many divines hav sought to explain away the absurdity of the inspired writer by declaring that what actually took place was that the earth stood still, and this, it is alleged, gave the appearance described by the Bible writer. But this only renders the passage more ridiculous from a scientific standpoint than before, for as the earth, besides revolving on its axis, is traveling round the sun at a speed almost equivalent to a thousand miles an hour, for the earth to hav stood still would hav meant the precipitation into space of all animated beings, and the probable engulfment of the earth by the sun.

A careful study of the pages of the Bible will show, however, that all the astrologers mentioned within its pages proceeded in their investigations into celestial phenomena on a wrong assumption—the assumption that the earth was the center of the universe. Nobody can blame them for it; they were doubtlessly perfectly honest—and if the priesthood of subsequent ages had not claimed for the writings in which these views are set forth "divine inspiration," these astrologers would hav deserved nothing but praise for their early and earnest guesses at truth.

But in the natural evolution of the human mind the study of the heavenly bodies underwent numerous important changes. Human life at best is short, and few are the facts which even long-lived astronomers could gather for the benefit of their fellows. If, as the learned Josephus thought, "God indulged the antediluvians with a long life that they might bring astronomy and geometry to perfection," then undoubtedly the intention of deity was never realized, or, the early astronomers, or astrologers, as they were called, having very inadequate means of making known their accumulated knowledge, much of it must hav been lost either in the teaching or, as a religious writer seriously suggests, "in the flood." In other words, it must hav been washed "from the tables of the memory" of Noah and his "righteous" but probably very ignorant family.

The Chaldeans, the Egyptians, and Chinese appear to hav made astronomy an important study, and with some useful results.

The Egyptians conceived that the planets Mercury and Venus revolved like satellites around the sun; but they believed the earth to be stationary, and the sun, moon, and stars to revolve round it.

The Greeks, too, cultivated the study of astronomy, and Pythagoras, who lived more than five hundred years before Christ, seems to hav been the first to teach that the sun was the center of the universe; that the earth was globular, and moved round the sun; that the moon was inhabited, and that comets are wandering stars.

But it was not till Copernicus, in the sixteenth century, formulated afresh this system, with some slight improvements, that it began to be accepted even by cultivated persons. Galileo was condemned for preaching it, and had to recant or die. He preferred to recant. Bruno, more brave, chose rather to die at the stake than yield up what he believed to be true. So, too, did Vanini and many another pioneer of progress.

The invention of the telescope, the wonderful discoveries made by the use of it by Galileo and others, all tended to confirm the principles laid down by Copernicus, and to open up a wider field of study for future astronomers. With a still further improvement of the telescope, and the manufacture of one 120 feet in length, great strides were made in astronomical science.

In the year 1666, in his twenty-fourth year of age, Sir Isaac Newton made his wonderful discovery of the law of gravitation. While resting under a tree in an orchard the young scientist was struck upon the head by a falling apple, which led him to numerous important reflections. First of all, he thought that, as all bodies lighter than the earth were irresistibly attracted toward it, so it might be that this law of attraction or gravitation acted in other regions besides the earth; that this law extended as far as the moon, whose motion would necessarily be influenced by it.

In his "Principia," Sir Isaac Newton very largely elaborates this theory. He also was the inventor of a telescope.

Few very important discoveries were made in astronomy from this point until Sir William Herschel directed his large telescopes toward the heavens. Then many important discoveries were made, which not only extended the astronomical view of the planetary system, but also of the sidereal heavens.

Sir Wm. Herchel's son, following in his father's footsteps, continued the work, and, with the aid of Sir J. South, made a catalog of 380 double stars, determining with the utmost precision and accuracy their distances and angles of position.

From this time down to the present, extraordinary progress has been made, so that it may be truly said that not only are most of the movements of the heavenly bodies known; not only can the distances of the stars be determined; not only can eclipses of sun or moon be accurately foretold; not only can the composition of comets be demonstrated, but Professor Tyndall has carried experimental science so far as to determin the weight of a comet's tail.

All this knowledge, it will be observed, is a slow growth. Changes undoubtedly hav taken place in the heavenly bodies themselvs during the thousands of years that hav elapsed since the early astrologers or the Biblical writers first devoted their attention to the study of celestial phenomena. But no such changes hav occurred to account for the topsey-turvy view of the subject which our early ancestors entertained. To them the stars were small luminaries fixed in the heavens to giv the earth light by night; they were but "twinkle, twinkle little stars." Now, however, they are discovered to be immense bodies, millions, or in some cases billions, of miles away from the earth; some of them are found to be great suns; others are so distant that the light from them has not yet reached the earth, notwithstanding the immense speed at which it travels.

And the study of astronomy, in addition to revealing many facts with which we were previously unacquainted, has done more than any other science to banish the gods from the universe and to make known the unity of nature. The astronomer finds that he can set no limits to nature; that he can neither scale her hights nor penetrate her depths—that, go as far, in any given direction, as he may, there is still boundless space beyond which no man has penetratrated, or probably can penenetrate.

Man's faculties are finite; how, then, can he possibly grasp the infinit—whether it be called nature or God?

A PERSON who derives all his instruction from teachers or books, even if he escape the besetting temptation of contenting himself with cram, is under no compulsion to hear both sides; accordingly it is far from a frequent accomplishment, even among thinkers, to know both sides; and the weakest part of what everybody says in defense of his opinion is what he intends as a reply to antagonists.—John Stuart Mill.

Are Christians Spiritualists?

Perhaps nine-tenths of the laity would indignantly answer, No!

But "to the law and the testimony."

The word "spirit" occurs some hundreds of times in the Christian's Bible, but it is usually accompanied by a definitiv term.

Only a few Bible writers hint at a belief in spirit as an entity separate and apart from the body.

The Old Testament writers are remarkably silent in regard to a future state.

The New Testament writers often refer to an entity termed by them "the holy spirit," "the Holy Ghost," "the spirit," etc., evidently meaning a supposed personification of the deity which they worshiped.

The phrase, "spirit of God" occurs some twenty-five or thirty times, but in nearly every instance is defined by some accompanying word or words as pertaining to man.

"The spirit of God moved on the face of the waters" is an incomprehensible phrase unless construed to mean that power inherent in nature capable of evolving order out of chaos.

This "spirit of God" came on Balaam, Saul, upon Saul's messengers to David, on Aza, and was in Job's nostrils. It is also said to dwell in believers, and sanctifies them if they do not grieve it.

Matthew saw "the spirit of God" descending in the form of a dove at Christ's baptism, which is a big crumb of comfort for the gullible. It was by the spirit of God that Christ cast out devils.

God is said to be "the God of spirits," "the father of the spirits of all flesh;" he "maketh angels spirits;" it is also said that "there are four spirits of heaven," whatever that may mean.

The "unclean spirits," "dumb spirits," and "foul spirits" spoken of and cast out by Jews and apostles betrayed their gross ignorance of physiology by attributing diseases to the agency of demons.

The practices of Christians and Spiritualists in exorcising and invoking the supposed communion of spiritual beings are decidedly similar.

The oracle of the ark of the covenant, or the ark of God, and the breastplate worn by the priests singularly enough resemble the planchette and cabinet dark seances of modern Spiritualists.

The making of an ax swim, the increase of oil in the pots by Elisha, read like the "manifestations" of flower mediums and others of Banner of Light fame.

The suspension of physical laws was about as common among Bible worthies, or unworthies, as among the disciples of the Fox girls. Christians, of course, accept all "the truths" recorded in God's infallible word, the same as the Spiritualist refers all those mysterious mental and nervous phenomena to the agency of disembodied spirits at once, and without investigation or controversy.

The handwriting on the wall at Belshazzar's feast is complemented now all over the land by "independent slate-writing."

The appearance of Jesus "in the midst" of the disciples, "the doors being shut," reads mighty like the description of a dark seance (John xx, 26).

Acts ii, 2—the pentecostal "out and down pouring" of "the spirit" sounds wonderfully like an account of a seance of mediums.

Then "the spirit of prophecy" is spoken of, and the power of "discerning spirits," which smacks strongly of the teachings of modern Spiritualism.

Peter preached to the spirits in prison, which is another conundrum; and John, in Patmos (whose liver was morbid), saw "three unclean spirits, like the spirits of devils."

But the grandest seance of all was the ascension of Christ in broad daylight into the clouds in the presence of a gaping crowd.

The church, however, kicks on the healing of diseases in the face of the positiv and direct assertions of Christ and the apostles to the effect that the elders and believers could cure the sick and handle venomous serpents with impunity.

The "familiar spirits" referred to in the Bible correspond very well with the "guardian angels" or "spirit controls" of mediums.

The dreams, visions, trances, etc., of the writers of the Bible and Bible characters are often quoted by "Christian" Spiritualists in confirmation of their doctrins.

Since the advent of authentic history it has been the universal custom to attribute all mysterious mental phenomena to a spiritual origin, and all natural phenomena to God. The latter belief was prevalent in Bible times.

There is no appreciable difference between the ravings of Saint John in the Isle of Patmos, and the incoherent utterings of many modern trance mediums.

Pulpit perorations are often of the same flippant, senseless nature.

The prophets of the Bible were mediums in the same sense that mediums are prophets.

Christians meet together and pray for "the communion and indwelling of the holy spirit;" while Spiritualists meet, sing, and invoke "the influence," or the spirits of the dead, as they claim to understand it.

The "conditions" necessary to obtain the desired results are the same in the Christian church meeting as in the Spiritualistic seance.

The writer has witnessed and experienced the mental phenomena of the so-called "revivals of religion," as well as those of spirit-mediumship, and attributes them all to psychic laws not well understood. That they can and will be accounted for without requiring the intervention of spirits—holy or otherwise—I hav no doubt.

The results are self-induced in both instances; that is, no results would take place in either case did not the Christian or Spiritualist arrange or bring about the necessary "conditions."

The mental or nervous phenomena peculiar to religious revivals would ensue just the same did the devotee concentrate and direct his devotions to Jove, Jupiter, Mohammed, Buddha, or Confucius, instead of to Jesus; likewise, "the manifestations" of Spiritualists would occur the same if the diakka of the planet Saturn or the demons of hades were invoked, instead of the spirits of dead relativs and friends.

Spiritual manifestations are both illusory and delusiv, and the same may be said of the Christian religion.

There exists no evidence that the theory of either the one or the other is true. In fact, the tendency of what proof there is attainable in regard to either is to prove that they are both false.

Christianity has been in vogue eighteen hundred years, yet the world is not saved from sin.

Modern Spiritualism made its advent about half a century ago, yet instead of the world being revolutionized to its doctrins, there are, perhaps, more Materialists now than there were then.

Like the boiling of a pot, the results, the modus operandi of "getting religion" and becoming "developed" as a medium, flow from within outward, and not vice versa, as supposed by the respectiv devotees.

So far as known, there is no power or influence above or outside of us to produce the results observed. There is nothing supernatural, supermundane, or beyond the cognizance of our senses; or if there does exist anything of that sort it is beyond our comprehension and utility, and as such it is useless for us to theorize or speculate about it.

The Christian theorizes upon the beauties of a future home beyond the clouds, or in an indefinable somewhere, attainable on good behavior here, while the Spiritualists expatiate on the loveliness of the great beyond or "summer-land."

The Christian looks forward to the resurrection of "body and breeches," while the Spiritualists claim that the mind or thinking principle only will survive death, yet it is to be in an ethereal, human form.

"Experiencing religion," or passing under "spirit control," exalts and intensifies the feelings or senses somewhat like the ecstasies of hypnotic subjects, and, prolonged, deranges the organic functions and dethrones reason.

The brain is in an abnormal whirl of excitement, all the forces of life appearing to be centered and concentrated there, and attempting to escape upward through the top of the head because the skull seems too small to contain the sea of bliss in which the soul is floating. It is a mental intoxication. It is extremely dangerous to drink excessivly at this elysian fountain.

The man or woman who sails too often on this mysterious, unknown sea soon becomes satiated with the jewels gathered there, and would gladly exchange them for the husks of the normal state. The whole being becomes so intensely absorbed in this mysterious ocean of wild, ecstatic delirium, that the unfortunate subject is oblivious to the requirements and duties of practical life, caring for neither wife nor potato-patch, and lands in an insane asylum an object of pity, a wreck of his or her former self—all from attempting to sound and sail in the boundless abyss of the unknown, where there is no shore, chart, or compass to guide. Vain mortals, beware!

But to return. The Christian longs to walk the golden-paved streets of the mythical New Jerusalem, carrying palms, harps, and singing and shouting forever in sight of "the great white throne" which John saw, with those hideous beasts sitting around to complete the picture and the Christian's happiness; while the Spiritualist expects to hav a good time generally "over there," and, by way of spice to relieve the monotony of sylvan groves and "the music of the spheres," to occasionally whisk around the scenes of his earth life, rapping tables, thumping pianos, and controling mediums, for the edification of gullible mortals and for his own advancement in the spirit spheres.

There is to be observed this difference between the practices of Bible Spiritualists and their Christian successors in modern times—the former "asked counsel of the Lord," that is, consulted the oracle, prophet, or priest in regard to their temporal affairs only; the latter claim to ask God to save them from temptation, sin, and an endless hell, though they are careful to weave into their prayers always a petition for the reception of "every good and perfect gift."

The instructions of the Lord to some of the Bible mediums or prophets were about equal to the "conditions" required for the development of modern mediumship.

Hosea was instructed by the Lord first to marry a prostitute and afterward an adulteress. Whether modern Spiritualism is responsible for free love doctrins or not, free loveism was unknown till after the advent of the Spiritualist craze.

Moreover, the Mormon branch of the church base their polygamous practices upon the teachings of the Bible. The spiritual "sealing" of a number of women to one man as carried out by the "Latter-day Saints" is but the system of concubinage taught in the Bible gone to seed.

The vast temporal and spiritual power claimed by the holy mother Roman Catholic church—of which Protestantism is only a sugar-coated parasite or side issue—is founded on Christ's declaration to Peter in Matthew xvi, 18, 19.

The church—especially the Catholic—extorts its millions annually from its votaries for its supposed influence and ministrations before a mythical "throne of grace," for the "free pardon of sin," for the sale of indulgences, etc.

The eighty thousand able-bodied priestly drones in the United States fleece their unsuspecting victims to the tune of from $20 to $20,000 yearly, for their intercession as middle men or mediums between man and supposed gods.

An "innumerable company" of astrologers, soothsayers, trance lecturers, and spirit mediums ply their vocation at from twenty-five cents to $5 per head for their "seances," "sittings," answering of "sealed letters," etc.

Where's the difference?

Echo only answers, "Where?"

Mrs. Slenker's Offense.

Mrs. Slenker has forwarded us a copy of the indictment found against her. It reads as follows:

District Court of the United States of America for the Western District of Virginia in the fourth circuit, at a special term of the District Court of the United States of America, for the Western District of Virginia in the fifth circuit, held at Abingdon within and for the District and circuit aforesaid, on the 12th of July in the year of our Lord 1887, and continued by adjournment to and including the 14th day of July, 1887.

Western District of Virginia, S.S.

The Jurors of the United States of America within and for the district and circuit aforesaid, on their oaths present that Elmina D. Slenker, late of Pulaski county in the district and circuit aforesaid, heretofore, to wit, on the 15th day of March, 1887, at the said Western District of Virginia, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did unlawfully and knowingly deposit and cause to be deposited in the mail of the United States for mailing and delivering in the post-office of Snowville, Va., certain obscene, lewd, and lascivious writings, papers, prints, and publications, one of which said writings is called, "The Girl and the Dog," and the others of said writings, prints, and publications are without any title whatsoever, and all of which said writings, papers, prints, and publications are so lewd, obscene, and lascivious that the same would be offensiv to the court here and improper to be placed on the records thereof, wherefore the jurors aforesaid do not set forth the same in this indictment, which said writings, prints, and publications were then and there inclosed in a paper envelope, which said envelope was indorsed in red ink, "Private papers of Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va.," which said envelope, containing said writings, prints, and publications as aforesaid, was then and there inclosed in another paper envelope, which said last-named paper envelope was then and there addressed and directed as follows: "W. H. Barclay, Richmond, Va."

Against the peace of the said United States and their dignity and against the form and statute of said United States in such case made and provided.

We hav never seen the stuff mentioned, and therefore cannot say how offensiv it is. If it is the same that was printed in the Word, it is very disgusting, and we cannot imagin how Mrs. Slenker should hav thought she was doing good by circulating it.

MR. HEYWOOD ON THE MATTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of this date Mrs. Slenker says:

Right here I want to make one simple explanation of what has gone against me more than almost any other one thing. . . . In the correspondence many wonderful accounts of monstrosities born of connections between animals and human beings came to me from many quarters. I knew Heywood was interested in all that pertains to sex and heredity, so wrote a note to him telling him of the stories I had received, and, to my sorrow and surprise, he published the item in the Word. I did not think it fit for publication, and so failed to mark it "private."

This implied (though perhaps not intended) censure of me as being the cause of what "has gone against her more than almost any other one thing," is uncalled for and unsupported by the facts. The brief extract (five lines only in our narrow columns) appeared in the last September Word. In the October Word I printed a long letter from Mrs. Slenker fully explaining her position as an investigator of sex questions, but containing no such insinuation as is implied in the above. Mrs. Slenker's letter was like hundreds of others Mrs. Heywood and I hav received from her; it contained nothing whatever indicating that it was a "private" letter. The fact printed was a revolting one, but none the less a fact because it let daylight into the dark, rotten morality of so-called "good society." The public statement of facts relativ to mental disease (no names of persons implicated were given) is as much an imperativ necessity to reformation as that the diagnosis of physical disease must precede suggestion of remedies. To say the fact was "not fit for publication" is to say that the patient better die of the malady than be relieved by faithful curativs, even though pain is incidental to convalescence. It recalls pro-slavery irrationalism which tried to "remove" the Abolitionists for exposing the villainies of chattel bondage; it was not the sin, but pictures of it, which shocked the pro-slaverites!

Whenever persons intimate to us that what they say is confidential, their wish, of course, is always respected; but facts sent us are fit or "not fit" to print, according to conditions of which the publishers of the Word must judge for themselvs. Unless specially marked "private," I do not consider it a compliment to me, or to the senders, to receive from them statements which they are afraid or ashamed to face in print. I am not, never was, and never shall be in the clandestin role of social reformer. Persons unprepared to stand behind their own sentences, written or spoken to me, I hav no use for.

But, irrespectiv of the above, I am with you, Mr. Editor, in every brave and timely word you hav printed in Mrs. Slenker's defense. Her arrest and imprisonment is an outrage on personal liberty and the rights of private correspondence, which will be resented, more and more, as people become intelligent enough to sense the villainy of Comstock's "laws." I trust that the intrinsic nobility of the woman in this case, the spotless righteousness of her purpose, and the imperativ necessity of reform will assure her unconditional acquittal.

Princeton, July 16, 1887. E. H. HEYWOOD.

The Liberty of Thought and Discussion.

JOHN STUART MILL "ON LIBERTY."

When their enemies said, "See how these Christians love one another" (a remark not likely to be made by anybody now), they assuredly had a much livelier feeling of the meaning of their creed than they hav ever had since. And to this cause, probably, it is chiefly owing that Christianity now makes so little progress in extending its domain, and after eighteen centuries is still nearly confined to Europeans and the descendants of Europeans. Even with the strictly religious, who are much in earnest about their doctrins, and attach a greater amount of meaning to many of them than people in general, it commonly happens that the part which is thus comparativly activ in their minds is that which was made by Calvin, or Knox, or some such person much nearer in character to themselvs. The sayings of Christ coexist passivly in their minds, producing hardly any effect beyond what is caused by mere listening to words so amiable and bland. There are many reasons, doubtless, why doctrins which are the badge of a sect retain more of their vitality than those common to all recognized sects, and why more pains are taken by teachers to keep their meaning alive; but one reason certainly is, that the peculiar doctrins are more questioned, and hav to be oftener defended against open gainsayers. Both teachers and learners go to sleep at their post as soon as there is no enemy in the field.

It is the fashion of the present time to disparage negativ logic—that which points out weaknesses in theory or errors in practice, without establishing positiv truths. Such negativ criticism would indeed be poor enough as an ultimate result; but as a means to attaining any positiv knowledge or conviction worthy the name, it cannot be valued too highly; and until people are again systematically trained to it, there will be few great thinkers, and a low general average of intellect in any but the mathematical and physical departments of speculation. On any other subject no one's opinions deserve the name of knowledge, except so far as he has either had forced upon him by others, or gone through of himself the same mental process which would hav been required of him in carrying on an activ controversy with opponents. That, therefore, which when absent, it is so indispensable, but so difficult to create, how worse than absurd is it to forego, when spontaneously offering itself! If there are any persons who contest a received opinion, or who will do so if law or opinion will let them, let us thank them for it, open our minds to listen to them, and rejoice that there is some one to do for us what we otherwise ought, if we hav any regard for either the certainty or the vitality of our convictions, to do with much greater labor for ourselvs.

Still Believe in Hell.

In his magnificent tribute to the late Henry Ward Beecher, Colonel Ingersoll drew a true picture of the orthodox Calvinistic home of seventy years ago. He described such a home as a "Puritan penitentiary—a prison with very narrow and closely-grated windows. Under its walls were the rayless, hopeless, and measureless dungeons of the damned, and on its roof fell the shadow of God's eternal frown. In this prison the creed and catechism were primers for children, and from a pure sense of duty their loving hearts were stained and scarred with the religion of John Calvin. In those days," he said, "the home of an orthodox minister was an inquisition in which babes were tortured for the good of their souls. Children then, as now, rebelled against the infamous absurdities and cruelties of the creed. No Calvinist was ever able, unless with blows, to answer the questions of his child. Children were raised in what was called 'the nurture and admonition of the Lord'—that is to say, their wills were broken or subdued, their natures deformed and dwarfed, their desires defeated or destroyed, and their development arrested or perverted. Life was robbed of its spring, its summer, and its autumn. Children stepped from the cradle into the snow. No laughter, no sunshine, no joyous, free, unburdened days. God, an infinit detectiv, watched them from above, and Satan, with malicious leer, was waiting for their souls below."

A correspondent of the Evening Post, recognized by the Independent as the "son of Dr. Codman, the famous preacher of Dorchester, Mass., in the early part of the century," declares that Colonel Ingersoll's description is substantially true, as he remembers his father's teachings and those of his neighbor. Dr. Storrs, of Braintree. He writes:

"As children, we were often overshadowed by the assemblages of the 'Suffolk and Norfolk county associations,' and I do not believe that any of those men were hypocrits. Dr. Storrs, of Braintree, father of the present Dr. Storrs, of Brooklyn, was one of them. He often came to Dorchester on an exchange. He was a fearfully eloquent preacher. In his excitement he would pound the Bible and thrash the cushion with a vehemence that was terrible as the doctrins he enforced. He would picture the danger of the unregenerate soul, the death-bed of the sinner, the day of judgment, the writhing of the damned in the lake of fire and brimstone, with all the power of his oratory, with shouting voice and with glaring eyes. Had he not been preaching against the devil, we would hav supposed that the devil himself was in the pulpit. When Dr. Storrs, Dr. Beecher, Dr. Finney, or any of these terrible men came home to dine, and cracked their jokes at the table, what wonder was it that we poor little children who had just been frightened by them nearly to death wondered 'how they could?' That was indeed a mystery.'"

Mr. Codman's verification of Colonel Ingersoll's description of an orthodox home moves the Independent to grief, and it belabors him for his apostasy from the church:

"But the real burden of 'J. C.'s' complaint against the home of his father and mother is just this, that they told him solemnly and with tears, so as to fill his young mind with awe, that if he did not repent and be converted, he would go to hell. He does not like it. We do. We hold that it is good, sound, healthful teaching. Every religion has taught it. . . . Let a man once get it engraved deep in his soul that obedience and consecration are rewarded with heaven, and selfishness is punished with hell—that will be a creed to expand a boy's soul with the infinities and the eternities; it teaches him that to be a Christian is to hav the spirit of a hero and a martyr. Such a teaching does not make dwarfs and cowards; it makes men. Dr. Codman's son does not like it; we do."

Those who fondly believe that the idea of hell has been eradicated from the average human mind will experience a shock to their optimistic views in these words of the Independent, the leading religious literary journal of the country, to quote from its prospectus. It is evident, however, that the Congregationalists are still lingering along the pathway of mental progress, looking back with comforting thoughts to the place described by Dr. Watts as one of

> "Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
> Tormenting racks and fiery coals,
> And darts to inflict immortal pains,
> Dyed in the blood of damnèd souls."

They keep its memory warm, and no doubt hav picked out the people who will walk therein, "burning continually, yet unconsumed," as ancient Pollock put it. And not only do they believe in hell, but they hold the belief to be good and sound and healthful, calculated to expand souls with "the infinities and eternities." They vehemently deny that the devil is dead, nor will they admit that calling the place sheol has taken one degree from the heat of hell's flames. Such stubbornness must command the respect accorded to mules, but the Congregationalists cannot expect the intelligent portion of the world to view them with any great amount of admiration.

It is evident, too, that there is still a vast expanse of missionary ground for Freethinkers to work in.

A Proposed Legal Robbery.

The Atchison correspondent of the Kansas City Times, quoted by Lucifer, writes to his paper as follows:

"The $50.000 for the Lutheran college will probably be raised by general taxation, as a monster petition requesting the mayor and council to make the levy has been prepared."

The constitution of Kansas contains this clause:

". . . Nor shall any person be compelled to attend or support any form of worship, nor shall any control of, or interference with, the rights of conscience be permitted, nor any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship."

It may be that this clause is not broad enough to prevent the consummation of the outrage foreshadowed by the Times correspondent, but if not, the courts would probably prevent a general tax levy for the benefit of one sect. Such a tax is clearly contrary to the spirit of the constitution, if not to its letter. It would be simply legal robbery.

McGlynn and His Church.

Edward McGlynn, the excommunicated priest, is a very different man from Edward McGlynn, the pastor of the rich and populous parish of St. Stephen's. It is well that this is so. As a member of the Roman machine Mr. McGlynn's mouth was sealed. Now that he is liberated, as he puts it, he can disclose the purposes and crafty measures of that machine. His speech at the Academy of Music on the evening of the day that his excommunication was made public is a ringing arraignment of the Roman Catholic church, and a revelation of some of its inside political workings. Mr. McGlynn claims still to be a Catholic—a better Catholic than the pope himself—and we cannot, therefore, congratulate him as heartily as we would; but for his exposure of the priests of his faith he deserves well at the hands of those who are laboring for a truly secular government. Every man who opposes the Roman hierarchy is a benefactor of his race.

The policy of the Roman machine, said Mr. McGlynn, is prompted by the desire to restore the temporal power of the church. To accomplish this the pope would dicker with the devil himself, and sell the liberty of every Catholic in the world. It is with that purpose in his mind that the pope has sent two prelates to England to trade off Ireland for a papal embassador at Victoria's court; it was for that purpose that the Vatican supported Bismarck at the last German election; and it was to aid that scheme that a German-American bishop of this country was offered the archbishopric of St. Louis if he could arrange for a papal representativ at Washington.

"As long as the Catholic people," said Mr. McGlynn, "whether of Ireland, or of America, or of Germany, or of Poland, practically giv the pope to understand that he can do what he pleases, not merely in the way of defining the doctrins of the church, but in the way of interfering in their policy and politics, and pulling the strings; sometimes, as in Germany, allowing priests not only to take an activ part in politics but to sit in parliament, or, as in France, allowing cardinals, bishops, and priests to sit in the assembly, and to become permanent members of the upper house; and again, when it suits him, permitting an archbishop to dare to say to an American citizen that he must never in the future make a political speech of any character whatever, or to attend any political meeting whatsoever, without the permission of the sacred congregation of the propaganda, an Italian institution some thousands of miles away, run by men who do not know but that Florida is a suburb of New York, or Mobile the name of a street in San Francisco—as long, I say, as the Catholic people of Ireland, of America, of Poland, or of Germany consent to let the Roman machine, of which the pope himself is but a mere puppet, do all that, so long will this Roman machine, with the pope at its head, continue to use poor Paddy, and the poor American Catholic, and the poor Polish fool, and the poor German fool as so many pawns on the political chessboard, to be sacrificed at any time for whatever can be got in return."

Mr. McGlynn never sympathized with this policy of the church, nor with the attempts to isolate the Catholics of the country by educating their children in parochial schools. He believes in separating church and state, and maintaining the independence of each from the other. The policy of the church, in Catholic countries, has, he says, ruined the faith of the people, until now "it is a notorious fact that religion is vanishing from nearly every part of the world; that men who are naturally religious are being alienated from the churches, and, perhaps, more from the Catholic church than any other. In so-called Catholic countries," he continues, "you will find a peculiarily satanic hatred of religion—pope, bishop, creed, and church—that you will find scarcely anywhere else. Go to Catholic countries and you find that the gown of the priest is hated as something unclean. You will find that a priest can get all the room he wants in a railway carriage by simply exhibiting himself and his gown and shovel hat at the door of the compartment. It is not because of the great reverence they hav for his reverence, but that they hate the mere sight of him, that men will crowd into another compartment or another carriage rather than be compelled to ride in the same one with him." These are harsh words, but they are true, and Mr. McGlynn confesses that the facts they disclose are not new to him.

Considering the reasons why he was removed from St. Stephen's parish, Mr. McGlynn said:

"First, they wanted to make an example of the man who kept his engagement in Chickering Hall, so that all priests might know that no man among them might make a speech without the permission and consent of the archbishop, so that the archbishop should hav the unquestioned control of all his priestly 'subjects.' It was a precedent that would diminish the value and the quantity of the goods that he might occasionally wish to deliver to one or another political party. It is told on unquestioned authority that the archbishop was eager to send for a prominent Democrat to assure him that Dr. McGlynn had been inhibited from making speeches during the political campaign. It is a matter of public record that his vicar-general, Preston, wrote to Mr. Joseph O'Donoghue a letter which was distributed before the doors of churches; and poor fools of Catholics who read it said, 'Oh, I was going to vote for George, but that won't do now; that is going against the church.'

"Well, the next charge was McGlynn wouldn't build a parochial school. One of the councilors had the charity to speak up and say, 'Has Dr. McGlynn ever been asked or instructed to build a parochial school?' 'No,' said the archbishop, 'no, he shouldn't be allowed to build one; he is not methodical enough; he shouldn't be allowed to build one.'

"Then the next charge was general financial failure. That charge came about four years too late. I confess that I never did take the view of the priesthood that the impersonation of all the cardinal and theological virtues in one was the ability to squeeze money out of the people, but to a large portion of these ecclesiastical gentry the sum of all virtues to-day is to be called a financier—the one merit that makes a pastor, a vicar-general, and an archbishop. It is a strange thing that St. Paul, who names about a dozen virtues which should characterize a bishop, actually omitted financiering. St. Paul never was a financier.

"But the one reason why I was suspended by Archbishop Corrigan (unless he is a fool or a liar) is that I taught the doctrin that God made the land for the people, and that I refused to retract it. I do refuse to retract it! And I was suspended from my ministry for that and no other reason."

Whether Mr. McGlynn is right or wrong in his social opinions makes no difference in the verdict which must be rendered against his church in this matter. It is sufficient that that church has placed itself on record as against the teaching of any new political economy, and in so doing has disclosed its own political ambitions and designs. Mr. McGlynn may not be another Martin Luther, but he has placed the people of this city under great obligations to him for his sacrifices.

It is, however, safe to say that the Roman church will go on trading votes for dollars and power just the same as heretofore.

Real Christian Teaching.

The Christian Evangelist of St. Louis says:

"The pursuit of happiness is not an 'inalienable right,' nor a right of any sort. We are here to do our duty, not to seek our pleasure. Happiness is not a lawful aim of life. Neither is it an attainable aim. He who sets out to be happy is doomed to disappointment and misery. The pursuit of happiness is a wild goose chase. You can never come up with it. The most fleet of foot are always outstripped in this fond pursuit. To him who turns aside from this hopeless chase for pleasure and plods on in duty's narrow path, happiness may sometimes come, to bear him company. But we cannot run her down, though we speed after her with flying feet. Not only is duty before pleasure, but there is no real pleasure except in the pursuit of duty."

This is the morality of the Christian religion strictly applied. But what an inhuman religion is that which denounces happiness as unlawful and unattainable! It is the religion of the brakes and jungles, of the caves and dens, of savagery and animalism.

It is well that the world disagrees with theology in its moral as in its scientific teaching.

"Partisan" Warfare.

In the Winsted Press of last week, Dr. M. E. Lazarus, writing under the name of Edgeworth, has an article on "Puritanic Despotisms," dealing principally with the efforts of Comstock to suppress "obscenity." About the middle of the article we find this:

"From this obscenity pretext of persecution, it has been an easy step to revive the obsolete laws against blasphemy, and we find in New Jersey Mr. Reynolds, a 'Freethought Infidel' lecturer of fair moral reputation, and who had not exceeded the usual license of his school in making light of scriptural authorities, imprisoned, tried, and fined. Such legislation in the neighbor state, New York, would extinguish THE TRUTH SEEKER, and put clerical bits on a number of other organs more or less 'Liberal,' which means anti-biblical, and nothing more. Yet it is pretended that the United States has divorced state from church. The suppression of THE TRUTH SEEKER would not in itself retard the emancipation of thought, that organ being enslaved to the principles of arbitrary authority, and waging merely a partisan warfare; but the power which would suppress it would be inquisitorial and fatal to other evolutions of thought; it would be a church censorship."

While giving Dr. Lazarus full credit for his love of liberty, we cannot help thinking that his criticism of THE TRUTH SEEKER is prompted by the fact that during a period of many months in which he wrote us numberless letters, he failed to induce us to subscribe to his creed of Anarchy. But in stating that we are "enslaved to the principles of arbitrary authority," Dr. Lazarus has gone beyond the confines of fact, and is roaming in the imaginativ field of fiction.

That we are waging a partisan warfare is admitted. We believe in partisanship—of the right kind—and we respect every earnest man who is doing what he can to advance the cause he holds dearest. Dr. Lazarus himself is a partisan, and a very zealous one. In fact, the Anarchist partisans, while thinking that they alone are mentally broad enough to surround all truth, are about the narrowest and most intolerant of all partisans. If a person is not long enough to fit their bed, they stretch him out; if too short, they cut him off. If they cannot then make him fit, they throw him away.

With this it is not our wish just now to quarrel. So long as their intolerance is confined to words, they are within the moral law. We do object, however, to Dr. Lazarus's attempt to pitchpole a carload or two of odium upon us because we are not just the kind of a partisan he is. Our party, our champion, our leader, is Liberty—liberty for everyone to think as he pleases, to express that thought, and to act as he pleases, so long as he infringes upon no other person's equal right, and commits no act to curtail others' equal liberty. The cause of freedom is our cause, and in fighting for that cause we confess to partisanship. But we cannot agree with everyone for whom our principles demand toleration, and because we cannot admit that social chaos is the shortest cut to social order, it is manifestly unfair to say that we are enslaved to the principles of arbitrary authority. Such authority we are constantly opposing, and shall continue to oppose, though all the Anarchist writers in the country sit around and condemn.

Discrediting Miracles.

The editor of the Christian Advocate is evidently losing faith in the miracles of the Bible, for in answer to a query from a correspondent whether he "supposes" that Lazarus remembered "his experience in the other world," Mr. Buckley somewhat impatiently says:

"We suppose that Lazarus did not remember his experience in the other world, because we suppose that he was dead in the same sense that a man who is drowned is dead before he is brought to life, and that he never would hav come to life without our Lord's voice or some miraculous power; but that he was dead in the sense that his spirit was permanently and entirely free from the body we don't suppose, and therefore we suppose he did not know anything during the interval."

If Lazarus was only experiencing a period of suspended animation, then his resuscitation was no miracle. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER once assisted in rescuing a drowning policeman of this city, whose "raising from the dead" required several physicians, a quantity of morphine, and about a pint of whisky. It is rather belittling to the claims made for Christ to put that morphine and whisky on a level with "our Lord's voice or some miraculous power." If Lazarus was not dead, then there was no miracle. If he was dead—well, we doubt the miracle anyway.

It is painful to note the purely materialistic view Mr. Buckley takes of the matter. Were he a different sort of a man, however, we should rejoice at his conversion.

A RESOLUTION was passed at the Fall River meeting of the Massachusetts Knights of Labor instructing delegates to the coming Minneapolis convention of the Knights to refuse to accept the resignation of T. V. Powderly from his present office of general master workman. The Rev. Jesse H. Jones, delegate from Abingdon, spoke in favor of the resolution. "He vividly pictured the demoralizing effect of the dethronement of Mr. Powderly upon the Catholic members of the order, and fervently urged the delegates to retain him, and thus prevent the election of a radical, who might antagonize the religious element." It is wonderful how much conciliation and consideration the "religious element" needs. The religious sentiment of the community must not be wounded, the faith of our fathers must be respected, the piety of honest Christians must not be shocked! But who, in this world, ever heard of respecting or considering the feelings of the radicals? The Rev. Jesse H. Jones, delegate from Abingdon, is a foolish man. Powderly has already irreparably damaged the Knights of Labor by selling them out to the Catholic church, the arch enemy of the people, and if he is retained in office it will not be five years before the order will be wrecked.

THE following dispatch from Chicago, dated July 18th, needs no comment to make the cruelty of professional Christian charity-mongers apparent: "Robert G. Ferguson, aged twelve years, of La Grange, who has been confined in a 'Christian home' at Humboldt Park for some time, was found on the street yesterday with iron shackles on his feet. He says there were at the Home five other boys besides himself. They were fed on potatoes and water, each boy receiving a certain allowance three times a day provided he had not been unruly. Robert said he stood the treatment a few days, and then escaped and trudged home. His father at once sent him back. On his arrival, the Rev. Mr. Arnold, who is in charge of the place, chained him in an upstairs room and put him on half rations. He was kept there four days, and was then released on promising good behavior. That night he once more started for La Grange, but was caught and again chained in the room. This time he was kept in the shackles ten days. Yesterday, while Arnold was at church, Robert, with the assistance of the other boys, escaped to the street, where he was found."

Newspaper Notes.

THE semi-monthly Plaindealer is a little magazine published by Francis Graves, of Hastings, Mich. It is boldly Infidel in tendency, and the last issue is embellished with several quaint specimens of the wood-engraver's art. Mr. Graves will please accept our acknowledgment of the courtesies to THE TRUTH SEEKER contained therein.

THE Melbourne, Australia, Liberator has been prosecuted several times by the government, but Mr. Symes, the editor, has thus far been triumphant. He announces, however, that another case is being prepared against him, though whether for blasphemy or sedition he knows not. The Liberator is a sledge-hammer enemy of Christianity and hereditary rulers, and bothers the parsons and Australian government not a little. Its editor is a vigorous fighter, who never runs.

THE Spiritualist journals, Light in the West, Spiritual Offering, Light for Thinkers, Current Fact, and Mind and Matter are all dead, and from their ashes—quite a goodly heap—rises The Better Way, published at Cincinnati, Ohio. Messrs. M. G. Youmans and I. S. McCracken seem to be the head and front of the new paper, which, with more experience by its publishers, promises to be a valuable defender of the Spiritualistic faith.

THERE are quite a number of Anarchists in Melbourne, Australia, of the philosophical sort, and they publish a twelve-page monthly, called Honesty. There is no dynamite in it, but much forcible writing. Its contributors are principally Freethinkers, who hav turned their attention to social subjects, and become converts to the extreme individualistic views of Michael Bakounine and Herbert Spencer. They are hot-headedly wrong, like our loved friend Tucker, but they are able, and we read them with interest.

Special Notice to the Liberals of the West.

FRIENDS AND CO-WORKERS: Having recovered from a severe sickness, which, having reduced me in flesh, has only intensified my energy and persistency, I intend making an extended lecture tour to the far West. I shall start early in September.

Never was there greater need of vigilance and united effort on the part of all Liberals, not alone to defeat the open, as well as the insidious, attacks of priestcraft, but that friends and neighbors may be disabused of the misrepresentations of the clergy in regard to our aims and objects. Once induce the intelligent to investigate, instruct them in the noble principles of Liberalism, and their prejudice would change to admiration.

It is a duty we owe ourselvs, as well as our friends and neighbors, to afford them an opportunity to know what Liberalism really teaches, to educate them in the grand truth that the practice of justice and mercy insures our own happiness while promoting that of others; that Infidels do not destroy any incentivs to good, but by precept and example urge all to liv lives of love, truth, and benevolence; that we earnestly and constantly strive to attain heaven in our own homes, here and now, working out our own salvation, fearlessly, by diligence in the acquirement of knowledge that shall save ourselvs and loved ones from the dread and inevitable penalties of ignorance of nature's laws; doing right from love of right and our fellow-creatures, not from fear of hell or for the mere hope of receiving a crown and harp in some mythical heaven of the clouds.

Our main dependence to accomplish the work must ever be the Liberal printing press. In no way can we so easily and effectivly advance the cause as by obtaining new subscribers—cash in advance—to our Liberal papers and magazines. Very many are induced to read after their interest has been aroused by the lectures or consequent discussion after a lecture. I shall, as heretofore, carry a supply of our best Liberal books and pamphlets, and use every exertion to procure subscriptions to our Liberal periodicals. Shall be glad to correspond with friends who hav clean back numbers of our Liberal papers or magazines which they are willing to donate, conditional on their being carefully and effectivly distributed.

If those desiring lectures in their vicinity will make an effort, they will be surprised at the ease with which success can be secured. Ever remember if you can induce the intelligent to once commence investigation—to read and study the subject—you become their redeemer from the cruel bonds of superstition.

Reader, will you kindly help me and the cause by arranging for one, two, or more lectures in your vicinity?

I am quite willing to go to the smallest and most out-of-the-way places. Am not particular. Will lecture in palatial opera house or old barn; in picturesque grove or public square; wherever the people who desire to hear will assemble, that is the place I desire especially to speak in. Do not worry about terms. I will make terms suit.

Now, don't lay this paper down and say, "If I was in Blank's place I would," etc.; nor sigh, "It is too bad we cannot hav him here to giv us a course of lectures." Exert yourself! Call on your Liberal friends; start subscription papers; secure a hall or some available place, and then write me at once for dates. Make one earnest effort. Attend to it at once!

I expect to be in Illinois during September—probably in that vicinity till after the Congress of the American Secular Union in November; then westward, ho! lecturing on to California and the Pacific coast.

Letters addressed, care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette Place, will always be promptly forwarded to me. But do not wait till I am on the road. Write me at your earliest, and address

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Letters from Friends.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., July 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to notice in one of your recent issues that Mr. J. M. Jamison, who endeavored to make you believe that you were an Anarchist, has discovered his mistake. Mr. Jamison must hav read your paper between the lines, otherwise he would hav replied to you, and taken up your challenge, and got the reward which you hav offered. RICHARDSON.

BOWLING GREEN, KY., July 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As I am a searcher after the mysteries of the Bible, will you or some of your readers explain this scriptural point found in Hebrews xiii, 8: "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever?"

Now, if this be the case, what is the use of prayer? It is useless to ask him to do something he intended doing from all eternity, and it is useless to ask him to do something he never intended to do. Please explain. J. H. PILAND.

NEWPORT, ME., July 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You speak my mind exactly when you say, "No Freethinker should suffer himself to be spoken to by Braden. The miserable scoundrel should be left severely alone."

It is demoralizing to associate with such people. Braden is a Christian, and should stay in the Christian fold where he belongs. I thank Mr. Remsburg for his course.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

NEWARK, N. J., July 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: One of our most earnest workers, one who was devoted to the Freethought and labor movements, an earnest and indefatigable worker in behalf of Liberalism, has departed from life. On July 13th, Cornelius A. Marshall, president of the Newark Liberal League, died of a hemorrhage of the lungs. He had been in feeble health for some time, and gradually grew worse until last Wednesday, when he passed away peacefully and quietly. The Liberal League holds appropriate memorial services on Sunday, July 24th, T. B. Wakeman speaking. G. G.

EOLA, OR., June 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to pay my subscription for the year. I delayed some, expecting to get up a little club. Money is scarce here at present. I hope to be able to send you some new subscribers this fall. We hav a good many here that are friends of ours, and I think will soon become patrons of yours. I had the pleasure of taking in on last Sunday evening an able lecture, delivered by our worthy and esteemed friend Samuel P. Putnam, on the new Heaven he proposes to help build on this Earth. He seems to be just the man for that mission. He is doing it in a way that the clergy cannot take exception to. He is still with us, and will speak again on Friday, July 1st. A. STRAIN.

WILSEY, KAN., July 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: For the benefit of some good Christians, please giv the name and account of the man that John Calvin mistreated so cruelly. Giv full account, if possible, as they deny it being a matter of fact and history. Others read your paper after I get through with it, and combined we do much to open the eyes of some who claim Christianity is all there is in good. J. S. LICHTY.

[We hav several times published the account of John Calvin's cruel mistreatment of Michael Servetus, and cannot at present find room for another reprint of it. If Mr. Lichty will procure the book by D. M. Bennett called, "The Champions of the Church," he will find what he wants, and much other information about the infernal works of the Christian church and clergy.—ED. T. S.]

SANTA FE, N. M., July 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I met with an intelligent miner, and a close observer of facts, during many months' residence in old Mexico, where nineteen-twentieths of the population are Roman Catholics, and where priestly influence is paramount to civil law. He relates a case that overshadows all the romances in the Decameron of Boccacio, and leaves Mormonism to learn of the pope. There resides in the town of Battepelis, near the boundaries of the states of Sinaloa and Chiahuah, a priest who is the reputed father of seventy children, the mothers of them ranging in age from fourteen to forty-five, a number pointed out being beautiful women.

In South America these lecherous priests will go into the drawing-room of a wealthy family, and select one of the daughters to show her a vision of the Holy Ghost. Fear of priestly influence commands obedience, and the crime is silenced. In Mexico, previous to marriage, the bride is anointed, a custom quite as beastly as that practiced by the Mormons, a priest officiating with licentious ceremonies. Can there rest a hope for that misguided woman to lead and liv a virtuous life? She finds it convenient to confess her sins just as often as she is tempted by her confessor to commit one.

Peon slavery, abolished by law, from ignorance and poverty, is now many degrees more objectionable than slavery as it existed previous to the Rebellion. They receive as wages in placer gold mines one real per day, not in the virgin gold they extract from mother earth, but in beans, corn, and salt. Americans caught short of money receive no more than two reals, or twenty-five cents per day, wages. Men of money and energy hav opportunities for money-making equal to those of the states. Fannie Ward, a fine correspondent in the employ of the Mexican Central Railroad Company, writes most beautiful rose-colored reports of Mexican character. As her sex forbids her seeing crime in its many forms, she cannot write facts on matters pertinent to emigration to Mexico. The truth, written by Fannie Ward, would be objectionable to the big corporation which pays her to write exclusively in the interest of Mexico. While Romanism is surely on the decline in Mexico, education, intermarriage with Caucasians, and time will induce the masses to exercise the liberty of thought.

HUGH L. MCILVAIN.

CANYON CITY, July 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Awhile ago I met Mr. M. on the sidewalk, who said: Mr. P., I don't see as you hav any starting-point in your religious views.

P. Hav you?

M. Yes.

P. Well, I will make you a proposition, and see if we can start alike; and first, is it conceivable that there ever was a time when there was nothing?

M. No.

P. Then it is conceivable that something must hav been eternal?

M. Yes.

P. Is that your starting-point?

M. Yes.

P. That is mine. So you see we start at the same point. Now, let us remember that what is eternal cannot be accounted for. It cannot be asked, Who made it? nor, Where did it come from? There everybody must stop or knock his brains out against an impenetrable wall, impervious even to spirits. Now, on the next question, What is that eternal something? we may divide.

M. God is that eternal something.

P. Now, notice that all the means we hav of knowing anything are our senses. These are physical organs by which we apprehend physical forces. What we apprehend through these senses is real; what is suggested to the brain through these senses is ideal. Now, please tell what you know about God, for you must know something of him before you can assert anything of him.

M. Well, I don't know anything of him.

P. Then you cannot tell anything about him, not even assert his existence?

M. Well, what do you say is eternal?

P. Matter—the substance of the universe; and all I know is about matter. I hear, see, smell, and feel matter. These all assert the reality of matter. Whereas God is simply an ideal, an inference from what you see. You pray to an ideal God, and the answers you get are of the same sort.

M. But who do you think made the world?

P. Who do you think made what is eternal? The world is a formation from eternal matter, and everybody knows that matter is changing from form to form all the time. We know matter exists, and that is more than you can say of what you call God; and you are required to believe he exists. All the gods that were ever named existed on the same principle—faith.

Science consists in the knowledge of matter, its forces and mechanical principles.

Matter is known to exist in some sixty-four simple elements, which are constantly changing by infinit evolutions.

But you call your God good, and of infinit love and mercy. To prove that, would you quote the destructiv tornadoes and earthquakes that destroy so many thousands in a few minutes of persons beloved with infinit love?

My friend, if I were going by your house, and saw it on fire, with your wife and children in imminent danger, with ample means to save them, and did not, would you quote me among your friends? I say, No, sir—never.

A. B. PIKARD.

GOODWYNSVILLE, VA., June 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: After reading your issue of the 25th, I can't resist the temptation to scold a little. I love THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I hav nothing but the kindest regards for all of its friends. Therefore it bothers me when I read in "our paper" such sentiments as are expressed in your editorial, "Virginia," of the 25th, and in "The Reminiscences of a Reformer." It may be reformation, or in the interest of reform, to sleep with and associate with negroes, but, as Beecher said of the "fall of man," it is reformation downward. Having been reared with negroes, and having lived all of my life with them, I think I know something of them, and I must say, if I know anything about the negro, Mrs. Colman does not. I hav never seen Fred Douglass, but I will venture to say if he is a genuin negro, you can no more "reform" him from filth, faith, and fanaticism than you can change the spots of a leopard. Now, I know you will say, "Hates the damn nigger," but come down to Petersburg and drive out in Dinwiddie a few miles, and ask the first negro you meet, "Who is your friend of all friends?" and probably he will say, "The Infidel of Goodwynsville." I reckon Mrs. Colman would call Nat Turner a martyr, as she seems to think old John Brown was. She perhaps classes them with Lincoln, and the defenders of their homes with the infamous Booth. I thought THE TRUTH SEEKER was a Liberal paper, not a bloody-shirt organ.

"Virginia"—well, are not the district-attorneys sworn to do as they hav done in this case? That tale about the churning milk "all day," and the "most intelligent farm-wives," is too thin. Now, I will bet you a new subscriber it is not so. Of course I know you would not publish anything you had any idea was not true, but I must think you hav been imposed upon in this milk tale. People don't churn all day often. I think it a little uncalled-for to abuse the "most intelligent" farm-wives of Virginia in this way, simply because Mrs. Slenker has violated a national law, and has to take the consequences. If Mrs. Slenker has sent such nasty and vulgar language through the mails as the papers say she has, she ought to be punished, as well as those who send the nasty Bible. I think you brethren up North ought to pluck the motes out of your own eyes. Go to work and repeal your own bad laws. There is no blasphemy law in Virginia.

Now, let me tell you how to "run the paper" (and of course you will do as I say). When you want to abuse everybody that does not think as you do, south of the Mason and Dixon line, just don't do it, but giv that space to John Peck, George Macdonald, or some one else that will write Infidel "truck." Giv the place devoted to "Reminiscences" to that fellow who was in your office when the parson who is "telling tales out of school" called.

Very truly yours, GEO. W. BAUM.

HANOVERTON, July 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As I feel it a duty incumbent on some one to apprise you of the death of another of Nature's noblemen, and fearing no other will attend to it, I send this obituary.

We attended the funeral of our friend and brother George Freed, of East Rochester, yesterday. Mr. Freed received a kick in the abdomen from a colt, which caused his death in a few days. It is a sad affair. Mr. Freed was a man of more than ordinary moral worth. Born and reared within remote environments, yet at an early day he got a glimpse of the sunshine of mental life, which always lent its luster to illuminate his path. Mr. Freed denounced slavery when it was exceedingly unpopular so to do, and was much persecuted by the self-styled God's people when rotten eggs were the most potent argument they could bring against freedom. It did not take him long to dispose of the Bible. He was a great admirer of D. M. Bennett, whose portrait adorns the walls of his parlor. He was in full sympathy with Elmina, having always been an advocate of the doctrin for which she was arrested. Cutting it short, he was an excellent man, always in a good humor and cheerful, and the first to minister to the poor and alleviate suffering.

He was a very successful agriculturist; kept his farm in the best of trim, and yet he found time to read enough to keep his mind stored with useful knowledge; was always abreast with the times. He had no enemies; he won the respect of all, and got it. He responded when Mr. Lincoln called for troops, and served in the Union army. Mr. Freed was a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was sixty-seven years old. He died as he lived, calm, peaceful, and resigned, without fear. J. T. JOHNSON.

MIDDLE FALLS, N. Y., July 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: If I were not one of the most patient of men, long-suffering and not disheartened under difficulties, I fear I should despair of ever getting Mr. Pikard to correctly quote me; but line upon line and precept upon precept may in time work such a desirable result. Mr. Pikard does not seem to understand that in the table I gave, each of those sounds marked with a figure is to be a letter in the new alphabet proposed, and that in the combination of letters following, illustrated by familiar examples, I hav tried to giv the names of those new letters. Thus the first letter is pronounced ay, the second ah, and so on. It does not follow because I grouped these new letters under the vowels with which they had chiefly been associated that I meant them as only different applications of the preceding letters—far from it; each of these numbers signifies a distinct letter, which is as yet lacking in our alphabet, but ought to be supplied. Remembering this, how Mr. Pikard can accuse me of spelling knowledge with an a and an e passes my comprehension. I stated distinctly that I would spell the word n (1) l (4) j (see table in my last letter), and then because these sounds came next after a and e he jumps to the conclusion that I am using those letters, only pronouncing them differently. No, no, Mr. Pikard, I don't use a or e at all in the word, but two new letters, pronounced ah and eh, for the second and fourth sound respectivly. Cannot Mr. Pikard say n ah l eh j? Then he has spelled the word knowledge as now pronounced. Further on he says, "Mr. Bodge says my spelling of hav, giv, and liv is spurious reform, and yet he spells them just as I do." How unreasonable Mr. Pikard can be! He spells give, giv, and I spell it g(6)v, or, in other words, the middle sound is the new letter, pronounced ih, like the sound of the letter i as now used in this word by Mr. Pikard, but it is not i, for I use a separate character for each vowel sound. Now will it be claimed by Mr. Pikard that I spell the word just as he does?

It seems to me that I hav now made my system as plain as it can possibly be, and that Mr. Pikard ought not to be longer in doubt as to how I would spell any word. I would be pleased to see his proposed system in THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I hav given mine, that we may see wherein we differ, or why it is that we shall think alike "when I come to understand the subject." I am a trifle amused at his going so far in his zeal as to change our family name at his own sweet will, and the name of our post-office also. His last letter to me was liable to hav been sent to the dead-letter office on account of his unauthorized change in the address. I would explain to Mr. Pikard that the authority of the spelling reform is not expected to extend over family names and proper nouns.

I desire to acknowledge the receipt of a communication from Professor Jamieson, from his new home in the lovely San Luis Park, but, alas! the pleasure of perusing it is denied me, as I hav never learned shorthand. Doubtless the professor naturally concluded that I was familiar with the system from my advocating a system of spelling based on the use of a separate letter for each vowel sound. I believe Mr. Jamieson is himself the originator of a system of shorthand superior to the one most in use.

In connection with the friendly discussion between Mr. Pikard and myself, I see that the Maine freak has slopped over in one of his characteristic effusions. Some people are hoggish in their desires; others are more modest in their demands. The Maine freak belongs to the latter class. Some people want the earth; he only wants THE TRUTH

SEEKER. Not finding room enough in his own little paper with the big name to air his ignorance, he would fain hav the writers for THE TRUTH SEEKER stand back and giv him their room wherein to slander little girls' pet cats and dogs, or deprecate the non-adjournment of the Manhattan Liberal Club to scuttle and sink Mr. Astor's yacht. I do not recollect of ever having met or exchanged a word with this ranter that he should thus turn his pop-gun battery in my direction, but I hav heard that freaks are given to sudden ebullitions of temper without any assignable cause, and I suppose the Maine specimen is no exception to the rule.

D. LOUIS BODGE.

BOSTON, MASS., July 12, 287.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to Brother Koezly's last, I respectfully submit that his idea of putting grave questions in mathematics out to editors and lawyers to settle is indeed rich, nearly equal, in fact, to his way of computing the lapse of time.

What need has the world of any professional mathematicians if other professions can do their work just as well? And now, if he will just drop a few lines to the principal professor of mathematics, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., he will soon be on the high-road to knowledge.

Cordially yours, GEO. N. HILL.

WELLESLEY, MASS., July 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed bill for books, etc., sent you on June 20th. Thank you for the order.

Will you please send to Mrs. Slenker or to the Defense Committee, to be used in her behalf, $5 of this amount, and charge to my account. I should be glad to hav it sent as soon as possible. I hav too long neglected it already, but I hav been very much hurried of late.

Shame on a government when its people are compelled to defend themselvs against its unrighteous enactments and its malicious assaults! Shame on a government when it fosters villainy and makes the love of truth of no account, and the desire for knowledge a crime! ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON.

NEW CASTLE, WASH. TERR., July 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received the war call and the command to haste to the front from our noble and energetic lecturer, Samuel P Putnam, and, by all means, I guess we must obey orders and take up arms and onward to the fight. The father from Rome has sent some of his most worthy embassadors here already to gather all the lambs to the fold for safe-keeping while the devil, Putnam, will be around roaring and seeking whom he may devour. But for all that we expect a crowded house waiting him when he comes. I can assure you that there is a great tendency toward Liberalism here, and by the time we renew our subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER I expect to get five or six new names to add to the list of truth seekers. Two of our most energetic workers here hav left—Mr. I. P. Calhoun has gone to Tacoma, and Mr. John Farley has gone for a visit to his fatherland, Sweden—both subscribers to the noble TRUTH SEEKER.

Some of your correspondents must be laboring under some delusion or other when they name our noble Ingersoll for the next president. Do they think that the millennium is that near, or is the age of wonders to commence in 1888? Sure enough it would be a year of jubilee for all Freethinkers if such a thing should happen; anyway, we must hope for the future. You shall hear from this place again after Putnam has been here. JENKIN MORGAN.

BRADFORD, PA., June 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you $1, which you will please place to my credit.

I see by the press reports that the Seybert Spiritual Investigating Committee of Philadelphia, Pa., hav made their report. Whatever their conclusion may be, let it be recorded and published for the benefit of humanity. The committee were composed of learned scientific men, and some of them uncompromising Spiritualists. They hav spent three years, and investigated every known phase of mediumship. They had only one object in view, and that was to ascertain if modern Spiritualism was true.

Fabulous prices hav been paid to all mediums that would come before the committee and produce proof of spirit return. Now, what will their decision be? I, for one, am anxious to know. If it turns out that anyone is not satisfied with their report, let us hav another committee, and keep on until the truth is fully established. I think Spiritualists should interest themselvs in these scientific investigations; they seem to be all kind and well-meaning people, and can't afford to be deluded. I wish some orthodox Christian would appoint a committee to investigate popular theology, and ascertain if there is one scientific truth associated with it. Giv us a few such investigations and the people will soon find that all religions and isms are born of ignorance and superstition. C. J. CURTIS.

PORT ANGELES, WASH. TERR., June 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for one year's subscription to your invaluable journal.

Our colony, I am afraid, is going to be a regular Infidel nest, as those here don't seem to hav any respect for the Sabbath and other sacred institutions whatever. I think you already know that we will be free from churches and saloons—the twin evils—in our colony, and as we will soon hav the majority of voters in the county we will be able to regulate the liquor traffic for the whole county in a short time. Our enemies say that we will be an immoral crowd, but I am not afraid to state that our community will be, and is already, superior in morality to any in this broad land of ours. The scenery of this place is the grandest I hav ever seen, and I hav seen some fine scenery before, both in Switzerland and this country, but never met such a combination of the lovely and magnificent. I hope that if any black sheep come into our fold the beautiful natural surroundings will hav a beneficient effect on their character, and assist the good example the other colonists giv them in remodeling it. Although my copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER will remain in the Colony Library from the day of its arrival here, I think you will get other private subscribers from among us,

You hav recently received several communications from Seattle societies, and also one from Dr. York expressing sorrow at the death of Mr. Daniel Crane, of Seattle. One of our trustees, Mrs. Laura E. Hall, is a daughter of Mr. Crane, and she is a "chip of the old block" in every sense of the word, never afraid to express her opinions whether these agree with that of the multitude or not; and, like her father, she will be able to say when she dies, "I hav not lived in vain."

MOLALLA, OR., July 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Three red letter days for Molalla! S. P. Putnam and the friends of religious liberty hav just closed a Liberal camp-meeting at Wright's Spring, on the Molalla. The series was conducted in a peaceable and orderly manner. Everyone was pleased. The weather was splendid. The Oregon City brass band excelled its previous records. The picnic baskets were loaded with the good things prepared by careful ladies. Two hours' talking in a grove was a severe test to the lecturer, but he was equal to the occasion, and one hundred and four names signed to a call for an auxiliary Secular Union, a temporary organization with president and secretary—the first meeting toward permanent organization to be held a week from to-day—all this, and more, is enough to show that Mr. Putnam's visit to us was a splendid success. A charter will be applied for as soon as a permanent organization is effected. Also, steps are being taken toward the erection of a hall, with library, Sunday-school, etc.

G. J. TRULLINGER, Temp. President.
R. J. DEVINE, Temp. Secretary.

LEXINGTON, KY., July 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The people are beginning to find that the human brain has been scorched, perverted, and dazzled, and the owner of it led meekly along for ages on the road to the lunatic asylum. Think of a splendid organ of thought shrunken, depolarized, clogged, and hampered with unnatural tendencies, thoughts, and intentions, which hav changed its very structure—persecution and murder being considered virtues, when God is to be defended. Christians adore their deity, while he thirsts for their blood (a savage could do no more). The horrible tortures which he knows how to avert they bear as if they were blessings, and the more they are trampled the higher is their opinion of the riches of his grace.

The laborer is expected, it seems, to be a great and successful speculator, though fortunes are often wrecked in that way. Is there no well-digested scheme in existence which could secure to the poor man the advantages which seem now only within the reach of the favored few? The present constitution of society must be swept away before the good man's dreams of the heavenly sway of justice can be realized in connection with the affairs of men. Let some genius arise whose holy sense of duty to his own race is unprecedented, who proposes restrictions to surround the monopolist of an awful and compelling character. Never hav nations manifested so great a love for liberty as the republics of Greece. The laws of Solon fed the sacred flame. Well do the Prohibitionists understand his way of assembling the people every night and teaching them. We are also requested to bring our hymn-books—the candidates for offices are such pious men. The sweetest hymns in mine were composed by John Newton on his own slave-ship, while the smothered slaves were thrown into the sea.

The women, it appears, are again reminded of man's grasp of thought, and of their own weak intuitions. Forgetting the dull and sometimes malicious articles, which are not penned by them, some facts, peculiar to them, might be spoken of in a scientific way, and this is done by our most learned and dignified savants. ALHAZA.

FROSTBURGH, MD., July 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Sitting in my room at the hotel here, I was amused at the antics of the Salvation Army on the street. After singing several of their songs, which were somewhat after the style of the plantation songs of the negroes in the days of slavery, a repetition of one or two lines with a hallelujah or a "come to Jesus" for a chorus, the flag-bearer planted himself, and the rest kneeled down in the dust around him, while one prayed to their imaginary God, his prayer being interluded with many an amen from the rest. After fifteen or twenty minutes of this, they told the crowd who surrounded them that they were now going to their hall to finish their orgies, and invited all to come with them and get acquainted with Jesus, who would save their souls. How ridiculous all this seems in these poor, ignorant, deluded mortals, and yet in half an hour after I passed a fine brick church from which issued sounds very similar—it was Sunday-school children being drilled in the same belief that God was pleased with their senseless praise! These were the children of the best citizens in the place, and the men and women training them were probably prominent people who feel they are doing their God some service in warping the minds of the innocent children.

I sometimes think how hopeless it looks—all the efforts that a few Secularists can do to stem this tide of superstition that surrounds us; with all these armies of ignorance working all the time, under different names, but all working for the same end, the enslavement of the mind of the masses. Perhaps the time was, when all men were mere savages, that religion did some good; they could be governed in no way but through fear of ghosts and witches. But the trouble is that the crafty priests find in it too much advantage to themselvs; they will not giv it up, but strain every nerve to keep the people in ignorance that they may continue to fleece them, and they are so strongly organized that it seems impossible to check them. Indeed, the Catholic organization is apparently gaining strength in all countries, especially in this—this country that is the only hope of the lover of his race, or at least was at its foundation. This country that was the hope of the world is so overrun with the wretched dupes of the pope from countries that Christianity has ruled for a thousand years, that the blessed boon of universal suffrage is turned into a curse—that boon that the founders of our government thought would be the greatest safeguard of liberty. One of them said there was no fear of untruth prevailing while truth was left free to combat it, but we now see truth overwhelmed by the hordes of ignorance that are cast upon our shores, who, with the help of the superstitious already here, can and do imprison and fine both men and women for speaking or printing their honest thought. JOHN DOWNES.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., July 17, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a prayer which I clipped from the Utica Globe. I think it is the best I ever read.

THE TRUTH SEEKER comes every week, well filled with the religion of humanity, and has become a household necessity. We conld not keep house without it. Long liv Brother Heston and the cartoons. Every Infidel should hav a picture of "The Nine Demands of Liberalism." I hav a handsome frame on mine, and it looks immense. Hoping you may liv long to dispense the great truths of science and humanity, I am, as ever, Yours without Gods or ghosts,

WM. THORPE.

A SALOON-KEEPER'S PRAYER.

At Atchison, Kan., the women crusaders visited a liquor saloon and tried, by praying, to induce the proprietor of the saloon to close his place. The proprietor invited the ladies to seats, asked them to pray, and offered himself the following prayer:

"Almighty creator! we pray thee, hav pity upon the woman here who is not grateful for thy gifts, who wants to make thy children like the beasts of the field and to compel them to drink water like an ox, while they dress extravagantly and lead their husbands by other extravagances, not tending to our well-being, to bankruptcy, depriving them of the pleasures of the world—yes, and driving them to snicide. O Lord, hav mercy upon these ladies! Look upon them; they wear not even the color of face which thou hast given them, but they are sinning against thee, and, not content with nature, paint their faces. O Lord! thou canst also perceive that their figure is not as thou hast made it, but they wear humps on their backs like camels. Thou seest, O Lord, that their head dress consists of false hair, and when they open their mouths thou seest their false teeth. O Lord! just make a note of the spiral spring and cotton batting contrivances they wear in their bosoms, for no other purpose than to make themselvs voluptuous and excite in a man a much worse passion than the use of wine, as it does in me this moment; and for the same reason they hav a No. 6 foot pinched into a No. 3 shoe, and a No 40 waist squeezed into a No. 17 corset. O Lord! these women want men who patiently accept of all this without using the power thou hast given to man that all women shall be subject to man. They will not bear the burdens of married life, obey thy commands to multiply and replenish the earth, but they are too lazy to raise their children, and, O Lord! thou knowest the crimes they commit. O Lord! hav mercy upon them and take them back into thy bosom. Take folly out of their hearts; giv them common sense, that they may see their own foolishness; and grant that they may be good and worthy citizens of our beloved city of Atchison. O Lord! we thank thee for the blessings bestowed upon us and ask thee to deliver us from all evils, especially hypocritical women, and thine shall be the praise forever and ever. Amen."

HOLDEN, MO., July 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The church is blind to truth, insensible to reason, and void of conscience. It is true of all sects of the Christian religion that, when they had the power, they would roast other Christians and heretics at the stake for differences of opinion. This is true of both Catholics and Protestants in their early history; more especially true of the Protestants, who, I think, are perhaps the worst, most intolerant, and hypocritical of all the adherents of the Christian religion. Who can study the history of that religion, with its inquisitions, kirk sessions, and witch-burnings, without being surprised at its superstitions, amused at its rites, and appalled at its crimes?

But as the people become educated, as our civilization advances, ecclesiastical power diminishes, its superstition and hypocrisy become more apparent, and its crimes less. Alas! it is not yet powerless for evil.

I am led to these reflections by reports which come to me through THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Freethinkers' Magazine of the expulsion of Louis Wolfes from Tuscarora Lodge No. 24 I. O. O. F., W. Va., for not having definit ideas of the supreme being, which he said was unknowable; for not knowing whether the supreme being made and controls the universe; for not knowing what becomes of man after death; for not believing in a personal God; for going, and encouraging others to go, to Mr. Putnam's lectures.

Now, does any member in that lodge know just what the supreme being is? Does any know by whom and how the universe was made and controled? Does any know that man will after death liv another life in another world? Does any know that God is a person? If any member of that lodge knows any one of these things, Barnum would pay a good price for him, for he could then exhibit the smartest man that ever lived.

But further and worse: After Specification 1, under which head seven questions were asked, in answer to which the "prisoner" or "culprit" did not profess as definit knowledge as his loving and charitable brothers possessed, Specification 2 was taken up, and sixteen questions were asked, almost all pertaining to his going to Mr. Putnam's lectures, indicating that that was where the rub was, and he was expelled exempli gratia.

I think that whole proceeding was unjustifiable and unfortunate. I believe in a God, but I do not believe in a personal God. I believe in some intelligent energy or entity somewhere back of all natural phenomena, but I do not know that I am right, nor do I know that any Free Mason, Odd Fellow, or anybody else who differs from my idea is wrong, for it is something about which none of us has definit and positiv knowledge, and therefore the lodge that expelled Louis Wolfes, even if he did go to hear Putnam's lecture, should, in my opinion, hav its charter arrested and held till the grand master or a deputy can go and instruct those brothers in the principles of the order.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a panse in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Honr."

The Old Liquor Bottle.

How dear to my heart are the scenes of the dram-shop
As sad observation presents them to view,
The brandy, the whisky, the gin-sling and hot-drop,
And every vile mixture that drinking-dens knew.
The suicide's pond and the poorhouse that's nigh it,
The churchyard where many lost victims now are,
The court-honse, the jail, and the gibbet that's by it,
And that meanest bottle that stands on the bar;
The old liquor bottle, the tempting black bottle,
The traitorous bottle that stands on the bar.

How oft, in their folly, men hav hailed it with pleasure,
Believing it made them more able to work,
Or that it enlivened the joys of their leisure—
It made them but brutal, inclining to shirk.
Delusion hath seized them, for each of the featnres
And powers of the man strong drink only can mar,
While in the whole world the worst of all creatures
Is found in the bottle that stands on the bar;
The old brandy bottle, the tempting black bottle,
The traitorons bottle that stands on the bar.

Lo! when from its place boon companions up-raise it,
And, clinking their glasses, then pressed to their lip,
Though stnng by the serpent, yet madly they praise it
While sealing their doom with wild laughter they sip.
A demon of wrath hath distilled this damnation,
When chaos combined to set morals ajar;
Oh, from rum's enchantment is there no salvation
To banish the bottle that stands on the bar?
The old whisky bottle, the tempting black bottle,
The traitorous bottle that stands on the bar.

Aye, now the teetotalers all are inviting
To write quick your name on the temperance pledge;
Their workmen are waiting and thousands uniting
Are building a fortress as strong as a ledge.
Haste! this is the time for man's sober reforming,
Enlist, then, and follow the temperance star.
Old Alcohol's trenches now hard we are storming,
Down with the old bottle that stands on the bar!
The wit-stealing bottle, the tempting black bottle,
The traitorous bottle that stands on the bar.

Religion and reason must join to dissever
The chains that entwine all the world in its woe,
Nor labor nor learning hath liberty ever
When compassed about by wine's wicked flow.
The king superstition, with dogged persistence
Love, science, and law it o'erruns with its car.
Bring dynamite-guns to blow out of existence
The image of torment that stands on the bar!
The death-dealing bottle, the tempting black bottle,
The traitorous bottle that stands on the bar.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Right Training.

Vines left to themselvs run here, there, and everywhere. Roses, morning-glories, and honeysuckles, when they grow according to their own sweet will, present a wild, straggling, helter-skelter appearance, their tangled tendrils blowing out in every fanciful direction. Under the hands of a careful trainer, the branches are lifted, the dead and useless leaves and strings of wood removed, and the whole so twined and placed in graceful lines and curves that Nature herself might smile to see how beautifully Art can improve beauty.

So with children. Leave them to come up as they will, growing wild, without let or hindrance, and the spectacle is sad and strange. But placed in the hands and keeping of intelligent, refined, broad-minded men and women, trained carefully and conscientiously—behold the result: the girl grows gracefully and healthfully, as lovely as a flower; the boy develops sturdy honesty and true manly vigor of mind and body. Thorough, self-reliant, practical teachers make childhood of the same strong fiber. Actions, surroundings, habits of older people, impress children more forcibly than many words. The love of the lovely, the appreciation of grace, truth, integrity, in teachers and caretakers make strong impressions upon the childish mind. The pleasant voice, gentle manners, patience, forbearance, pity, and tender feeling in parents and elders hav very much to do in evolving like characteristics in the buds and blossoms of a household.

Find the chief, the leading traits of childhood, and develop them. Implant the love of the beautiful, by pointing out beautiful things. Train the clambering vines of honor, justice, gratitude, truth, upon the lattice-work of a noble foundation, such as may be seen in many—in all children born under fair conditions. Don't kill the enthusiasm of childhood, but feed it with wholesome food. Don't stop the questioning tongue, but encourage it with truthful answers. Don't break the strong, fierce will, but train it with a gentle hand. What you would like to see your children be, that be yourself, and with your own firm fingers train the little vines of humanity in the way that they should go, and when they are old they will not depart from it. S. H. W.

Memory Gems.

From the Works of Thomas Paine. To be learned and recited by the children.

The belief in a cruel god makes a cruel man.

Let us propagate morality unfettered by superstition.

One good school-master is of more use than a hundred priests.

It is with a pious fraud as with a bad action—it begets a calamitous necessity of going on.

The key to heaven is not in the keeping of any sect, nor ought the road to it to be obstructed by any.

To read the Bible without horror, we must undo everything that is tender, sympathizing, and benevolent in the heart of man.

My own opinion is that those whose lives hav been spent in doing good and endeavoring to make their fellow-mortals happy, will be happy hereafter.

The intellectual part of religion is a private affair between every man and his maker, and in which no third party has any right to interfere. The practical part consists in our doing good to each other. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

OSCEOLA, O., July 8, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I felt very sorry when I read about Aunt Elmina being in jail. At first we thought that the people that did it were pious, and put her in jail because they did not like her belief. I hope she will not hav any more such trouble. I always like to read her "Little Lessons." Pa and ma like to read the lectures and letters first, but I go first for the Children's Corner, and read the rest afterward. I like to read on Sundays; I like to read better than going to Sunday-school. My favorit books are "Tempest and Sunshine," "All In a Lifetime," "Children of the Abbey," "Jane Eyre," "Dora Thorne," and "The Shadow of a Sin." We would like to read "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and hav asked for it several times, but never could find it. I hav all of your books but your late one, and I am going to send for it as soon as I can. I think your books are splendid; I wish I could write nice stories. There is a woman in this neighborhood that writes such nice poetry; her name is Mrs. Harter. Perhaps you hav seen some of her writings; she often writes to the papers, and is a Liberal. This part of the country is thickly settled, although there are but five families that are Liberals. The Christians are very strict with their children, and do not allow them to dance. They are talking about the mean, wicked people sometimes when their own children are dancing at the same time. Whenever they want to go to a dance they tell their parents they are going to a party, and go and dance all night; they never tell it themselvs, but sometimes their parents find it out. They want them to go to meeting and get on the "Lord's side." We hav had several dances at our house, but I danced but once. My parents don't object to our dancing if we don't get too warm, then go out and catch cold; that is all the harm they see in it. Well, I expect I must close. DAISY ZIMMERMAN.

SAVANNAH, GA., July 11, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I like the Children's Corner very much for the practical way in which it is edited, so that it is always kept interesting. The only complaint a captious reader could make is that it is so short. I wish you would stand guarantee that it would be a whole page long in each issue. My motiv in writing is that you may hear how well pleased one reader is with your plan for the Fourth. I am for retaining all the old holidays, so far as practicable, despite this weather—100° or so in the shade. I am sun-worshiper enough to commemorate the 21st of December, the day when the life-giver turns our way once more. Why shouldn't summer bring its gifts as well as winter? We owe you thanks for the suggestion.

I send you a little acrostic, which I scarcely thought good enough for the Corner, especially after reading Mrs. Finch's poem in your last. It is meant for a reply to my friend Miss Bell's verses on a Georgia wild flower in No. 25. Yours very respectfully,

HUGO B. PLATEN.

Liberal Lesson Leaves.

PHYSICAL SERIES.—NO. 5. THE MOLECULAR THEORY.

32. Theory.—A hypothesis is any assumption; in physics a hypothesis may be made to explain phenomena. If a hypothesis be apparently true and explains a number of phenomena, it is called a theory. If it be proved to be true, it then becomes an established fact. It will readily be seen that the difference is merely a matter of evidence, and as different people may value evidence differently, what some regard as a mere hypothesis others may consider to be a theory, and still others, who are too ready to come to a conclusion, may consider it to be a fact.

33. The Molecular theory.—This hypothesis, from its great importance and almost universal acceptance, deserves particular notice. Briefly stated it is this: There is a limit to the divisibility of matter. A quantity of water may be divided into two parts, and each of these parts again divided; we may consider the division repeated over and over again until finally we reach a quantity so small that it cannot be divided again and remain water. This quantity, the hypothetical limit to divisibility, is called a molecule.

34. Atomic theory.—It may be shown by chemistry that water is composed of two gases, oxygen and hydrogen; therefore a molecule of water must be composed of these two gases, and can be separated; but it is no longer water—it is oxygen and hydrogen. These particles of which molecules are composed are called atoms. Hence we derive the following definition: A molecule is the smallest quantity of matter that can exist by itself. An atom is the smallest quantity of matter that can enter into combination to form a molecule.

35. Properties of Molecules.—Molecules are generally assumed to hav the following properties: They are infinitly hard; they are indestructible; they are perfectly elastic; they are spherical in shape; they are in continual motion; molecules of the same substance hav the same weight; molecules of the same substance hav the same volume.

36. Remarks.—Bearing in mind that this molecular theory is not a demonstrated fact, but merely a hypothesis, we shall now show how some of the general properties of matter are explained by it; and the special properties of matter we shall explain when treating of them.

37. Porosity.—First let us consider porosity. Since molecules are in continual motion, it follows that there must be spaces for them to move in; therefore matter must contain, as well as the molecules, these spaces in which they move. This hypothetical property of matter is called porosity.

38. Explanation.—Matter must take up room, since it consists of molecules, each of which has a certain volume, and also because it includes spaces between the molecules. Matter must be indestructible, because the molecules are indestructible. It must hav weight, since its molecules hav weight. It must be impenetrable, since its molecules are infinitly hard. It is compressible, since spaces exist between the molecules. These spaces are reduced in size by pressure, or, in other words, the molecules are pressed nearer together. Matter is divisible, since it consists of molecules, and these molecules may be separated, but in no case is any molecule divided.

39. Size of Molecules.—Molecules are all too small to be seen even with the most powerful microscopes. The number of molecules in a cubic centimeter of air has been estimated at twenty-one trillion. Loschmidt estimates the diameter of a molecule of hydrogen at 0.00000004 of a centimeter. The following is from Sir William Thomson: "Imagin a drop of rain, or a glass sphere the size of a pea, magnified to the size of the earth, the molecules in it being increased in the same proportion. The structure of the mass would then be coarser than a heap of fine shot, but probably not so coarse as a heap of cricket balls."

40. Remarks.—Hereafter, when we speak of molecules or explain any phenomenon by the molecular theory, it must be distinctly understood these statements are not made as demonstrated facts, but only to aid in understanding the subjects which we may be considering. It cannot be too fully impressed upon the mind that the molecular theory has not been proved, but is only a hypothesis suggested and accepted by many because it apparently explains a great number of facts that we come across throughout both physics and chemistry. GEO. G. GROWER.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—CONUNDRUM.

What is the difference between these two boys?

2.—REBUS.

A passage from Shakspere.

TO THE WILD FLOWER OF OVERTON. BY ONE OF THE BEES.

Do we know the fair flower that blooms in the glade,
Afar from the gardens that mortals hav made?
Renown it has none, for secluded it grows,
Leaf-shaded, where scarcely a stray sunbeam glows.
Its delicate bosom, caressed by the breeze,
Now rivals in fragrance the jasmin and rose,
And cheers with its nectar the wandering bees.

"But where is the flower such praises may claim?
Enough you hav hummed, if you giv not the name."
Look close, for 'tis hidden; too well, do you say?
Look closer, you'll find it; but I must away.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Bepublic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

Orthodoxy. 56 pages, 12mo, paper, 10 cents. $1.00 per doz. post paid. Printed in large, clear type, and containing as much as could be delivered in two ordinary lectures. This makes a grand missionary document. Liberals should scatter it generously.

Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the editor of the San Franciscan. 5 cents; 50 cents per dozen; 25 copies, $1; 100 copies, $3. Millions of these should be circulated.

Vindication of Thomas Paine from the attacks of the New York Observer, by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price, 15 cents.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Life. A Prose Poem. Printed in colors on board, beveled gilt edges. 50 cents.

Photographs of Colonel Ingersoll. boudoir, $1; cabinet, 40 cents.

Colonel Ingersoll in Court.

Robert G. Ingersoll was in Syracuse last Thursday, among other eminent lawyers from New York. He was engaged in a suit between two telegraph companies, the American Rapid and the Bankers & Merchants, in the United States court, before the Hon. Judge Wallace, in which was involved the little sum of $3,000,000. It was a three-corner or triangular case, wherein receivers and bond-holders were interested. The other counsel were able, and exhausted the forenoon session with their legal quid nuncs; but on the adjournment for dinner, this deponent, though somewhat accustomed to legal conundrums when young, was unable to take in the heads and points of the case. On the reassembling of the court, Mr. Ingersoll opened his side. As it was an equity case, the evidence had been taken and printed, and this was the summing up. He spoke two hours and a half. There is no use in talking—Colonel Ingersoll is a power. He made things plain as a pike-staff, as he always does. His presence had got noised about, and the court-room was full. At the close there was no person present, I venture, who heard him, whether lawyer or layman, but that understood the case. The other counsel were dressed in black, and otherwise in strict accordance with the usage of members of the New York city bar. Mr. Ingersoll was dressed very plainly, but neatly. He wore low-quartered shoes, dark pants, light-colored summer vest, and sack coat of the same material, of the thinnest fabric, the stripes in both running up and down, with neat, plain necktie, over a standing color with the corners turned down. Nothing could be simpler or more unpretending. He is, in common conversation, noticeably hoarse. It brought to me a momentary impression of sadness, for I remembered some time ago seeing it stated that he had had a surgical operation for the removal of a throat difficulty supposed to be like General Grant's. But as he talked his voice grew clearer and rang out with much force and lung power. He is becoming considerably corpulent, shaves his face all over, is nearly bald-headed save a sheaf of gray hair nearly white extending from his ears across the occiput, but having no length. His head is large and round, and he has a tremendous brain. He is perfectly courteous and good-humored in his treatment of his adversaries. In occasional collisions with them his quick wit and repartee were characteristic and full of fun. But when he was contradicted very flatly by Mr. Wilson by a counter-assertion, he did not tell the counsel he lied, but turning toward him, with uplifted arm, in a tone of thunder, he said, "That is not true!" The effect of voice, gesture, attitude, was annihilating, at least to further contradiction. Mr. Ingersoll is forcible in utterance, vehement in manner, and ardent in address. His earnestness impresses you that he believes what he says, and that he means you shall. What is remarkable for one so much engrossed in professional care is the fact that he finds time, as a sort of amusement, for such extensiv research in theology, history, and literature, while his sympathy with humanity is deep and tender as a woman's heart. There is a vein of exceeding fineness in the fiber and soul and brain. His eulogy on Mr. Beecher, though in prose, is a wondrous poem in itself.—New Era Gleaner.

Stray Scraps.

Novelist Cable's farewell at Northampton, Mass., May 23d, was on "The Passage Through the Red Sea." He admitted, "There is no account of this crossing on the monuments of Egypt," but solaced himself and his hearers with, "No nation is apt to leave a monument commemorating its defeat."

He rather questioned the dividing of the waters by any but natural means, easing off with, "Just how much is due to natural causes, and how much to the direct help of God, it is hard to tell, but the historian leaves us no room to doubt God's hand in the matter." Why did he not say God's finger, or arm, or foot? He said "God had not made a mistake, that he had to work miracles," but that "the whole intent of them was to teach us that all the operations of nature are the work of God's hands." I wonder how he knows! Who told him?

"Calamities are the result of natural mistakes," he said, "and though God's action was benevolent and beneficent for the Israelites, it was the destruction of the Egyptians;" but he justified God, because "he dealt with them as a nation, and not as an individual." He alluded to our war, saying, "God punished both sides for the crime of moral neglect."

Mr. Cable left "his audience in tears," going to the South on a recuperating (junketing) tour preparatory to returning and writing more love-sick, religious, blood-thunder-and-fire novels. Preacher and novel-writer combined makes a happy conglomeration not often found in either profession separately. Long liv the preacher, novel-writer Cable!

At the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the First Congregational church, Springfield, Mass., May 23d, said ex-Governor Robinson, of Massachusetts: "Let us unite church and state so closely in the administration of all public business that we become that people whose God is the Lord, and we shall then be in accord with the spirit of the fathers who builded here for a future beyond their own time," etc.

It is not best to get excited, but had not progressionists better be on the alert to counteract such advice as uniting church and state in public business? What church? Which church? The one that ex-Governor Robinson was then puffing—the Congregational!

"Spirit of the fathers!" that would be a fine retrogression, truly. Why, those fathers compelled everyone to "go to meeting," or fined him. Minister-tax was levied on all property and every citizen, and if unable to pay it, the only cow was seized and sold, or, what was considered worse still, the family Bible. The "spirit of the fathers" revived, or we be in accord with the "spirit of the fathers!" Do you know what you are saying, ex-Governor Robinson? You, and your Unitarian denomination, would be nowhere—just where it was two hundred and fifty years ago when that Springfield church you were applauding was incorporated. How very silly such talk seems! Suppose "we should become that people whose God is the Lord," and put that God into the national Constitution, should we hav any less cyclones, earthquakes, freshets, drouths, and other dispensations of divine providence than now? If it would put him in good humor, there would be some use in it; but, alas! he plagues his chosen just as badly as he does us reprobates. There is no hope of amendment.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

Opinions of Our Books.

We find a new pamphlet of some 80 pages on our table, from the Truth Seeker Publishing Company, New York, written by Israel W. Groh, entitled, "Is the God of Israel the True God?" (price 20 cents); and another by Samuel P. Putnam, entitled, "The New God." After reading both productions, we can say we like "The New God" the best, but we suppose this is on the principle that each individual makes his own God, as Colonel Ingersoll says. Every race of people, every sect, and indeed every individual defines God differently—if not in words, at least in conception. Mr. Groh describes the God of Israel as pictured in the four books of Moses, Joshua and Judges, and certain places in the New Testament; and he thinks him a monster. Mr. Putnam pictures a God in accordance with his conceptions of what such a being ought to be, and a very attractiv picture it is. It is not, however, a perfect, unchangeable God, but a progressiv God, who changes as men change, and advances as men advance. But Mr. Putnam thinks it would be better to dismiss the gods entirely. This is the closing sentence: "The highest excellence of humanity is where there are no gods, neither new nor old, where man is all in all, cultivated, disciplined, lordly, the master of himself, the champion of his natural rights, and the lord of his own heart." There are few more pleasant writers than Mr. Putnam, and several of his productions in verse hav had a wide circulation.—Denison, Texas, Sunday Gazetteer.

"The Struggle for Religious and Political Liberty" is the title of one of the latest works of Theodore C. Spencer, published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York. It is full of the traditions of the early centuries, together with historical facts, and is well worth reading. The church of Rome, Mormonism, Mohammedanism, dogmatism, and all other isms constitute a large portion of the contents of the work. The persecution of the early Christians occupies a chapter of much interest. The book indicates much careful thought upon the part of the author. His idea is to apparently show the great obstacles the early races had to surmount before they could approach the avenue that led to liberty. A great many religious demonstrations are pronounced fallacious by the author—that is, such as are alleged to hav taken place at a remote period in the history of the world. The author does not believe that anyone has the right to wantonly attack a religious faith and belief unless he is able to supply a better one to take its place. Whether himself and associates hav found the true one or not, he leaves the reader to judge. He wishes the reader to examin the material facts of history, and to judge accordingly.

"If this discussion," says the author, "shall in any way unsettle and endanger the honest faith of anyone, we here pledge ourselvs to tender them a philosophy of life that is reasonable, consistent, elevating, and consoling, thus bringing peace and joy into this life, and leading ever onward into the freshness of the great future."

The author need not worry himself on this score, as, besides an assumed belief, nine-tenths of all civilized races hav their private opinions about the matter, which, however, they are not given to airing unnecessarily, unless they are so unfortunate as to belong to a reservation for cranks.

Religion at best is but a profitless subject for discussion in any guise, and as long as people hav ideas of their own and brains of their own, it will be futil to turn their beliefs into some channel that takes a different course from their own. Every sect and every denomination in the ecclesiastical world believes, or pretends to believe, in some prescribed divine doctrin, and it is useless to attempt the formation of a universal religion.—Galveston, Texas, Daily News.

We hav received from the New York TRUTH SEEKER a copy of the Nine Demands of Liberalism, printed on a liberal sheet of plate paper and surrounded by fine cabinet-size portraits of such noted religious heretics as Washington, Jefferson, Paine, Franklin, Girard, and Ingersoll. The work is designed by Charles Eckhard, treasurer American Secular Union, and those who would like to frame it will probably find that it fits the frame of that hideous conception wherein despair in the shape of a bedraggled woman clings to a wooden cross on a barren rock, with the choice of letting go to be drowned, or hanging on to be starved. The new picture will fit the old frame, and the old picture, notwithstanding the dampness of its atmosphere, will burn in either a coal or wood stove. The Truth Seeker Company will send the new design for $1. Address, 28 Lafayette Place, N. Y.—Winsted, Conn., Press.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

MRS. CLEVELAND was 23 years old the 21st.

THERE were 935 deaths in New York city last week.

THE movement to enforce the Sunday liquor law has collapsed. The majority of saloons hav open side doors.

THE Central Labor Union has appointed September 5th as a Labor holiday, and asks all toilers to observe it.

THE new yacht Volunteer, built at Boston to defend the America cup against the Scotch Thistle, is an astonishingly fast boat.

SOME Philadelphians are preparing to celebrate September 15th as the anniversary of the promulgation of the United States Constitution.

THERE is to be a national church built at Rome in honor of St. Patrick and at the expense of the Irish people. Collections are being taken up.

CHICAGO, like New York, has boodle aldermen. One of them, Mr. McGarigle, convicted, has escaped, and his whereabouts is unknown to the police.

AN express train, near Hohokus, N. J., ran at full speed through a gang of Italian laborers on the 21st, killing eleven outright and injuring a number of others.

IT is reported that Stanley, the African explorer, is dead.

VIGILANTS are after the Mormon missionaries in South Carolina, and hav given them ten days to leave the state or be hanged.

JACOB SHARP, the convicted briber, is still in New York, his counsel having secured a stay. His health is bad, and he is likely to die in jail.

PARTS of New England were visited last week with one of the heaviest rain-storms ever known there. In New York the weather has been muggy, with frequent rains.

PHILADELPHIA publishers say the revised Bible has fallen flat. Hundreds of thousands of copies remain on the shelves, and the people will not hav them at any price.

THERE was a fire in a Chinese joss-house in this city last week, and the god was burnt up. The worshipers will buy themselvs a new deity as soon as circumstances will permit.

A WOMAN of 52, according to the British Medical Journal, recently dropped dead in a London street. Tight-lacing with corsets had stopped the action of the heart and lungs and produced syncope.

IMMIGRATION to this country in the past twelve months has amounted to 483,116, an increase of 160,000 over the preceding year. During the last fiscal year the excess of exports over imports was $77,958,448; this year it is only $273,832.

EVANGELIST MNASON, whom the barbarians of Park Ridge, N. J., mobbed, flogged, and clipped, returned to that place last Sunday. They declared they would lynch him if he remained, whereupon he heard a "voice from the Lord," and went away.

THE total value of the mineral product in the United States last year was $465,000,000, an increase of $37,000,000 over 1885. The gain was caused by the increase in the production of pig iron. The total value of the gold produced was $35,000,000, an increase of $3,000,000; silver, $51,000,000, a decrease of $600,000.

A MOB of fifty men waited upon the Rev. J. W. Henry, of Odessa, Mo., on the 22d, with the intention of riding him out of town on a rail. The clergyman met them with a shot-gun, and they retreated. The daughter of the leader of the mob had given birth to an illegitimate child, of which, she claims, the Rev. Mr. Henry is the cause.

EXTRAORDINARY GROWTH OF ISAAC.

And the man waxed great, and went forward, and grew until he became very great.—Genesis xxvi, 13.

Odds and Ends.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S nurse has died. She was less fortunate, in this respect, than George Washington's.

GOOD-BYE, McGlynn! Meet you—('scuse us, your holiness). Forgot, McGlynn. Hav made different arrangements. Can't meet you hereafter. —Life.

KING SOLOMON was over one hundred years old when he married, and although he dressed nicely he was a very plain man. Most of his wives married him for money.

"GOOD mawnin, Wilyum, has yo' read about de communication de pope has gib Doctar McGlynn?" "No, sar; dis chile steer clear ob dat; communication corrup' good manners, sar."

IT is said that the Rev. Dr. John Hall preaches to two hundred million dollars every Sunday; and that the contribution boxes often come back looking very much ashamed of themselvs.

A LITTLE four-year-old created a ripple by remarking to the Sunday-school class: "Our dog's dead. I'll bet the angels were scared when they saw him coming up the walk. He's awful cross to strangers."

"I AM devoted to George, of course," said a Chicago girl to her mother; "but I am afraid that he hasn't get-up-and-get enough about him to make any great success in this world." "Why?" asked her mother. "Because he always kisses me on the forehead."

FIRST Omaha man: "I swindled the big railroad companies out of $20 to-day." Second Omaha man: "It doesn't seem possible." "Fact, though. I ordered a carload of goods, and the freight came to $20 more than the goods are worth." "Well?" "I made 'em keep the goods."

THE girls who go into ecstasies over a new pattern for knit lace; who grow enthusiastic over making paper flowers; who read novels galore; who go to the opera whenever they get a chance; who wear boots a size too small for them; who say "awful" forty times a day, etc., make just as good wives as the other kind, and don't you forget it!

"JOHN," called the president of the Great Dakota Land and Improvement and Trust Company, "how many town lots did we sell yesterday?" "One, sir." "Very well. Bring in the map and mark off forty. How much money did we loan out?" "None, sir; but we had a partial application." "Very well again. Order some new circulars and mark up our capital $200,000."

FIRST tramp: "Whenever the pangs of hunger steal o'er me like a troubled dream, I ask myself if the consciousness of an unquenched thirst or an unsatisfied appetite is more inclined to bring distress to the soul than the perception of the long-sought-after but still-withheld means of satisfying inward craving. What would you say, Bill?" Second tramp: "Jes' this: that if you spring any more of your Concord School of Philosophy conundrums on me, I'll dissolve pardnership and hang on to this pie wot they gave me at the house that Emerson lived in."

WIVES love indulgent husbands,
And we've sometimes heard of such;
Yet women maintain
They've a right to complain
When a husband indulges too much.

ST. PETER was sitting by the gates of glory when a straight-haired personage in black approached him and said: "Having shuffled off the mortal coil, I am looking for a place where I may dwell forever among the strictly orthodox." "I don't know any such place 'round here," replied the saint, "but if you'll apply to the Andover Theological Seminary you may find where people of your kind can be accommodated."

"How is the work progressing in Dakota?" asked a Boston minister of a good brother at the Baptist anniversaries the other day. "Well, I am getting along pretty well, but still it's rather discouraging. The first week I went there I had big congregations. One day there were one hundred and fifty down on their knees weeping and praying. A man came in and said there were two detectives coming down the road, and every blessed person got up and skipped."

"THE people of New York are not very sociable, are they?" said a Western man, addressing an acquaintance who lived in the East. "Well, I don't know but they are, although they may be a little peculiar in that respect. For several years I had my office in a large building on Broadway. One day a fellow came in and asked if my name was McFiddleton. I told him it was, and then after a few moments' silence he said: 'My office is just across the hall, and ever since I saw your sign several years ago, I hav been intending to drop in and see you. I am your brother, you know, and—well, how are you getting along, anyway?' Yes," continued the Eastern man, "they are a trifle peculiar, but after you get in with them you will find them very sociable."

"HAVING a boom here?" asked a stranger, as he put his head out of a car window at a Dakota station. "Naw!" replied a nativ. "That's strange—thought every place had one this spring." "They be, mostly," and the man sighed and leaned up against the depot. "Then why isn't this town having one?" "W'y, you see, stranger, it was owin' to a little mismanagement. We platted a big Brighton Beach Boulevard addition over to the lake j'inin' the town, and you know the land there is just a little bit soft like. Well, the first spec'lator that come along the boys got too fast and took him down to it and he started to walk off acrosss the lots, and I'm blamed if he didn't stick there and we couldn't git to him to pull him out." "How long ago did it happen?" "'Bout two weeks." "He must be dead, then?" "Oh, yes, I reckon he's dead all right enough, but before he sunk out o' sight he hollered to other buyers that we took down and warned them 'bout the place, and somehow capitalists kinder got prejudiced ag'in' our real estate and we hain't havin' no boom a-tall. I'm goin' to move."

Gems of Thought.

WHEN one is humbugged he wants, at least, that a slight semblance of possibility should exist.—D. M. Bennett.

THE region of the senses is the unbelieving part of the human soul, and out of that now began to rise fumes of doubt and question into Mary's heart and brain. The death of her father was a fact. The loss, the evanishment, the ceasing, were incontrovertible things. She was sure of them; could she be sure of anything else? How could she? She had not seen Christ rise; she had never looked upon one of the dead; never heard a voice from the other bank; had received no certain testimony. These were not her thoughts; she was too weary to think; they were but the thoughts that steamed up in her and went floating about before her. ["Whoso readeth, let him understand!" for it is more than I do.] She looked on them calmly, coldly as they came, and passed or remained—saw them with indifference—there they were and she could not help it—wearily believing none of them, unable to cope with and dispel them, hardly affected by their presence, save with a sense of dreariness, and loneliness, and wretched company.—Mary Marston.

THE heart has much affinity with the brain—should I not add the stomach?—that it will only bear a fixed amount of illusage, or even of justifiable wear and tear. Take too many liberties with it, and, no more than the intellect or the digestion, will it continue its functions. There comes a paralysis of the feelings, as of the senses, and that is indeed a dreary death-in-life which drops its arms in hopeless lassitude, and says: "I hav shot my bolt, I hav run my chance—sink or swim, what matter? I accept my fate." . . . Accept your fate! What is this but yielding the stakes before the game is played out? Scuttling the ship before she strikes and fills? Surrendering the fort and going over with arms, standards, and ammunition to the enemy? The man who succeeds in love, war, money-making, is he who will not accept his fate, but frowns, grins, and strives, never yielding an inch, unless to win back two inches, and so, by sheer force of dogged obstinacy and perseverance, gaining the hard fight at last and grasping the prize.—Melville's White Rose.

IN Hume there is, in some respects, a singular contrast between the literary and the personal life. Perhaps, in this point of view, though in no other, the nearest approach to him was in the case of his not less famous contemporary, Dr. Johnson, who personally and in social life was one of the most undeferential and incredulous of men, dearly loving an argument merely for the sake of the fight, indifferent which side he espoused, and almost brutally skeptical of unsifted assertions and facts outside of common experience, even when supported by credible witnesses; and yet whose main characteristic as an author is that of an intolerant stickler for authority, an absolute uncritical accepter of traditionary dogmas, and a laborious expounder of intellectual commonplaces.—John Caird, D.D.

THE brotherhood of man is a sacred thing to think of—a sublime thing to teach. When the Greek tragedians taught the brotherhood of man before the Christian dispensation, was it less sacred than it became after Jesus came on earth and repeated it? There is this difference between the attitude of natural religion and the attitude of any sectarianism, that, while natural religion recognizes every voice of God that ever spoke through the soul of man, Christian sectarianism only admits the utterance of one pure soul to be divine.—T. W. Higginson.

ZEALOTS eagerly fasten their eyes on the differences between their creed and yours, but the charm of the study is in finding the agreements, the identities, in all the religions of men.—Emerson.

WEALTH, well made and well spent, is as pure as the rill that runs from the mountain side.—Goldwin Smith.

THEY tak' religion in their mouth;
They talk o' mercy, grace, and truth,
For what? to gie their malice shouth [vent]
On some puir wight,
An' hunt him down, o'er right and ruth [pity],
To ruin straight.

All hail, Religion! maid divine!
Pardon a muse sae mean as mine,
Who in her rough, imperfect line,
Thus daurs to name thee;
To stigmatize false friends of thine
Can ne'er defame thee. —Burns.

THERE can be no doubt of the usefulness of doubt as a means of clearer vision, and it is most steadfastly to be believed that a fixed creed means stagnation. Flowing water, if running over a clean bed, is sweet and wholesome, but stagnant water becomes offensiv, and scatters disease and death around it.—Hylax.

A NEW APPLICATION OF AN OLD FABLE.

"The tyrant never wants a plea. They hav little chance of resisting the injustice of the powerful whose only weapons are innocence and reason."

Notes and Clippings.

THE mayor of Argonia, Kan., is a woman named Susanna Salter. She enjoys the distinction of being the only woman mayor in America.

A LAWYER in Colmar, who defended some Alsatians of Turckeim against the charge of having sung the "Marseillaise," got three weeks' imprisonment for his plea, the precise punishment that his clients received for their song.

DEPOSITS in eight New York banks hav increased $2,609,865 in the past six months. This is regarded as indicating that the Saturday half-holiday has not had the deleterious effect upon economy which its enemies predicted.

THE Gardener's Monthly reports Professor Rothrock as saying that in spite of the common belief to the contrary, this is not a timbered continent, only 16½ per cent of the whole area remaining in timber. This is within 1½ per cent of the condition when a nation begins to experience a dearth of timber, and climatic changes begin.

EVELYN OELRICHS, of this city, is a nice Young Men's Christian Association young man, employed as collector by a piano firm, which engaged him from the Y. M. C. A. rooms on the recommendation of the officers of that institution. Last week he left the firm, with his accounts eighty dollars short. A police officer was set to hunt him up, and captured him at the Y. M. C. A. rooms, where he had left his application for another situation.

IT has been decided that the Edmunds law for the punishment of polygamy and fornication in Utah and other territories is applicable also to the District of Columbia, and a naval officer has just been arrested under it at Washington.

THIS is the sort of stories that they publish for fact in Saratoga: "A clergyman, calling on a Washington street family, was ushered into the parlor, where Miss Betty was seated at the pianoforte. He asked the young lady, a member of his Bible class, to 'play one of her favorits.' 'I'm not playing favorits any more,' she said. 'I'll take the field against them every time.'"

THE prohibition campaign in Texas is producing some extraordinary sentences. The Herald cites as an example the words of Congressman Mills in a Texas speech. He remarked that "hell is full to overflowing with such political preachers as Dr. Carroll," the Prohibitionist. In reply, the editor of the Waco Advance referred to Mills as "this foul-mouthed, Infidel, snake-eyed monster."

THE Educational Committee of the Georgia House and Senate in joint session lately reported in favor of the Glenn bill, which makes it a penalty for any teacher to teach a white child in a colored school or a colored child in a white school, the schools being kept separate by a constitutional law of the state. The preliminary discussion of the bill created considerable excitement in the North. Its passage is accepted in Georgia as the fixed policy of the state. There was little discussion in the committee. Every white man voted for the bill, the two colored members of the committee voting adversely.

"THERE doesn't appear to be any reason," says the Savannah News, "why the president should continue to favor Herbert F. Beecher." Right. And there doesn't appear to be any more reason why Mr. Cleveland should help Wm. C. Beecher, counsel to Comstock's society, and brother to Herbert F., by asking Governor Hill to sign Comstock's bills. Gratitude to their father is all very well, but the sons are not Henry Ward Beechers by any means.

THE Providence Journal, the leading Republican newspaper of the state, and for years the practical arbiter of Republican political affairs in Rhode Island, printed conspicuously the other day the following sweeping confession: "It cannot be denied that Prohibition in Rhode Island, after a year's experience, is found to be so complete a failure that it is no extravagance to pronounce it a miserable farce. It has not even approximately prohibited the use of intoxicating liquor; it is not to-day resulting in any perceptible diminution of drunkenness, as compared with former years."

THE St. Louis Institute of Christian Science recently applied for incorporation, and stated its object to be "to teach a higher sense of moral and spiritual qualifications requisit for harmony and health, thereby elevating mankind mentally, morally, and physically; to establish and maintain a school or institute for instruction in Christian science or metaphysics and its application to health, and promote longevity as taught by the Massachusetts Metaphysical College of Boston; to establish and maintain a sanitarium for the treatment and healing of diseases as taught at said college." Judge Dillon held that it was shown by the evidence that the association would make a feature of the faith cure, and he refused the petition of incorporation.

THE Rev. C. W. Millen, of the old Washington street Methodist church in Brooklyn, has had charges brought against him directly assailing his moral character, and will be tried shortly. In the list of complainants is Mrs. Squire, a boarding-house keeper, who says that the Rev. Mr. Millen insulted her in her own house, more by his actions than by his words, though exactly what he did her modesty will in nowise permit her to lightly divulge. She promises that it shall come out at the trial.

GEORGE S. PETERS, United States attorney for Utah, has filed suit against the trustees and managers of the Mormon church in behalf of the United States to disincorporate the said church and wind up its business. The petition alleges that the property is valued at $3,000,000—$2,000,000 in real estate and $1,000,000 personal property. It sets forth the law of Congress prohibiting any church from owning more than $50,000 worth of property, and the section of the Edmunds law providing for the disincorporation of the Church of Jesus Christ Latter Day Saints and escheating its property to the United States for the benefit of the common school funds of that territory. The petition asks the appointment of a receiver, and that all books, papers, etc., belonging to the church be turned over to him, with all deeds, notes, and property of every description. The court set September 15th for hearing the petition, and ordered a subpœna issued to all parties in interest to attend on that day.

The Seybert Commission.

It is probably known to THE TRUTH SEEKER readers that shortly before his death, Mr. Henry Seybert, of Philadelphia, an enthusiastic believer in modern Spiritualism, "presented to the University of Pennsylvania $60,000 to found a chair of philosophy, and to the gift added a condition that the university should appoint a commission to investigate all systems of morals, religion, or philosophy which assume to represent the truth, and particularly of modern Spiritualism."

A commission was accordingly appointed by the university, composed of ten members, of whom Dr. Wm. Pepper, as provost of the university, was ex officio chairman, Dr. Horace Howard Furness acting chairman, and Prof. George S. Fullerton secretary.

Each member in turn, at one of their earliest preliminary meetings, expressed his entire freedom from all prejudice against the object to be investigated, and his readiness to accept any conclusion warranted by facts. The acting chairman confessed to a leaning in favor of the substantial truth of Spiritualism. "The Preliminary Report of the Seybert Commission for Investigating Modern Spiritualism" has been submitted to the trustees of the University of Pennsylvania, and is just now published in a handsome volume.

It is for the purpose of calling attention to this valuable book that I hav just perused that I lay aside other duties and pen this article. Let me entreat every one who has any doubts regarding modern Spiritualism, or who is ignorant of the manner in which the tricks are performed, herein so graphically described, to invest one dollar in the purchase of this book, and read it carefully. He will find it free from prejudice, cant, or hypocrisy, dealing only with facts—inexorable, stubborn facts.

The first session of the commission recorded was held March 13, 1884, with a Mrs. S. E. Patterson, recommended by the late Thomas R. Hazard,* who professed to be a slate-writing medium. In the words of the report, "A small piece of slate-pencil was placed within a double slate, and the leaves fastened together with a screw, which passed through one wooden rim into the other. The spirit-writing upon the slate should be indicated by the pencil appearing upon the outside of the slate. The slate was laid upon the medium's lap for one hour and a half without results." Three subsequent trials previous to May 31st were made with this medium with no better success, and another in her own home alone with Mr. Furness.

On January 16, 1885, the commission report, a slate that was left at the house of Mrs. Patterson just before Christmas was returned. A full description of the manner in which the slate was sealed is here given, with diagram. "When the slate was shaken, no sound of the rattling of the pencil was heard," which showed that it had been removed, but the seals were examined and declared intact. An account is here given how "Dr. Leidy pushed a thin knife blade between the slate at the unprotected corner," and how "Mr. Sellers pushed in a thick knife-blade a little to one side of Dr. Leidy's, and separated the slates one-tenth of an inch (space enough to work out the pencil), and the seals were not broken." The slate was then opened, no pencil and no pencil marks found therein. "The rims were worn smooth and blackened at the corner where the slates could be separated; this was very distinct. Some soapstone dust, which Dr. Koenig identified under a microscope as the same with a remaining fragment of the pencil inserted, was found rubbed into the same corner, showing that the slates had been separated and the piece of pencil worked out."

Mrs. Patterson is again introduced by Dr. Calvin B. Knerr, a member of the commission, who describes very minutely how "with a mirror in my pocket, which I could hold under the table at any angle that would reflect whatever occurred at the other side of the table, in the medium's lap, the accustomed position of the medium's slate, . . . I beheld a hand, closely resembling that of the medium, stealthily insert its fingers between the leaves of the slate, take out the little slip [of paper, on which he had written his question], unfold and again fold it, grasp the little pencil . . . and with rapid but noiseless motion . . . write across the slate, from left to right, a few lines; then the leaves of the slate were closed, the little pencil laid on the top, and, over all, two hands were folded as if in benediction." Dr. Knerr repeated this trial the second and third time. He thus reports: "Again the slates went down; again I saw the hand at work as before. . . . I requested a third trial. After this last experiment, in which again, for the third time, in my little mirror, I saw the stealthy fingers write on the slate, I told the medium I was satisfied, smothered my indignant anger, and left the house as quickly as I could. For the larger part of a year I had investigated in good faith this department of Spiritualism, which, in the medium's case, had turned out a downright fraud." It is necessary to state that on this last trial the slates were not screwed together, which left the medium an opportunity to write the answers for the spirits. But on all former occasions when the slates were thus secured, or the madam knew she was watched, no results were obtained. Thus endeth the claim of spirit-writing between sealed slates and the pencil being brought out and laid on the top of the slates, as ended the wonderful phenomena of the eighty-pound stone coming through the ceiling at Dr. Chesebrough's, at Syracuse, without so much as cracking the plastering.

Two sessions are reported with Mr. Fred Biggs, a professional slate writer; two with Mrs. Maud E. Lord; two with Mrs. Margarretta Fox Kane, none of which were satisfactory.

Mrs. Thayer, the noted flower medium, now a slate-writer, at Col. S. P. Kase's, in Philadelphia, also failed to giv satisfaction with the slates, but had quite a shower of flowers and a live terrapin fell on the table on two occasions, supplemented with a pigeon hovering around.

A report is made of a session with Mr. Pierre D. O. A. Keeler, a screen performer.

The spiritual photography intention with his brother, W. M. Keeler, was abandoned, the commission being unwilling to accept the medium's conditions.

Dr. Rothermal and Mr. Powell were unable to get any materializations; and a Mrs. Best is reported not very favorably.

But the most interesting and amusing reports are of Dr. Slade and four "sealed letter" writers. It would be impossible to do justice to either; suffice to say of the former, there were six seances held between Jan. 21 and Jan. 28, 1885. The report of each session must be read to be appreciated. Here are a few lines from the summary:

> In our investigations with this medium we early discovered the character of the writing to be twofold. . . . In one case the communication . . . was general in its tone, legible in its chirography, and usually covered much of the surface of the slate. . . . In the second, when the communication was in answer to a question addressed to a spirit, the writing was clumsy, rude, scarcely legible. . . . In short, one bore the marks of deliberation, the other of haste. . . . The long messages are prepared by the medium before the seance. The short ones, answers to questions asked during the seances, are written under the table with what skill practice can confer. With this knowledge, it is clear that the investigator has to deal with a simple question of legerdemain. The slate, with its message already written, must in some way be substituted for one which the sitter knows to be clean. The short articles must be written under trying circumstances, out of sight, under the table, with all motions of the hand or arm concealed. It is useless to attempt to limit the methods whereby these two objects may be attained. All that we can do is to describe the processes which we distinctly saw this medium adopt.

Now, it will plainly be seen that one must read the book in order to gain a knowledge of these processes—the substitution of slates, the writing upon others under the table, the scratching of the finger-nail on the rim of the slate to imitate the sound of the pencil, the prepared slates never used for lack of opportunity, the unslippered foot hastening to its slipper—all of which, and many other movements that the commissioners distinctly saw, point to a solution much more rational than the spiritual theory.

Dr. J. V. Mansfield, Boston; Mr. R. W. Flint, New York city; Mrs. Dr. Eleanor Martin, Columbus, O.; and Mrs. Eliza A. Martin, of Oxford, Mass., are the four sealed letter writers referred to above. The task of testing these mediums was assigned to Dr. Furness, and faithfully he performed his part. He first wrote in a gummed and sealed letter to Dr. Mansfield:

> Feb. 28, 1885.
> What was the name, age, sex, color, or condition in life of the owner, when alive, of the skull here in my library?

The correspondence between Dr. Furness and Dr. Mansfield reached the fifth letter before Dr. Furness discovered that "the six eminent scientific ghosts, Hare, Combe, Fowler, Spurzheim, Gall, and Rush did not agree with each other on all points," as the first two decided the skull to be that of a colored woman, while the remaining four dissented, but a negress, named Cornelia Winne, declared it was "Dinah Melish's top-knot." Dr. Furness also discovered and proved, by an ingenious method, that all these letters had been opened, read, and resealed.

He now turned to Mr. Flint with his skull question, from whom he received answer that the spirits gave no response at three sittings; but Dr. Furness found that the seals had been tampered with, but for some reason abandoned.

Dr. Furness then sent the same letter to Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Columbus, Ohio. She gave him an abundance of gushing doggerel from "Sister Belle," in which she affirmed:

> My form was sold to doctors three,
> So you hav all that's left of me.
> I come to greet you in white mull,
> You that prizes my lonely skull.

So Dr. Furness had at last discovered the owner of the skull, and also that this letter had been opened and resealed.

The last venture was with Mrs. Martin, of Oxford, Mass., from whom Dr. Furness received the astounding contradiction that the skull was claimed by a frail French girl by the name of Marie St. Clair; accompanied by positiv proofs that the letters had been opened. "In every instance," says the doctor, "the envelopes had been opened and reclosed; it is therefore scarcely necessary to add that every instance has borne the stamp of fraud."

Still unsatisfied, our persevering investigator visited Dr. Mansfield, in Boston, May 19, 1885, and there discovered that this medium answered sealed (?) questions in the presence of the questioner by daubing fresh mucilage on the paper which contained the questions, under the pretense of sealing it, then, retiring to his table piled with books that screened him from observation, opened the paper, read and answered the questions.

The materialization scenes, the attempt to make of him a slate-writing medium by the noted Joe Caffray, so facetiously described by Dr. Furness, it is impossible to reproduce, as was the search for the ownership of the skull.

But it would be unjust to close this meager notice and omit the Slade Zoellner investigation, the statement of which, in 1878, exercised such a strong influence in favor of Spiritualism in America. When Professor Fullerton was in Germany in 1886, he visited the four colleagues of Zoellner, including Wundt, Zoellner being dead, and an extract from the summary of these conferences is here subjoined:

> Thus it would appear that of the four eminent men whose names hav made famous the investigation, there is reason to believe one, Zoellner, was of unsound mind at the time, and anxious for experimental verification of an already accepted hypothesis; another, Feckner, was partly blind, and believed because of Zoellner's observations; a third, Scheibuer, was also afflicted with defectiv vision, and not entirely satisfied in his own mind as to the phenomena; and a fourth, Weber, was advanced in age, and did not even recognize the disabilities of his associates. No one of these men had ever had experiences of this sort before, nor was any one of them acquainted with the ordinary possibilities of deception. The experience of our commission with Dr. Slade would suggest that the lack of such knowledge on their part was unfortunate.
> A consideration of all these circumstances places, it seems to me, this famous investigation in a somewhat new light, and any estimate of Zoellner's testimony based merely on the eminence in scienee of his name and those of his collaborateurs, neglecting to giv attention to their disqualifications for this kind of work, cannot be a fair or a true estimate.
> GEO. S. FULLERTON.

Thus is exploded the Zoellner test, of which such immense capital has been made. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Barre, Mass., July 21, 287.

*This is the credulous, fanatical Spiritualist of whom the commission report this: "Indeed, Mr. Hazard once told us that the true spirit in which to approach the study of Spiritualism is 'an entire willingness to be deceived.'" Almost equal to Seward Mitchell's assertion on an open postal card to me: "Spiritualism false is far better for humanity than Materialism true." Thus do the most radical on all subjects expose their own insanity.

THE DIAKKAS TO BLAME.

The following letter from Silas J. Chesebrough, one of Spiritualism's most valiant defenders, to the Syracuse Courier, shows why the report of the Seybert Commission is adverse to his faith. It is an open letter to the secretary of the commission, Mr. George S. Fullerton:

SIR: I hav read the report of the Seybert Commission with mingled feelings of pity and regret—pity for the countless horde of anxious, truth-loving, truth-seeking people, who are thus by you unwittingly disappointed; and regret that your report was so prematurely made.

In common with ordinary investigators, your members naturally drifted toward Boston, the "Hub" of spiritual intercourse, but the Seybert Commission is not an ordinary or common association of men, and for this reason I am simply amazed that your report should be published to the world even before any of your members hav either privately or officially visited Syracuse.

From the day of your first appointment to that important trust till the present time, nearly every member of the commission has been repeatedly notified that Syracuse, as a base of spiritual operations, now stands second to no place on the continent, if in the world.

Long before your report was given to the press, we had, right here in Syracuse, definit information that evil spirits were at work upon almost every member of the commission, and that the diakkas had registered an oath that each and every one of their band would try to ridicule truth and distort genuin manifestations, to the end that the commission should report adversely to our sacred cause. In short, we were repeatedly informed by our spirit guides that the whole Seybert Commission would be diakkad, and your unfinished report justifies the conclusion. It is simply a supplement to "Bottom Facts," and I understand the author of that book appeared before your commission as a professional juggler, and succeeded in palming off upon you some of his diabolical work.

Understand, I hav not a word of fault to find with any member of the commission as individuals, for I believe you hav all acted up to the best light that was in you; but I do lament that none of you gave heed to our warning, that no one visited Syracuse, the very head-center of Spiritualism.

Joe Caffray, whom you ridicule in your report, was formerly a member of my own family, and I know him to be a medium of great power, and fully capable of demonstrating the truth of spirit communion to anyone not already entangled in the toils of diakkas.

Before making your final report, let me urge every member of your commission to come to Syracuse and witness for yourselvs the most astounding and convincing spiritual demonstrations ever given to man.

Yours in defense of truth, SILAS J CHESEBROUGH, M.D.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

My stay in Richmond for a week was full of interest. General Halleck was the military commander at the time, and every order he issued showed his hatred of the negro. I saw punishments inflicted upon the negroes for trivial offenses that ought to hav stung the commander's conscience to his dying day. I visited the celebrated slave pen where the slaves were kept in confinement until the "gangs" were full that were sent to the more southern markets. I hav forgotten the name of the man who owned this pen for human beings, and dealt in them for many years, and made himself rich in this infamous business. As I told him what I thought of slavery, he said, "I hain't no prejudice against niggers," and, calling a boy perhaps ten years old to him, he said, "Lady, this is my son." This child was a bright octoroon, strongly marked with African features. I said, "Where is his mother?" "In New York, lady. She's stopping at a hotel, and there ain't no lady thar' that's got dresses as smart as her'n." I asked, "Why is she in New York?" "Well," he said, "I tuk her thar' and married her a spell ago." I said, "You had despaired of selling her since the Emancipation act, and so married her." "Well, I wanted a wife, and I knowed she'd be a good one, and this is her son, too; but you don't seem to think I done suthing to be proud on. I thought you'd think 'twas pious." Piety is a strange thing. Perhaps this act was a pious act. 'Twas no doubt a good thing for both parties.

I visited Castle Thunder and Libby prison; was in Libby when a soldier came in and offered the commandant a hundred-dollar bill to allow him to walk down one of the corridors. I asked the keeper why he refused. He said in answer that the keeper of Andersonville was in one of the cells, and he had no doubt the soldier would hav shot him if he had permitted him to get sight of him.

Libby was a sorry place even then, after the North had had possession of it nearly two months. How many people, I wonder, know that a black woman was whipped to death for persisting in throwing loaves of bread into that prison-yard to the starving soldiers, and Jefferson Davis was living in the city at the time? Dr. Mary Walker was a prisoner in Castle Thunder some six weeks. These two prisons were very noted as places of cruelty and starvation, but there were other prisons in Richmond equally bad—prisons for negroes which had been in use for many years—where women even were immured for the awful crime of trying to escape from slavery. I became acquainted with one woman in Richmond who took me into a prison where she was once held a prisoner six weeks, with a young babe, because her owner had died insolvent, and so she was put into that dreadful place to await a purchaser. Fortunately, this slave woman had made a friend of a Northern woman on whom she had waited, and this friend purchased her and her child, made them free, and afterward gave her a house and lot. This house was on the opposit corner from the one which the president of the Confederacy occupied during the war. General Halleck now made his headquarters in this same house, and it was pitiful to see how this man cared for this place; he was so afraid that I would take something as a relic, even the bushes were protected by an announcement that they were not to be broken. I hav never been a relic hunter, but some of my friends of the North had asked for a trifle from the "seat of war." I gathered a few tufts of grass only from the home of Jeff Davis; I had already a piece of the whipping-post; a pair of handcuffs; a slave whip, which I put with a piece of the coffin, and some of the inside lining of the same, in which President Lincoln's remains were buried, and many other things of like value; but I hav given them all away, keeping nothing but a nightshirt of her husband's which Mrs. Lincoln gave me—a rather strange article to giv one for a keepsake, but Mrs. Lincoln was a very strange woman.

I visited the colored schools in and about Richmond; went some miles below the city to see a clergyman who, because of his office, had been kept in power over the contrabands at Alexandria until they, the freed people, had risen against him. One of these women had become so enraged with him that she had knocked him down with an iron fry-pan, and then gone to the military commandant and told him what she had done, and awaited her punishment. The commandant said, "Don't do it again!" I opened the eyes of the persons to whom this man had applied, and the school was refused him.

I had a reason for wishing to visit Richmond which had nothing to do with schools or pupils. Many, many years before, when I was a young woman, I had been employed in a boarding-school in Philadelphia where Prof. Charles Minnegerode, a young refugee from Germany, was one of the teachers. He was full of enthusiasm at that time for liberty; had just barely escaped with his life because of his father's official position in the government, but was exiled from his country, as he, with his class in college, had been discovered in instigating treason. He had renounced Roman Catholicism, and seemed to be a Freethinker. He had afterward been appointed to a professorship in William and Mary College, Virginia, and finally became rector of the Episcopal church in Richmond. We were for some time on such intimate terms as to exchange letters quite frequently, and at one time the gentleman came to Massachusetts to visit me; but finally we both married and the correspondence ceased.

I wished very much to see this old acquaintance, and had pictured to myself something of an exciting interview, as I knew how widely we had grown apart. I had seen a report of a sermon which this rector had preached some six weeks before the fall of Richmond from the text, "The Lord shall put far away from you the Northern army," and he had said in that sermon that the people of that city were just as safe as though they were in Abraham's bosom. I went to his house, saw his wife and children—an only daughter bearing my name, and three or four sons at home. The father was with his eldest son, who was wounded at Petersburg at the taking of Richmond, and had never been able to reach home, and so, as has often been the case in my life, I was disappointed. I gave Mrs. Minnegerode my present name, and did not tell her where I knew, or rather had known, her husband. Such are some of the changes in life. I hav seen somewhere "that a man's good or ill fortune is his wife." I think this rector's position in life was made by his wife. Whether it was good or otherwise I, perhaps, am not an impartial judge. I am apt to make the niche very large in which I set my friends; if they are too small to fill the niche, perhaps I should blame myself that I made the niche over-large for their dimensions.

The free woman who had a home near Jefferson Davis had husband and children—three grown-up sons. She made a little party for me and the teachers with me, inviting the colored ministers and their wives. One of her daughters was about being married, and her lover was one of the guests. We had a very nice dinner, and all the et ceteras, but the timidity of these colored people was painful. They dared not speak above a whisper, as one of the rules of slavery was that more than two persons congregated together in the evening constituted a disturbance, and the whipping-post was the cure. Freedom was so new a thing to these old time slaves that they knew not how to use it. This lady said to me, "I hav heard of you, Mrs. Colman, and I am so grateful to you that I would be willing to crawl on my knees from this city to Washington if only by so doing I could do you any good." I am glad to be appreciated; but who has ever thought of paying the slave for his sufferings? In this interminable talk of compensating the slave-owner for his losses, who ever thought of paying the slave for the loss of a lifetime? We are none of us very patient of wrongs done by those whom our race defrauded of everything but life itself, and often of that. Richmond is beautifully situated, but when I was there it was desolation itself. The rebels set fire to the best part of it, and it was lying in ashes. We were invited to the governor's house, a fine-looking place, but to the eyes of a Northerner the lack of cleanliness was a drawback. I think neither in Richmond nor any of the cities in the District of Columbia are they acquainted with house-cleaning, or were not at this time. Perhaps the Yankees hav introduced it.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

San Luis Park.

Judging from the large number of letters which I hav received since the publication of my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, a fuller description of this favored region of our country will be of interest to many of your readers.

Those who hav written to me personally hav asked some practical questions, which I will repeat for the benefit of others:

1. Dr. O. T., Mankato, Minn.: "Want to hav a nice place in a good settlement, or in a not too large city—five, ten, twenty acres. How is your country? Please let me know. Of course, you, personally, are a great attraction, for I want to be an activ Freethinker till I go to—well."

2. S. P. F., McLouth, Kan.: "Having read one of your letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, hence I write you in reference to the country and climate in Colorado. I hav had a desire to correspond with some one in San Luis Park, but could not get the address of anyone before. Please tell me what chances there are for land, and how prices range; also what chance for mercantil business. I expect to migrate West soon."

3. Dr. S. T. D., Hill's Ferry, Stanislaus county, California: "You hav located in San Luis Park. Is there any place or location in the park where a truth-seeking doctor could make a living by the practice of medicin? How cold does the weather get there in the winter time? How can I get there? What point by railroad?"

4. J. H. C., Columbus, Kan.: "I want to get out of these cold prairie winds. I only want a small patch for a garden and small fruits; small, cheap house in a quiet, healthful, and sightly spot. I want so much in my natural surroundings, I am hard to suit. Pure air, water, and grand scenery are the three leading factors to invigorate and inspire me. Like Byron, 'From my very boyhood hav I loved to look on Nature in her loftier moods.' Now, will you please write me a brief sketch of your surroundings, and if you think there is a place for me?"

5. E. M. P., Beebe, Gratiot county, Mich.: "Saw your letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, giving a description of the San Luis Park. Now, I would like a full description of it and what can be raised there. What kind of stock country is it? Is there much government land for homestead? I hav some thoughts of going West this fall."

6. R. P. L., East Saginaw, Mich.: "I think you hav done a sensible thing, since the mountain would not come to you, to go to it. I need some rest in a different and better climate. How shall I reach Monte Vista, if I decide to come? I hav an idea it is southwest of Denver. Presume it would be fully as good to visit the Park on a two months' vacation as a trip to Europe."

7. E. M. E., Central City, Neb.: "Cattle is what I want. Could I get back near the foothills, on some clear spring brook close to timber, and find a place where by irrigation I could make a hay meadow of three, four, or six hundred acres, and find plenty of good range?"

8. G. G., West McHenry, Ill.: "I was glad to learn through THE TRUTH SEEKER that you had secured so desirable a home in Colorado, and that you and your wife had concluded to occupy and enjoy it this season. I do think you are entitled to a pension from the government and exemption from duty on the retired list of Liberal workers with full pay. Your life has been an eventful one, and when I reflect upon what we hav all passed through, the violent and malignant opposition we hav encountered, the intolerant spirit of pious fraud and persecution that has environed our pathway, the deadly nightshade of ignorance and priestcraft casting a dark and dismal shadow in the distance behind us, grinning like a famished hyena grave-robber, I feel that we hav reason to congratulate ourselvs that we hav lived in an age when it is possible for a thinking man to giv expression to his honest thought and not forfeit his life."

These excerpts show the interest which is felt in this portion of the globe by our Liberal friends. As I sit here in our little home, and look over this broad, prairie like valley, with its ten thousand square miles, my constant wonder is how so beautiful and extensiv a region has remained unoccupied for so long a time. While it is true that there are now cities and booming villages and thousands of enterprising inhabitants scattered over this vast valley, it is also a fact that thousands upon thousands of acres are still vacant, inviting the settler to homestead, preëmption, free claim, or purchase.

But more of this later on.

No. 1. The Mankato physician. You can get a nice place here, five, ten, and three hundred acres, but it is poor soil for doctors. Nevertheless, there are many invalids who hav sought this clime for the great boon, after losing faith in Eastern Esculapians. Then it is undeniable that some people would infringe the laws of health if they lived in paradise. Eden's first case of colic proves it.

McLouth correspondent. At Alamosa, Monte Vista, Del Norte, and other rapidly growing towns, chances for mercantil business are good. Judging by the prices we hav to pay for everything needed by a family, they are too good. Land can be bought for $3, $4, $5, $6, $7, and $10 an acre. Uncle Sam has several fine farms ready for the nephews and nieces with grit and enterprise enough to come and liv on them, farms as rich as mortal eyes, I do believe, ever looked upon.

The other inquiries will be answered later, for this article is long enough. But before closing, I want to say it would delight my heart to hav Liberals come by the car-load and take what is left of this mountain park. Liberals are the people I hav worked with shoulder to shoulder for a generation, I would like to see thousands of them flocking in here to help make the land blossom—men and women of vigor, thrift, as I know them to be; a class who love mental and physical liberty better than life; who hav faith in humanity; who can say to a brother, "You are a Liberal; your word is good enough for me; I want no other security." Among such people for more than thirty years I hav labored. Surrounded by them, when I obey nature's command to join the silent throng, I want my bones buried in sight of that grand mountain yonder, Sierra Blanca, with no Christian ceremony, nor a taint of orthodoxy in this pure air.

W. F. JAMIESON.

Monte Vista, Col.

ALL languages and literature are full of general observations on life, both as to what it is and how to conduct one's self in it; observations which, everybody knows, which everybody repeats, or hears with acquiescence, which are received as truisms, yet of which most people first truly learn the meaning, when experience, generally of a painful kind, has made it a reality to them. How often, when smarting under some unforeseen misfortune or disappointment, does a person call to mind some proverb or common saying familiar to him all his life, the meaning of which, if he had ever before felt it as he does now, would hav saved him from the calamity! There are indeed reasons for this other than the absence of discussion; there are many truths of which the full meaning cannot be realized until personal experience has brought it home. But much more of the meaning even of these would hav been understood, and what was understood would hav been far more deeply impressed on the mind, if the man had been accustomed to hear it argued pro and con by people who did understand it. The fatal tendency of mankind to leave off thinking about a thing when it is no longer doubtful is the cause of half their errors. A contemporary author has well spoken of "the deep slumber of a decided opinion."—J. S. Mill.

The officers of the American Secular Union thank E. B. Foote for his donation of nine volumes of the Murray Hill publication of "Plain Home Talk."

The American Secular Union has sent with "Plain Home Talk" two hundred different books, pamphlets, and tracts to the nine recently formed auxiliary Unions: Kent, Ohio; Columbus, Ohio; Farmdale, Ohio; Nashville, Tenn.; Marshfield, Or.; Silverton, Or.; Brandon, Or.; Molalla, Or.; Phœnix, Ariz., and the Chicago, Ill., Unions; distributing sixteen hundred copies of selected works of Freethought literature.

News and Notes.

I had a pleasant experience at Forest Grove, although the sanctuary of the Lord broods over it with the shadow of its wings. This was originally settled by the Congregationalists and was intended to be an orthodox community. But the march of progress prevented. Among the pioneers were Henry Buxton, T. G. Todd, F. N. Hines, Jonathan Wells, and the spirit of revolution has prevailed, for they hav been stanch advocates of Freedom.

Michael Vert died a few years since and left a sum of money for a Freethought hall, and this has been used to good advantage, and the Liberals hav their fort, and occasionally a little heavy artillery awakes the pious slumbers of the saints, and they realize that the world is moving on.

I had good audiences Sunday afternoon and evening, and I look forward with pleasant anticipation to a return to this "happy hunting-ground," where field and grove mingle in such beautiful array.

I was glad to meet with Mrs. T. G. Todd, who givs a lively column now and then to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and who is one of our brightest allies of the fair sex. She is sister of Mr. Trollinger, president of the Molalla Union, and so the pioneer Campbellite preacher has given good blood to the Liberal cause. Mr. Todd is rejoicing in the possession of a magnificent Holstein calf that weighed one hundred and thirty-five pounds at birth—the biggest on record. I begin to think that we Infidels are the "saints" and inherit the earth, for with this almost miraculous calf, and friend Saunders's Hereford cow that givs six gallons of milk per day, which I believe also beats the record, and friend Wells's, of Molalla, splendid horses, with the blood and fleetness of Woodford, that glorious sire, it does seem as if we had the right side of Mother Nature, and she keeps her noblest gifts for the advance guard of the world. The wilderness of reform is beginning to bloom and blossom like the rose. The ministers must be on the lookout or the yellow-legged chickens will go trooping over to the opposit camp.

I met Hauston, of Hillsboro, at Forest Grove, and I was wanted for a lecture at his place, but I had not time. I hope to take this point on my next trip. They say there are good Liberals here, and chance for a flourishing organization.

Thos. Billinger, George Finch, B. P. Cornelius, J. R. Griffin, M. Johnson, of Gaston; M. E. Dilley, Dr. D. N. Ward, Alfred Lee, Wm. King, L. E. Smith, etc., are our friends at Forest Grove and vicinity.

Early Monday morning I am again on board the rattling train. At Portland I meet friend McElsander, and we take a long, dusty ride to "Jackknife," or Eagle Creek, as it is called, for the eagles used to gather here to feed upon the thousands of salmon that, driven up the stream, perished along its banks. The "Jackknife" is a kind of "four corners," with a grocery store post-office, where "Deacon Bascom" might find familiar quarters and talk politics the livlong day. It is a lively spot, although off the railroad and among the woods. McElsander, H. Wilburn Guthrie, Albert Lacy, Rolla Herring, of Spring Water; John Revenue, of Sandy, and others, with their families, make a noble advance guard here, and the promis is bright for future efforts. I was wanted for one night at Sandy, where Liberals do congregate at Revenue's, but I could not go, as every night was occupied. I lectured Monday and Tuesday evenings at Eagle Creek to crowded houses. They came from all parts, and filled the seating capacity of Wilburn Hall, which holds a couple of hundred or more. Miss Classon sang the "Star Spangled Banner" with fine effect at my closing lecture, the audience joining in the chorus. Afterward there was music and dancing up to the midnight's merry stroke. I shan't forget "Jackknife" very soon. I am coming back, perhaps, the next Fourth of July, and then we will organize our forces. Our veteran, McElsander, who for years has not allowed the orthodox a comfortable nap, is the main spoke in our wheel, and the car is bound to move on, and the "Jackknife" will be opened for effectual service.

Wednesday morning McElsander takes me back to Portland. Such a road! such dust! Oregon can beat the world for that, and such stumps and broken-down bridges I hav seldom encountered. I arrived safe and sound, but I could scarcely see, I was so thick inlaid with dirt. I lectured at East Portland that evening to a fair audience, and on the following evening in Portland to a crowded house, where the council-fires of friend Beal do burn. I was delighted with my welcome. I shall be at Portland again August 11th.

In connection with the lecture we had a festival occasion, and I didn't get away until midnight. I slept on board the boat, and in the morning when I awoke I found myself on the broad bosom of the Columbia, with wooded shores on either side. I remember reading in my school days of the Columbia sweeping on its lovely and majestic course, and it seemed so far off that I never expected to look upon its mighty stream. Here I am, however, with signs of civilization on every hand. In the afternoon the bright, industrious city of Astoria comes to view. At the landing my friend Wm. Chance meets me. He knew me, he said, almost at sight. That is because he reads THE TRUTH SEEKER, I suppose. We were acquainted instantly. Chance is one of those who always keep things a-going. He was postmaster for twelve years, and has always occupied prominent positions, but he has never been afraid to speak his mind. He has sold hundreds of dollars' worth of books, and these hav kept the fires alive. He has a little boy named after Ingersoll, and by his looks and talk I reckon he will make a first-class Infidel. His blood will answer to his name. Mrs. Chance is also a noble enthusiast. In this Freethought home I found the true philosophy of life, making the best of things as they come, and the flowers of the future out of the glowing joys of to-day.

I also met H. Nelson and family; J. P. Foster, of Stark's Point; Sheriff Albert, of Cathlamet, W. T.; I. F. Halloran, editor of Astorian; D. E. Ireland, Cleveland Utzinger, Col. Jas. Taylor, Jas. Williams, Chas. Wright, and others. I had a crowded house in the evening, and at the close of the meeting the Freethought books went off like wild-fire. I was sorry, indeed, that I had not a week to stay in this place, instead of only one night. But it was too late to change the plans of my campaign; but I shall come back here next year, and we will hav a grand rally.

I am floating back now on the broad Columbia. I left Astoria early this morning, and expect to arrive at Seattle to-night for lectures to-morrow. I shall be at Newcastle, etc., next week. Sunday, July 31st, I am at Snohomish; August 3d and 4th, at Port Angeles; August 7th, 8th, and 9th, at Port Townsend; August 11th, at Portland; August 14th, at Colfax, W. T.; August 21st, I expect, at Pendleton; August 28th, at Baker City; August 29th to September 5th, at Prairie City, with a seventy-mile stage ride; September 6th to 20th, with James Wardwell, at Emmetts, Boise City, and vicinity; September 24th and 25th, at Salt Lake City, for a convention of the Liberals of Utah; and then eastward via Canon City, Denver, Nebraska (Osceola and other places along Union Pacific Railroad), to Chicago, for the National Congress in November.

Columbia River, Steamer R. R. Thompson, July 23, 1887.

J. E. REMSBURG is lecturing in Nebraska. His appointments for the first two weeks in August are as follows: Salem, Monday, 1st; Louisville, Tuesday, 2d; Fontanelle, Wednesday, 3d; Norfolk, Thursday, 4th; York, Saturday, 6th, Sunday, 7th; Wilber, Monday, 8th; Arapahoe, Tuesday, 9th, Wednesday, 10th, Thursday, 11th; Indianola, Friday, 12th, Saturday, 13th, Sunday, 14th.

A Priest Secularized.

In the August number of the North American Review, Edward McGlynn, the excommunicated priest, writes upon "The New Know-Nothingism and the Old." Dr. McGlynn's position, in this article, is this: That while the old Know-Nothing party was furiously opposed to Catholics and Catholicism, there really was no need of such a party because of the weakness of the church at that time; but that now, when there is much and good reason for a revival of true Americanism as opposed to priestcraft, the people are not at all awake to the fact, but nod sleepily on the edge of a religious pit dug deep and wide for their benefit by the Roman hierarchy. In support of this implied assertion, Dr. McGlynn instances many encroachments of the church, and discloses more of her ambitions. One of these last is amazingly colossal, and new to us. It is nothing less than the intention to perpetuate a foreign tongue by means of parochial schools and to make a large portion of the country German Catholic in language, sentiment, and religion. Dr. McGlynn says:

> It has been avowed to me by a German clergyman of this city, who flattered himself that Great Britain and Ireland were almost exhausted as sources of immigration, while Germany, with her 45,000,000, would continue year after year to pour hundreds of thousands of her people on our shores. This insane hope is cherished chiefly in Wisconsin and in the valley of the northern Mississippi. The ears of American boys born of German parents are boxed by the religious teacher in parochial schools in St. Louis for the heinous offense of speaking the common language of America—the English—and a clerical superintendent, to reproach an American boy of German parents for manliness and independence, can find no better words to do justice to his reprobation than to say, "Du bist ein Amerikaner" (You are an American!). There is a widespread and persistent effort, with scarcely any attempt to conceal it, to Germanize the Catholic church in the Northwest. The means toward the attainment of this is to multiply German church schools and German parishes, and to make the multiplication of the latter an excuse and a justification for the appointment, with the aid of German cardinals in Rome, of German-speaking bishops. In furtherance of this plan, Germans speaking but imperfectly the English language are appointed pastors over English-speaking congregations, and especially where there is the excuse of the existence in the congregation of a few German-speaking families. This plan has been so successful that the ecclesiastical archiepiscopal province of Milwaukee, with its German archbishop and its German theological seminary, has been very largely Germanized, and similar designs for the immediate future are entertained for the great archbishoprics of Cincinnati and St. Louis.

Such a scheme as outlined in the foregoing seems practically hopeless, but we know there is no limit to the audacity and ambition, as there is none to the tyranny and cruelty, of the Romish church, and with the vast and well disciplined army of mental serfs possessed by her, this plan may well giv the American people painful thoughts, and imbue them with a little of the patriotic spirit—though it often degenerated into fanatical buncombe—of the Know-Nothings of a generation ago.

But this is not all, by any means. "Things hav been happening," says Dr. McGlynn, "within the last few years all over the country, and especially in our state and city of New York, a mere tithe of which would, but a generation ago, hav stirred the country to a white heat of anger. But a few years ago, many bishops, assembled in the provincial council of Cincinnati, issued a pastoral letter, the product of the pen of the Scotch bishop Gilmour, of Cleveland, which was largely a deliberate thesis against our Declaration of Independence, in the attempt to show that men are not born 'free and equal,' and when some remonstrance was called forth, in not a few instances from Catholics, the Franco-American bishop, Chatard, of Indianapolis, hastened to justify the manifesto, which he had himself signed, in a letter to a New York paper, in which he corroborated the teaching of the pastoral letter by quotations from a letter of the pope, whom he slavishly described as 'our present holy father, Pope Leo XIII., now gloriously reigning.'"

These anti-American sentiments are now followed by "an avowed determination, as shown in the last council of Baltimore, to establish all over the country a great system of parochial schools in opposition to the public schools, and it is made the most urgent duty of priests everywhere, under threat of expulsion, to found such schools. The hope is not concealed that, when the so-called 'Catholic vote' shall become larger, the politicians may be induced to appropriate, through state legislation or local governments, all the funds necessary for the support of these schools. This has already been accomplished in Poughkeepsie, New Haven, and elsewhere, and for a brief period during the offensiv and defensiv alliance between a certain set of priests and the Tammany ring of the days of Tweed, Connolly, and Sweeney, an appropriation procured by legislativ trick and fraud, under the management of Peter B. Sweeney, awarded several hundred thousand dollars to the parochial schools of New York city. What would the old-time Know-Nothings hav thought of this? It should be noted that these parochial schools, which it is the design to multiply, are exempt from taxation, and that thus the public in some sense puts a premium upon a system of schools hostil to its own, and so encourages the laying of an enormous additional burden upon the poor Catholic people who hav already paid, directly or indirectly, their full share of the taxes for the support of the public schools, which it is now the growing tendency to forbid them to use, under penalty of privation of the sacraments of the church. Another thing which was almost unheard of a generation ago, and the suggestion of which, in anything like its present extent, would then hav caused the gravest civil disturbances, is the appropriation of valuable public lands and of millions of dollars of public money, to the support of all manner of sectarian institutions under the control of churches, and especially of the Roman Catholic church. It may be sufficient, by way of illustration, to refer to the Catholic Protectory in Westchester, to the House of the Sisters of Mercy in 81st street, and to the Foundling Asylum of the Sisters of Charity in 68th street, immense institutions supported by the city treasury of New York, at an expense of from half a million to a million of dollars a year, and the two latter built upon blocks of ground given by the city through the favor of the Tammany ring, and worth hundreds of thousands each. There is a host of smaller institutions of the same character, and supported chiefly by the public treasury, to nearly all of which children are committed as to public institutions by the civil magistrates. Would it not be enough to make the elder Know-Nothing bigots turn in their graves could they hear that vast sums and great public properties are thus turned over to irresponsible private and sectarian institutions, especially if they could learn that the priests, and monks, and nuns, whose institutions are thus benefited by the public, are but the more emboldened to denounce our schools and other public institutions, in language at times brutal if not obscene, while indulging in unwarranted pharisaic glorification of their own institutions and of themselvs? The extraordinary zeal manifested for the getting up of these sectarian schools and institutions is, first of all, prompted by jealousy and rivalry of our public schools and institutions, and by the desire to keep children and other beneficiaries from the latter, and, secondly, by the desire to make employment for and giv comfortable homes to the rapidly increasing hosts of monks and nuns, who make so-called education and so-called charity their regular business, for which a very common experience shows that they hav but little qualification beyond their professional stamp and garb."

Of the value placed by the church upon these parochial schools, Dr. McGlynn says:

It is not risking much to say that if there were no public schools there would be very few parochial schools, and the Catholic children, for all the churchmen would do for them, would grow up in brutish ignorance of letters; and a commonplace of churchmen here would be the doctrin taught by the Jesuits in Italy, in their periodical magazine, the Civiltà Cattolica, that the people do not need to learn to read, that all they do need is bread and the catechism, the latter of which they could manage to know something of, even without knowing how to read. A confirmation of this is to be found in the very general illiteracy in countries where churches and churchmen hav been exceedingly abundant and hav exercised temporal control. It is a remarkable fact that in Italy, France, and other so-called Catholic countries, in spite of the hostility to the government schools, the clergy do not establish parochial schools. The ecclesiastical authorities of Italy, while willing enough to impose on our Catholic people of America so heavy a burden, do not dare to try to impose a similar burden upon their people nearer home.

But Dr. McGlynn is not through with his indictment. Smarting under the chastisment of the church because of his own entrance into politics, "as a citizen, not as a priest," he goes on:

But what, most of all, might seem well adapted to revive and intensify the old hateful and bigoted spirit of Know-Nothingism, and justify its fears and predictions, is the actual and direct interference in politics of bishops, vicars-general, and priests in their ecclesiastical capacity and because of their ecclesiastical influence, to promote the pecuniary and other temporary objects of the ecclesiastical machine. Recent instances of this, not a few, could be mentioned. It must suffice here merely to refer to the letters and messages of the late Vicar-general Quinn, of New York, sent to clergymen to secure their influence as churchmen to defeat constitutional amendments which, even after their adoption, must hav been practically over-ridden and over-ruled in the interest of Catholic institutions, and to secure the election to the legislature of such men as Mr. J. W. Husted, because he was willing to favor "generous appropriations;" the instance referred to in this article of the clerical alliance with the Tweed ring; the letter of Monsignor Preston to Joseph O'Donoghue in the late mayoralty canvass; the denunciation of one of the candidates and his party from Catholic altars; the secret prohibition to a priest who went, not as a priest, but as a citizen, to keep his engagement to speak at a political meeting, the chief demerit of which speech was clearly in the fact that the movement it was intended to help was likely to bring disaster upon the Tammany ally of the ecclesiastical machine; the abuse of the confessional in forbidding men under penalty of refusal of absolution to attend the meetings of one political party; and, last and worst of all, the effort of an archbishop in the late election to defeat at the polls by the abuse of his ecclesiastical position the call for a constitutional convention, which, as the result proved, was demanded by an overwhelming majority of all those who voted on the question—an effort in full keeping with the action of the same archbishop, when bishop of Newark, in sending to the Catholic pastors of New Jersey a secret confidential letter, telling them to "instruct" their people how they "must" vote upon certain proposed constitutional amendments, giving minute details as to the striking out of certain clauses, and suggesting that for greater surety it might be better that the Catholic voters should strike out all the clauses. The heinousness of this action will be better understood when it is mentioned that the object of the proposed amendments was to protect the public treasury, and to prevent the people of counties and towns from being oppressed and robbed by railroad and other corporations.

From this cursory review of the situation Dr. McGlynn concludes that the evils and dangers dreaded by the Know-Nothing party are now veritably upon us, growing and multiplying unless checked by public sentiment and our law-makers. It astonishes him, therefore, to witness the indifference with which these dangers are viewed by the people, and especially by the two old political parties, who do nothing to remedy it, but, on the contrary, coöperate with the Roman church in making it worse. A similar indifference he also finds in the great majority of the journals of the country.

Dr. McGlynn is new in this business of religious reform, and we are not at all surprised at his deep astonishment. It is but a little while since he was himself a cog wheel in the machinery he is now so vigorously smashing, and a very important wheel he was, forming a close connection between the political wishes of the archbishop and the votes of St. Stephen's parish. The facts Dr. McGlynn now sees with his newly-opened eyes hav been patent enough to the Freethinkers for years, and he is following after THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Freethought journals in bringing them to light. And curiously enough, Dr. McGlynn's remedy is our remedy, and has been advocated by the Freethinkers for years, even before Dr. McGlynn had taken "holy orders." The Nine Demands of Liberalism contain all that Dr. McGlynn advocates. To Freethinkers there is nothing new in his platform demanding the abolition of "all privileges granted by public authority to individuals or corporations, whether civil or religious, and the equal taxation of the property of all such corporations, without exemption or exception in favor of any church, charity, or school, or, in a word, of any institution that is not the property of the people and controled for some public and common use by public officials; and the conduct of government, in all things, absolutely for the public, that is the common, good—or, in other words, for the masses, and never for an individual or a class; forbidding appropriations of school funds to any but common schools; forbidding the reading of the Bible or any other distinctivly religious book; all praying, worship, and singing of religious hymns in common schools; forbidding magistrates to commit to any but public prisons, asylums, etc; repealing all existing laws by which appropriations are made to any but public institutions, and forbidding (legislature) counties, cities, towns, and villages to donate any property, or to sell or lease it at lower than market values, or to donate money for the payment of assessments, or for any other purpose, to any church, or to any school, college, asylum, hospital, etc., or to any institution of charity, correction, or learning, which is not the property of the people, and under the exclusiv control of officers of the people; revoking existing appointments, and forbidding future appointments of chaplains, whether salaried or not, in any public institution, and forbidding compulsory attendance at, or joining in, any prayer, worship, or religious service or instruction in any public institution, and forbidding any insult to the faith or religious convictions of any inmates of public institutions, or pupils in public schools."

This is the platform of the Infidels, but upon it Dr. McGlynn is heartily welcome.

Spelling Reform.

THE TRUTH SEEKER should stand high in the estimation of spelling reformers for the firm and consistent stand it has taken in favor of a simplification of English orthography for the past seven years. Among the many periodicals which gave encouragement to the movement soon after the formation of the Spelling Reform Association, in 1876. as, for instance, the Home Journal, Utica Herald, Philadelphia Baptist Weekly, and others, THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only one, so far as I know, that has persistently stuck to its colors, and had the courage of its convictions. From the abandonment of the cause, apparently at least, by other papers, some persons may think that the spelling reform has lost ground; but I do not think such is the case. The claims of the reform are on too solid a foundation to be abandoned, and none of the great philologists and educators who hav spoken so decidedly of the necessity for the simplification of spelling, in order that universal education may become a fact both North and South, will take one backward step. The reform must come, but it may take some time to prepare the mind of the public for it. To assist in this preparation, the officers of the Spelling Reform Association hav begun the publication of a handsome quarterly entitled, "Spelling," which will duly set forth the claims of the reform, and show what is proposed to be done at the present time to carry on the work more effectually. The first number contains a valuable article from the pen of J. H. Gladstone, a member of the London school board, and brother of Wm. E. Gladstone.

All persons who are in any way interested in the amendment of our absurd orthography should at once subscribe for this journal. It has the best educational talent to conduct it and to contribute to its columns. The publication of it is committed to the Library Bureau, 32 Hawley street, Boston, to which address communications and subscriptions should be sent. The price is $1 a year.

Presbyterianism and Episcopacy.

Presbuteros, "elder," and episkopos, "overseer," are both pure Greek words. It is certain that the vernacular of Palestine in the first century was Aramaic, and there is no evidence that Jesus or his apostles or immediate disciples could speak Greek, much less write it. Josephus confesses that the Greek was to him an unfamiliar language; he wrote it with difficulty. Dr. Murdock, who translated the Peshito, or Syriac version of the New Testament, maintains that it is written in substantially the language spoken by Jesus and his immediate disciples, and it is undoubtedly as old a version as the Greek.

The word presbuteros occurs far more frequently than episkopos in the Greek version of the New Testament. In the Peshito or Syriac version the word episkupah, translated "bishops," occurs in Acts xx, 28, and Dr. Murdock makes this note:

This is the only place in this version of the New Testament in which the word bishop occurs.

And Dr. Murdock could hardly hav failed to notice that the Syriac version makes no distinction anywhere between an elder (presbuteros) and a bishop (episkopos), and seems to place a female elder (presbutis; plural, presbutera) almost on a level with the male elder or bishop. The same word in Syriac (kishisha) answers for elder or bishop in the Greek (Phil. i, 1; 1 Tim. iii, 1, 2; iv, 14; v, 1, 2, 17, 18, 19; Tit. i, 6, 7; ii, 2, 3).

In Acts i, 20, the Syriac word which Dr. Murdock translates "service" is "bishopric" (episkope) in the Greek.

Episcopacy finds an unstable foundation in the Syriac codex. Not until the close of the second century did bishops begin to loom up above elders.

Let America Be Represented.

There can be no question as to the duty and advisability of the Freethinkers of the United States being represented at the International Freethought Congress to be held in London, England, Sept. 10th to 12th.

It is not practical nor necessary to call a mass meeting, inasmuch as there is the most perfect unity among all true Liberals in their desire to be represented by America's most able exponent of Freethought. I would therefore suggest that the Executiv Board of the American Secular Union solicit Col. R. G. Ingersoll to attend the International Congress as the delegate of the American Secular Union and the representativ of the Freethinkers of the United States.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

HENRY GEORGE's positions on the various social theories are of interest principally because he and Dr. McGlynn are the head and front of a considerable party in this state, and Dr. McGlynn and the party usually agree with Mr. George. In the last Standard Mr. George says: "There is this truth—and it is a very important one—in Socialism, that as civilization advances the functions which pass into the proper sphere of governmental control becomes more and more numerous, as we see in the case of the railroad, the telegraph, the supplying of gas, water, etc., but this is all the more reason why we should be careful to guard against governmental interference with what can safely be left to individual action. In some things our existing system is too Socialistic and in others too Anarchistic. The proper line between governmental control and individualism is that where free competition fails to secure liberty of action and freedom of development. The great thing which we should aim to secure is freedom—that full freedom of each which is bounded by the equal freedom of others. If it were absolutely necessary to make a choice between full state Socialism and Anarchism, I for one would be inclined to chose Anarchism, preferring no government at all, bad and inconvenient as that might be, to a government which should essay to control and direct everything. And I imagin that this would be the choice of the great majority of the American people, for individualism is strongly rooted in all the habits of thought of the peoples of English speech, and we seem to lack the capacity for governmental direction and administration that has been developed on the continent. This is the reason why Socialism of the German school can never make the headway here that it has on the continent of Europe. It is, in fact, the product of a state of society in which people hav become largely used to governmental supervision and direction, and are accustomed to look to government as a sort of special providence. But, in the mean time, there is no reason why those who entertain such views as I do should not work harmoniously with Socialists of the German school as long as we go together, or why we should be perpetually accentuating our differences. The ultimate aims of Socialism are high and noble. They seek to obtain for society that abolition of poverty for which we would strive. Any dispute as to means may well be postponed until it is necessary to raise it. I and my friend both wish to reach the Pacific ocean. I think we shall reach it at San Francisco; he is firmly of the opinion that it will be necessary to keep on until we get to China. So long as we are willing to travel westward in the same car, we can well postpone disputes."

Chicago Letter.

On the Fourth of July an eminent divine preached a sermon in this city on "Faith and Fire" works, in which he assured his hearers—the small boy included—that, however brilliant might be the coruscation of fire-cracker, Roman-candle, or rocket, it couldn't possibly equal the pyrotechnic display awaiting them in the brimstonian realms of Pluto below. With this assurance, the gentle Christian hurling a burning lamp at Mr. Putnam seems a little too previous. But it is by these methods that the church has "spread its light" among the nations. Were it supreme to-day, kerosene lamps would not alone be utilized of modern inventions in the dissemination of its propaganda. What weird devices, what terrible tortures, might it not apply as conduciv argument to opponents had it the power to invoke to its aid the marvels of modern inventions! What could it not do in the way of making converts with electricity and dynamite!

Last spring I lectured in several towns in Michigan, and had the distinguished honor of giving the first Freethought lecture in the little city of Ludington. I spoke before the Knights of Labor on "Progress and Poverty." The hall was full, and my lecture was enthusiastically received. Half of the audience were ladies. A lively discussion followed, and we had a good time. An announcement was made that on the following Saturday night I would giv a Freethought lecture. The Knights offered me their hall, but knowing that among them were several Catholics, I would not accept it, as I felt that they did not understand what a Freethought lecture was, and I would not take advantage of their ignorance. The Democrat, a city paper, contained the following notice of my labor lecture:

> The lecture given by Mrs. A. M. Freeman, of Chicago, on "Progress and Poverty" at the K. of L. Hall last night was a taking card. The hall was full of enthusiastic listeners who were highly pleased with the lecture. Mrs. Freeman is a fluent speaker, and is a woman of rare ability. She speaks again at Tripp's Hall on Saturday evening.

Indorsed by the papers, I had a good audience at the Freethought lecture—many ladies, members of the "Woman's Temperance Society"—Free Methodists, and Catholics. I began very gently with them. I appealed to their common sense, to their reason; I requested them to remain until the conclusion of my lecture, assuring them that the freest opportunity would be given for criticism. I wanted criticism. I begged them in the most persuasiv words I could command for "more light." There were no kerosene lamps. The hall was lit with gas. I told them that there were three sources of evidence—nature, which furnishes us with natural phenomena; written or verbal history; and our own reason, which stands pre-eminent. That mathematics rests upon self-evident truths, a straight line being the nearest distance between two given points. That the Bible's claim to infallibility is not self-evident, makes no appeal to our reason, and receives no support from nature or natural law, dealing largely in supernatural assertions. I refer to what I said for the reason that several ladies at this juncture, with a withering look of scorn, drew their drapery about them and marched out, a liege lord or two trotting along shamefaced in the rear. I went on, speaking rapidly, so that they should hear as much as possible before making their escape. Another lot arose and hurried out. I drew it mild, for I knew I hadn't a Chicago audience. It was a little thing they got mad at. In referring to the nine plagues, I said that the magicians made frogs, but that they couldn't make lice. That it took a mightier God to make a louse than a frog. You see this was all in favor of their God, and one wouldn't think they would mind a small thing like that, but they did, and out they went.

Then I questioned them in regard to the flood—how an old scow like that described, with only one door, and that pitched tight, and one little window, twenty-two inches square, in the roof, could hold half a million species of animals, and oxen, and sheep, and hay, and so on, to feed them for a year. And I told them how they went marching in, two by two, two elephants and two musketoes, two poodles and two fleas to bite 'em, and so on, ad infinitum, with Noah and his wife, and his three sons and their wives, to manage the whole menagerie. About a dozen at this point made their escape, and somehow I was so forcibly reminded of the old story of the march into the ark that it struck me as an animated picturesome illustration à la Watson Heston in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I imagined I saw the long ears identifying the stupid, evoluted, human donkeys. In the ante-room, on the stairs, in the street, were heard words like these: "Isn't it dreadful?" "She ought to be hung." "We ought to go and get a policeman and put her in jail." "She should be driven from town," and so on. All of the old gentle methods that Christians hav resorted to were proposed, but, thanks to a few brave Freethinkers, were not executed. Had these Christian ladies had their way, the lecturer of the evening would hav been grilled, broiled, fried, roasted—in fact, served up in every conceivable style known to the gastronomic art. And this was not in the Feejee islands, where they make a business of eating missionaries, and where the missionaries expect to be eaten, but in the city of Ludington, in the great state of Michigan, owning allegiance to that Constitution which guarantees free speech to all.

The result of my lecture was that the Freethinkers of the town declared that I should speak in Ludington again, and that the Opera House should be filled. The Catholics behaved better under fire than the Protestants, several remaining until the conclusion of the lecture. I accounted for it in this way: The Protestant is thrown upon his own reason. He dislikes it. He has his creed, and he doesn't want to be disturbed. The Catholic turns to his priest, and if his book is proved fallible, his priest and pope are still infallible. However, I made many friends, even among the conservativs, the Knights of Labor inviting me to come to Ludington this fall and speak at the dedication of their new hall.

A short time ago a Mr. Sheridan gave a lecture in this city against Robert Ingersoll, in which he said that Ingersoll is an intellectual and moral Anarchist. To call Freethinkers Anarchists seems to be quite the fashion, as I see that Mr. Monroe, as copied in last week's TRUTH SEEKER, refers to the managers of the Secular Union as Anarchists. Mr. Ingersoll has already spoken for himself. Mr. Stevens, president of the Chicago Secular Union and chairman of finance committee of the American Secular Union, has been referred to several times by correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER as an Anarchist. Mr. Stevens is a Socialist, and if there is one thing better known than another by the Chicago Anarchists, it is that Mr. Stevens and themselvs do not agree at all. In a recent lecture before the Union by Mr. Simpson, one of the critics, Mr. Collins, said, "I think that anyone here who may hav confounded Socialism with Anarchy will be convinced that they are as far apart as the poles."

Because one demands justice for individuals, must he accept their ideas? It is to Mr. Stevens's credit, and to the credit of the Socialists of Chicago, that they hav been brave enough, self-sacrificing enough, loyal enough to the best part of their nature, to ignore the disagreements of the past, and demand a fair trial for their imprisoned fellows. Let the Freethinkers who are criticising this action observe how unanimous the church and its ministers are for the speedy execution of these men. Recently, in Chicago, in Faneuil Hall, Mr. Joseph Cook, of Boston, said, "I hav here a pen made out of wood from the sidewalk where the Haymarket bomb was thrown; and whenever I go to write with it, the sentence it makes is, 'May God hav mercy on the souls of the Anarchists, but may the courts not hav mercy on their bodies!'"

Poor old Joseph! what relic-hunters his kind hav been! How many cords of cross, and crown, and saintly bones are stowed away in holy places! That dilapidated old sidewalk around the Haymarket was too far gone into dust for relics. On the spot where the bomb fell the walk was heavy stone. The verdant, gullible Bostonian has been imposed upon. It is an old chestnut, but swallowed by the clergy readily. After the great Chicago fire, its court-house bell was made into I don't know how many car-loads of little charm bells. If he had said that the penholder was made from the telegraph pole spirited away by the police, filled with bullets shot at the people holding a peaceable meeting, it would hav been more credible.

Among the news in that very ably conducted paper, the Ironclad Age, is the following:

> A BOMB SCARE.
> CHICAGO, July 2.—Judge Baker, of the Criminal Court, discovered a dynamite bomb under his desk several days ago, and for a while consternation existed in the building, until it was found to hav been rendered harmless by having its contents cleaned out. It is thought to be one of the relics of the Anarchist trial, as the room is the same in which that celebrated case was heard, and many specimens of bombs were used in the evidence.

Now, the fact is that its contents were never cleaned out; that it hadn't the remotest idea of being anything else than harmless, as it was merely a painted ball, whose offense lay in the fact that it had dropped from its flagstaff and rolled on the floor. All of which was duly chronicled by the Chicago Herald a day or two later.

The church is making a supreme effort to suppress free speech—to rob the people of their liberties. A clergyman in Chicago the other day said to a reporter: "We are only going to close the saloons now. It is not a Christian move as yet, but as soon as we can we will make it one. We will close everything. Stop, also, the Sunday papers." Instead of censuring THE TRUTH SEEKER for the noble course it has taken, there should be laudation that one paper is brave enough to stand up for the right. Mr. Putnam's words and my own were just as obnoxious to Christians as were the words of the Anarchists to capitalists. Tried in a Christian community, by a Christian jury, before a Christian judge, and we would hav been condemned. Mr. Reynolds's fate demonstrates it. The punishment would hav been according to their power to inflict it.

Dr. Juliet H. Severance paid a visit to our city a short time ago on her return from a lecturing tour through Nebraska, and she said the word Anarchist is flung at people as the mob used to fling bricks and rotten eggs at the Abolitionists. The word doesn't hurt; the eggs did, and, besides, they were not nice. The doctor emphasized her words as though she spoke from experience. One word as to Elmina D. Slenker. I do hope the Freethinkers will stand by her. She has a good, sympathetic heart. How easy for a wretch like Comstock to impose upon her! How little can be known of what is true or false! Remember this man's career. Think of the low, Jesuitical cunning he has employed in his methods.

One doesn't hav to teach immorality to become obnoxious to the church and its tools. He has but to doubt. By lack of "faith" he is not only promised a liberal display of "fireworks" in the next world, but receives what amount of persecution Christian bigotry can inflict upon him in this.

Morals Plus What?

The one glaring defect in the popular basis of moral right and wrong consists in this prohibition: "You shall not dare liv after the infinit law that is in you." Such is the inimitable wording of it by the heroic, pure-souled Emerson. This is nature's law when stripped of all conventional trappings and society livery. Hence this rare, royal sympathy with nature as the basis of morals irradiates almost every page of the Concord sage. He would "rather be a pagan suckled in a creed outworn than be defrauded of his manly right of coming into nature."

Likewise, what Carlyle said fifty-four years since respecting the basis of right and wrong remains in greater force even to-day—"I cannot understand morals. Our current moral law (even that of philosophers) affronts me with all manner of perplexities. Punishment neither is, nor can be, in proportion to fault; for the commonest of all examples take the case of an erring woman." This language, in view of two trials for "obscenity," so called, pending, one in Virginia, the other in Kansas, is rendered remarkably pertinent; especially since, in neither instance, is it definitly known for what the destined punishment is inflicted.

Again, says the Chelsea sage, "Moral force and moral correctness—how shall the litigation be settled between these?" Be this our present endeavor. What are the qualities inhering in an absolute and unchangeable basis for right action? Webster defines the term "moral" as synonymous with "manner, custom, habit, way of life." According to this standard, it is quite evident that mankind may, as Dryden says, "break loose from moral bonds," and yet be very far from immoral, in the better sense of this much mooted term. According to the present imperfect standard, morality or immorality consists in simply conforming to established custom. Hence, if one does not eat, drink, sleep according to custom, he is an immoral man. If, however, he externally conform in these and like minor particulars, giving tithes of social "mint, anis, and cumin," yet defraud custom on the sly, he remains a thoroughly moral man. Such is orthodox church morality. It will pass muster by that standard. Its fundamental defect is that it compels and fosters the living of a double life. And its conscience, if it hav any, "makes cowards of us all." It is re-creating and perpetuating the myth—now made a most palpable fact—of the ancient Roman Janus. It may do—but poorly—for the childhood age of the world, when men, like children, prefer to be deceived and deceive themselvs.

The temple of this two-faced deity, now as of old, will not be closed till the incoming of that universal harmony which nature prophesies concerning man's interior state. She must be courted and won as the bride and basis of right. Then, and then only, will there be a marriage between the internal state and the external action.

In the observance of nature's law is found the only rational mode of growing better and happier. It is, therefore, the most beneficent. It never demands obedience without first showing that the course counciled is the most beneficial. It is, hence, based on the highest reason. Its laconic vocabulary is, "Yes," to the right; "No," to the wrong; pleasure for the former, pain for the latter. It is thus self-evident and omnipresent to man's five senses. It becomes to him an abiding demonstration, exacting faith only upon positiv knowledge.

It is unalterable, consequently absolute. It appeals equally to all persons, in all ages. It is that alone which possesses the attribute of the divine—"the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." Therefore it is universal, unlike man-made institutions, which fluctuate with successiv eras and influences. It constitutes the fundamental principle in all things. It hence antedates all other codes, which, at best, are pale and sickly photographs of this original eternal law. This fact stamps it God-originated, or natural. It is that "one God, one law, one element, and the one far-off divine event to which the whole creation moves."

These positiv qualities demonstrate its adequacy to produce a better moral condition for the race and a large proportion of happiness. It embodies the virtues of all artificial laws without incorporating their vagaries and vices. All civil codes and religious institutes are meritorious only in the proportion that they are based upon natural law, and not upon a fanciful revelation superstitiously received.

Such is this unvarying order or law governing the movement of the universe. It assumes the nature of law, because its violation is scrupulously followed by the wise and just penalty previously pointed out. This machine, multifarious in parts, but uniform in its workings, and of which man seems to be the microcosm or summing up, is, so far as we know aught to the contrary, its own intelligence, like the human body invested with its motiv power.

Amidst the domestic, social, and political anarchy to reinaugurate the reign of natural law now seemingly so Utopian, would be the panacea for existing abuses. The race is daily butchered by art and artifice. When, by the violation of natural law, a member of the race has degenerated so far as to injure others by first having injured himself, he should be treated, not as a criminal, but as a morally diseased person. He should be placed in a hospital for rational treatment, and there retained till reasonable evidence appears of regained manhood; that is, a yielding of voluntary obedience to nature's laws. "St. Anthony" ought to be taken care of on this basis.

According to this law each person in harmony with the measure of an uncorrupted nature and knowledge would be the medium of conveying its benefits to those around him. Thus alone shall we ever arrive at the ultimate truth that man "was originally wrought by nature, not by vile offense" of any statutory code.

The flagrant violation of these basic principles of human action, in recent arrests and prosecutions, is our only apology for this extended reiteration of them.

The Development of the Ape's Religion.

Moncure D. Conway in The Open Court.

"But as the first developed talkers and writers had been comparativly few, so the first men were comparativly few; and these, like their forerunners, were pursued by fear and jealousy of the half-humanized. In this higher commonwealth the dismal story of the anthropoid tribe was repeated. The aristocracies of intelligence and beauty were forced to flee, and in the end formed a society which began the works of human civilization. So it went on for ages. The ape seemed to hav died out of this new form. He might reappear in the fantastic tricks of boys, but education soon bound him. But, alas! though physically bound he survived morally, and, in the further progress of the human society, made himself felt. For man found himself surrounded by obstructions and enemies. Serpents, wild beasts, diseases, hurricanes, drouth, and famin beset him. He fought these bravely and steadily, made headway against them until it unfortunately occurred to some of the least courageous to try and explain them metaphysically. Now, there had been preserved from their ancient apehood a tradition of the wrathful gorillas or other creatures against which the more human forms had been defended. In dreams the hated and hunted ancestors of humanity hav been haunted by visions of the Angry Ape. There now arose some mystery-men who ascribed outward reality to the vision coined by fear, and imagined that there must be a gigantic Ape, creator and god of apes, who was angry and jealous at the way in which some of his creatures had taken the work of creation into their own hands. The idea once started, response came from the closeted ape lurking in each of the least developed. These now ascribed thunder and lightning, tempests and diseases, to the wrath of the Supreme Ape, and there grew a panic-stricken clamor for men who could pacify the Ape demon. In response to this clamor appeared the priesthood.

"The priesthood declared that the jealous and angry Supreme Ape would destroy them all unless they gave him the larger part of their food, and built temples to him, and in these supported a large number of men to kneel before him, acknowledge his supremacy, and sing his praises all the time. I hav somewhere one of the litanies to the Eternal Ape."

"I should much like to see it," said I.

The Chimpanzee went off and returned with some very old and dry palm-leaves, from which he read me the following

LITANY TO THE HOLY APE.

O Ape of Apes, we acknowledge thee to be our creator and ruler!
Thou art angry with us nearly every day.
Just art thou, visiting our sins upon our children.
Thou art so very, very just!
Anger is thy customary attitude.
Thou art angry that we should keep thee angry.
We hav wickedly eaten the fruit of knowledge. Mad art thou!
We hav walked in the light of our own eyes. Mad art thou!
We hav followed the guidance of our own hearts. Mad art thou!
We hav set before us the wisdom of man instead of fear of thee. Mad art thou!
We hav not remembered that the wisdom of man is foolishness to the Great Ape. Mad art thou!
Thou god of wrath!
Thou jealous god!
Thou god of battles!
Almighty Gorilla!
The sun is thy throne, and the sun-stroke thy scepter.
Whirlwinds are wheels of thy chariot.
Common sense cannot stand before thy uncommon abilities.
Thou sendest thy plagues and our reason is silenced.
The thunder is thy argument.
The logic of thy lightning is irresistible.
Weak-minded were he who would withstand the persuasivness of thy pestilences.
Pity, Everlasting Ape, our inherited depravity, our tendency to think for ourselvs!
Through accursed human knowledge we hav strayed from thy ways like lost monkeys.
Yet, O Holy Ape, much of the monkey is left in us still.
We can still turn from the tree of knowledge to the tree on which cocoanuts grow.
Though we look like men not much of the spirit of men is left in us.
We will part with all of it if thou wilt smile on us.
Thou shalt hav our virgins, or thy priests shall.
Also, two-thirds of our wool.
Likewise of our bread and butter.
All who deny thee shall be roasted.
Only spare us, spare us, Holy, Eternal, Omnipotent Ape!

Mrs. Slenker at Home Again.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER FRIENDS: I am home once more, for three months at least. We had a warm week of it, and in coming home had nine miles to ride in an open farm wagon, over the joltingest of roads, and the mercury way up into the hundred, and sun boiling down its best. For three hours we had its full force. I guess we imbibed enough of its life-giving rays to last us a century or so.

Neighbors and friends all seemed glad to see us home again, their only regret being that the case was not "dismissed." But I tell them they need not hope for that. There is too much anticipation of "something rich" cropping out of "the celebrated Slenker case." Press and people all about are too "eager for the fray" to allow it to subside. My decoys, McEffe and Barclay, did all they could to hav it tried then and there, so as to save them the trouble of going again. They owned up that they did not enjoy the stings of the Liberal press, and I was glad they were not callous to them. They freely confessed that I had intended no obscenity, and meant only good work in all I had done. But of course, the more they want it hurried, the less it was best for us to hurry it.

It was several days before we could get the indictment made out, and all settled so we could leave. The whole trip was exhausting—physically so because of the heat and worry, and financially so of necessity. I paid $28 80 for the pleasure of going to Abingdon and being indicted and returning home again to wait three months for the final trial. Then I had my lawyers to pay, and their expenses there and back. I could not but think, as I saw the crowds of men thronging back and forth between the hotel and court-house, some reeling with intoxication, and some fighting till blood dripped on the pavements, and the majority chewing, smoking, and otherwise debasing themselvs, that the imaginary crime of obscenity was but as a floating mote in the air to the real crimes against mind and body that passed scot-free all around us.

On my return home I found enough mail matter waiting for me to fill a trunk—books, papers, and letters—not one too many, though, for I need every good word, and even adverse criticisms are beneficial and suggestiv. I hav not had time to even read all the letters yet, as a week's absence at this time of year makes much home work necessary.

I will attend to all the book orders this week, save one or two who, as usual, gave no post-office address. Where one receives hundreds of letters, they cannot remember addresses, or even take time to look them up; so they should be on each letter and card, if answers are desired.

Contributions for defense are still coming, and all will be needed, for it will be a long, hard fight. I hope none of you will let your enthusiasm wane, but keep on doing all you can in the good work. The fact that the "disgusting" bill passed in New York and became a law shows the determination of the ignorant and conservativ majority to rule or ruin the wise and Liberal minority. But mind will conquer in the long run. They may fetter and bind, cramp and confine, but they can never kill or destroy a single truth. Eternal vigilance, persistent labor, and untiring energy will giv us the battle. Don't be afraid of work; even unpleasant work must be done if we would conquer the world's evils.

A friend wrote, commenting on my sexual labor, that she thought I had suffered martyrdom enough in working for a lifetime against creed and church, and that I was taking far too much upon myself in my old days by going so deeply into this sex work. But did not D. M. Bennett, at about the same age, do the same thing? Did not Harriet Martineau, one of the grandest of all workers, do precisely the same? Am I to stand back with folded hands, afraid to be smirched, hesitating to speak, when I see just the same need they saw? Nay! giv me liberty or death! I could not vegetate even in palace halls, and know the great need of humanity for work that only myself could do—for only ourselvs can ever do our work. Each of us has a world of our own, and we should never shirk its duties. Friends, look out for your rights, and your children's rights. Speak now while you hav the power. There is a joy in battling for liberty and freedom. The dangers only enhance the pleasures, and victory is ours if we do not supinely let the fitting moment pass unheeded by.

Dear friends, while you are doing and saying so much for my help and defense, I want you to know that I am also trying to help all I can. I hav received and answered about nine hundred letters since my arrest, and every one of them kindly. I hav mailed off bushels of books and papers, even to selling nearly all my private library, including presentation copies from friends. I hav given health, strength, and time, and shall continue to do so as long as I am able.

I think you all see by this time that, though a few may condemn methods, the work has been, and is still, a needful one, and that behind it are grand, noble, and true men and women who will dare all for liberty's sweet sake.

Three months of freedom are before me, and in that time I want to do all I possibly can, and earn all I can. So I ask you to please order Liberal books of me—my own and others that you may wish to read or loan to pious friends. I should like to hear from every Liberal friend, and to hav each of you send for at least one of my books.

I need the stimulus of letters, orders, and advice, lest thoughts turn in upon themselvs and grow morbid. Nothing like useful work for health of mind and body. That week in jail, with nothing to do, was a terrible experience. One can bear a great deal when it is in a righteous cause, and they feel that they are doing useful and effectiv work for human good.

I am glad to see the Defense Fund roll up. It has cost me thus far to be arrested, jailed, bailed, and indicted over two hundred dollars, including lawyers' fees, and yet the real trial has not commenced. I tremble to think what would hav been had not so many of you so generously come to my aid and assistance. I hope hundreds more will come before Oct. 25th. We need the names and influence of every one. It is a cause that needs personal support as well as financial, and this is why I ask even those who are ill able, to send their names, if but twenty-five cents accompany them.

Though the work be called by foul epithets, it is the purest, cleanest, and best work of the age; and the time will come when you will each and all see it so. There are few reforms of all the past where the pioneers hav not had to face the obloquy of foul names and the stings of the conservativs.

Never a truth has been destroyed;
They may curse it and call it crime,
Pervert and betray, or slander and slay
Its teachers for a time.

But reforms never go backward. This fateful one of sexual purity is bound to win.

The fountain of love shall be cleansed, and the dreams of heavenly affectionateness shall be realized on earth, and become a part and parcel of the inheritance of all life's children.

We hav great need to work, for those who are not for us are against us, and the against are countless, as only the wise few are favored to see the beacon-star of light. So we will push on—

While the followers there
In embryo wait behind;
We to-day's procession heading,
We the route for travel clearing,
Pioneers! O pioneers!—Whitman.

July 23, 287. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

IN my nativ land I hav stood, on the Fife shore of the Frith of Forth, on the daisied grass that was, only last century, a fiery Gehenna where maidens as lovely and mothers as leal as ever blessed man with their love or home with their faith perished in the devouring fire; perished with the Bible thundering, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv;" perished with the kirk of Scotland plying the flaming fagots and the fiery straw round woman's tender flesh, that writhed and shrunk and hissed in agony. I stood ankle-deep amid the grass and the buttercups, where, only in last century, the fires burnt out and left the ground covered with cinders and charred bones and remnants of half-roasted viscera. And why had I daisies there now instead of charred bones, and yellow buttercups instead of roasted hearts? Because now the Bible is weak and the Newspaper is strong; because Jehovah has begun to die, and Man has begun to liv; because humanity has dared to become a rebel to heaven and its book, and loyal to earth and its happiness; because the fangs of the falsely-called church of God are broken, and men and women are awakening from the horrible nightmare of Calvary and its skulls.—Saladin.

"The Design Argument."

That rare specimen in natural history, a Methodist troubled by Reason, has been found. He asks of the Christian Advocate:

"Christian people prove the existence of God by the design manifest in nature. Is there not a design in the attributes of God; and, if so, does it not argue a designer of God?"

To this budding logician Dr. Buckley replies:

"When Christian people show a design in nature, and draw from that the conclusion that there is a God, they boldly assume that God is the first great cause, and also assume his eternity. The word 'attributes,' as you use it, seems to show that you hav in your mind a sort of phrenological idea of God, and you conceive him as divided up. Put that out of the way, and hear his voice saying, 'I AM.' Then use your intelligence upon nature, and draw your presumptions from purpose in nature. But that will never induce anybody who did not believe in God before the attempt was made in that way to make him believe."

In his first and last sentences our learned doctor of divinity is right. The design argument is worthless without a monster assumption, and that assumption aids materially in destroying the argument. If the attributes of nature—her laws and their invariable fulfilment—argue design, so do the attributes of the designer compel us to find for him another designer. The God of the Christian is not one solid, eternal, persistent force, but a being who plans and repents—does and undoes—orders and revokes his orders—makes a law of nature and then performs a miracle to thwart it—in short, acts like a human being with a weak character and fickle disposition. He is "divided up" with attributes innumerable. If the possession of attributes argues a designer of these attributes, then God must hav had a designer. There is no escape anywhere or anyway from this conclusion. To say, "Put that thought out of the way, and hear his voice saying, 'I am,'" is biblical hocus-pocus, an appeal to a superstitiously reverenced authority to hide theological ignorance. It is no wonder that the admission is forced that the design argument will convert no one. To claim that it will, impeaches the reasoning powers of the world.

One World at a Time.

Almost every orator and writer of the McGlynn-George party winds up his speech or little piece with these words:

"And the time will surely come when God's will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven."

Now, we would respectfully suggest to the eminent gentlemen who are expounding God's will that it is about time to cease this claptrap and talk sense. In the first place, the existence of "God" is a debatable question; in the second, no one knows how things are done in heaven, and it is nowise likely that Mr. George's land theories hav been adopted there; in the third, if the Christian church doesn't know what God's will is, we don't believe Messrs. McGlynn and George do; in the fourth, every humbug preacher, every fighting tyrant, every enslaver of men, every persecutor of the human race, has invoked this same God, and declared him to be on his side.

It is time now to do something for humanity, and according to humanity. The world has for a great many centuries been run in the interest of God, and, if we may believe our new brace of social reformers, it has gone straight to the devil. Common sense, therefore, would seem to declare that the wiser course would be to run it in the interests of some one else for awhile. We know absolutely nothing of God's will in heaven, but we do know something of the poverty, the suffering, the injustice, that exist on earth.

A Specimen Christian Woman.

We printed last week the news of the death of Cornelius A. Marshall, president of the Newark, N. J., Liberal League. Mr. Marshall possessed many friends outside of Newark, and to them his death was wholly unexpected. One of them, living in Orange, scarcely credited the newspaper announcement, and wrote to Mr. Marshall's brother-in-law in Newark for information, inquiring if the deceased and the president of the League were identical. He received the following reply from that gentleman's wife:

"NEWARK, July 18, 1887.

"Dear Sir: Cornelius A. Marshall, deceased, was the president of the Newark Liberal League. His mind was diseased for the last ten years, and I am sorry to say he got mixed up with that organization. We gave him a Christian burial, such as he would hav liked had his mind been clear.

"His disease was purpura and consumption. His brother and the Knights of Pythias took charge of the funeral.

"Respectfully, MRS. JAS. H. VAN HORN."

It seems impossible that a woman could write such unkind words of her dead brother, and we do not think she would were not her mind twisted by religion, and her natural sisterly love turned to hatred by the poison of her creed. We knew Mr. Marshall well, and though, in our opinion, he made some foolish errors in his connection with Liberal work, no one could say his reason was unseated. He was earnest, and his mind was sharp and sound. He did much good and hard work for the Newark League, and is justly held in high esteem therefor. His sister's words are slanders for which the Christian religion is responsible.

The Editor and the Professor.

It seems from a correspondence between Prof. Egbert C. Smyth, the head and front of the Andover school of the future-probation doctrin, and the editor of the New York Independent, a Congregationalist journal of wide repute, that the expelled and censured professors can find but little scripture to support their theory. Mr. Bowen wrote to Mr. Smyth, asking him to name "those passages of scripture which giv hope that the heathen, who hav never in this life been offered salvation through Christ, will, after death, hav the opportunity to accept God's forgivness and be saved." Mr. Smyth wrote back that his friend Dr. Hincks would prepare a three-column "review of the biblical reasons" for supporting the future probation doctrin. Mr. Bowen rejoined that he wanted the passages of scripture pointed out, not reviewed. Mr. Smyth answered him that, if he wanted the review previously spoken of, Professor Hincks would prepare it. Mr. Bowen, with truly remarkable persistency, wrote again for the passages of scripture relied on to prove the Andover heresy to be Andover orthodoxy. Mr. Smyth retorted that the opinion was becoming prevalent that the Independent "is in danger of destroying its reputation for intelligent and helpful treatment of sacred scripture." Mr. Bowen then published the correspondence, remarking that Mr. Smyth and his confreres were helping the Infidels, and insinuated that a Wall street shark wouldn't be as mean as the Andover professors are in using trust funds to pay the expenses of propagating an opinion not shared by the corpse that once owned the cash.

This is a case where we can applaud a religious editor. The persistence with which he grappled for those passages of scripture commands our admiration. That he did not get them shows very conclusivly that they are not in the theological mudhole searched, and Mr. Smyth ought to hav owned up at once that it was no use searching for them. For it is a fact that the Bible givs the Andover professors no aid and comfort, the teaching of Jesus being that the man who did not believe on him should go to hell. Nothing is said about giving the heathen a second chance, and such a doctrin is plainly extra-biblical, and very gossamer of texture.

The fact of the matter is, if the New Testament is true, about ninety-nine of every hundred human beings will, when they die, eternally roast in fire, while the rest will sing songs of praise. It's a square up and down doctrin, proclaimed by Jesus and taught by all the Christians whose religion could remain unchanged by their humane feelings. If the New Testament is true, it is hell or heaven for the whole human race, past, present, and to come, including the heathen.

We trust, however, that the parties to this controversy will forgiv us if we remark that the absolute accuracy of the canonical scriptures is very generally questioned.

Another Land Scheme.

One hundred and twenty-four members of the English Parliament are in favor of the following land scheme propounded by Charles Bradlaugh:

"Ownership of land should carry with it the duty of cultivation.

"Where land capable of cultivation with profit, and not devoted to some purpose of public utility or enjoyment, is held in a waste or uncultivated state, the local authorities ought to hav the power to compulsorily acquire such land.

"The compensation is to be only the 'payment to the owner for a limited term of an annual sum not exceeding the then average net annual produce of the said lands.'

"The local authorities are to let the lands thus acquired to tenant cultivators.

"The conditions of tenure are to be such 'as shall afford reasonable encouragement, opportunities, facilities, and security for the due cultivation and development of the said land.'"

The first proposition, says Mrs. Besant, would destroy all large holdings, while not destroying private property in land. Idle landlords could not squat on land and evict would-be cultivators who did not pay rent. The tendency of the second, however, is to destroy private property in land, as it givs the nation supreme power over its land by giving the state power to eject landlords on a particular pretext—that of not using the land to the best advantage. The third clause, regulating compensation, is fair if it be recognized that man has no right to absolute ownership of the soil. Taking that view, to giv the ejected tenant compensation equivalent to just what he obtained from the soil itself would be just. But if a man can absolutely and inalienably possess land, then the scheme is decidedly unjust.

It will be noticed that Mr. Bradlaugh's scheme, like that of Henry George, depends upon a satisfactory answer to the question, Can men rightfully possess land which they may let lie idle, and evict therefrom other men who would cultivate it?

Leo Taxil.

Probably not half a dozen of our readers know Leo Taxil from Leo XIII., except as they know that the latter's name was never Taxil. But nevertheless, Mr. Taxil has been a gentleman of prominence, a virulent enemy of the thirteenth Leo, though now his friend and ally. Mr. Taxil is a resident of Paris, in sunny France, and, until a few years ago, was known as a Freethinker. His notoriety proceeded from his publication of the "Anti-Clerical Library," being illustrated pamphlets leveled at the Jewish Jehovah and the Jewish Jehovah's Christian church. Our readers will recollect the comic pictures reproduced from them on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER some months ago. Though not the works of the most elevated art, they are keen caricatures of the barbaric religion anomalously prevalent in some civilized countries. The text, in French, is ferociously witty, but of a character better appreciated in France than here.

We are reminded of these things by seeing in our American papers an extract from the Pall Mall Gazette, of London, reading thus wise:

"A curious scene was witnessed the other day at the Vatican. M. Leo Taxil, whose real name is Jongand, formerly wrote some of the most 'anti-clerical' works ever printed. According to his own account, while composing a diatribe against Joan of Arc he had to refer to the history of her trial and condemnation, and was so struck with the angelic character of the heroin that he felt himself suddenly converted to the very faith he was abusing.

"He proceeded instanter to Rome, to implore the pope's forgivness and blessing. His holiness at once granted him a private audience, which lasted half an hour, during which he wept at the feet of the holy father. At length the pope consented to giv him his blessing on the condition that in his future works he would labor to undo all the harm he had done to the Catholic church. M. Leo Taxil promised he would do his best, and departed. Before leaving, however, he had to make the piquant confession that he had not yet been able to convert his wife, who remained a hardened Atheist."

There seems to be something awry with the chronology of this incident, for it was first bruited abroad about two years ago. However, as this story is somewhat of an improvement upon the old one, we will accept it in lieu thereof, and all the more willingly as it enables us to pay a tribute to a woman. We lift our hat to Mrs. Taxil, and trust that she will ever resist the attempts of her husband to drag her down to the church of Rome.

There is another thing that we would say, connected with this case of recantation. When the story was printed two years ago, we made some inquiries, in answer to which we were told—and this was corroborated by the English press—that Leo Taxil had gone crazy.

Editorial Notes.

THIRTEEN Philadelphia churches hav been changed into factories and school-houses within the last few years. The Bulletin of that city correctly calls this "improvement's march."

THE next chapter of Professor Oswald's remarkably clear and able Contribution to the Religion of the Future will be published next week. In these papers Professor Oswald is building, on the ground cleared by science, an enduring structure of natural morality. And he is building it handsomely, too.

MR. I. W. GROH, author of "Is the God of Israel the True God?" writes us that only he has been excommunicated from the St. Paul Reformed church at Schaefferstown, Pa., and not his wife. He says: "It was the impression that they would also excommunicate her, because I informed them that she holds the same opinions, and desires to hav her name taken from the church roll. As we were not present at their meeting, but learned that the excommunication ceremony had been performed, I reported before I was apprised of the above fact."

THE discovery of a woman in the moon is announced by W. H. Burr, in a letter to the New York Sun. It was made more than a year ago by Dr. James M. Thompson, a retired physician of Washington. It is a profile occupying the west half of the moon, the dark spot above answering to the banged hair. She faces a little upward, and has a neck big enough to require a collar of the size that Mr. Cleveland wears. And yet she is good-looking. The profile may be seen through an opera-glass. And now, we suppose, the man in the moon must go. So turn the rascal out.

WE hav received the subjoined card from E. H. Heywood:

"PRINCETON, MASS., July 29, Y L. 15.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Thanks for inserting mine of the 16th, but you crossed out 'Y.L. 15,' and put '1887' in its place. By what right do you try to put back on my neck the A.D Christian yoke that, nine years ago, I deliberately repudiated? Since then Christian 'time' has been 'no longer' with me. Bennett and Abbot used to print dates as I sent them—permitting me to be 'crazy' or sane at my own risk and cost. I date in the year of love from the origin of the New England Free-Love League in Boston, Feb. 25, 1873. Truly yours, EZRA H. HEYWOOD."

We are very sorry to hav committed so great an outrage upon Mr. Heywood's personal liberty. He undoubtedly possesses the inalienable right to date his communications as absurdly as he pleases. But then, somewhere around about here, comes in our inalienable right to use our own discretion in editing THE TRUTH SEEKER.

SAYS the Milwaukee Sentinel in its issue of July 20th:

"But in this world which lies outside the influence of the pulpit, are men as intolerant as any who ever persecuted others for opinion's sake. They are not content to be amiably indifferent to what they consider the unwarranted license of affirmation in theology, but with the zeal of the bigot they make assaults on the church. They scorn the attitude of Goethe, who said: 'I keep silence at many things, and am well content if others can find satisfaction in what gives me offense.' Of this class of zealous bigots is Ingersoll. If his warfare were made at a time when religious intolerance took the form of political and personal persecution, it would hav an excuse; but to assail with tongue and pen the religious beliefs of men and women whose lives are good, is to be as intolerant as those he accuses of intoleraunce. It is not such men as Ingersoll who hav secured to men the right to be free in their opinions, and at the same time to be respectable. The cause of liberality was never advanced by illiberal advocates."

The proper place for the man who wrote that, if it expresses his honest sentiments, is in some asylum for infant idiots.

"HERESY, or what used to be called by that name," says the Nova Scotia Trades Journal, "seems to be becoming very common in orthodox Scotland. Both in the Free and Established Assemblies this year there were strong protests against some things in the Confession of Faith, and strong demands for that venerable document being revised. By some of the leading doctors the Confession was handled with scant courtesy. In fact, the whole thing was treated by those reverend gentlemen who had all subscribed to its doctrins as if the whole were a good joke. Laughter and cheers were the order of the day. The signing of the venerable document was treated as if it were a meaningless formality, and as if there were not any necessity of keeping up the pretense even of honesty when by their signatures men declared that that was 'the confession of their faith.' This is alarming, not as to whether the Confession of Faith is correct or not, but as exhibiting the miserable Sadducean dishonesty and levity with which reverend gentlemen can treat their own signatures and oaths. One said truly they 'were quibbling with the church and paltering with their consciences.' A church is in a bad way when its office-bearers sign its creeds with a mental reservation, or treat the whole thing as a good joke or a transparent farce. For such a church reformation or destruction is not far off. Think of a reverend doctor and theological professor saying that 'the Confession of Faith could not be honestly signed by any man whose mind was open to the religious impressions of the day.' And yet he himself had signed that Confession, and it is through his having done so that he holds his present position and draws his yearly salary. A nice man he is to teach his students honesty and courageous uprightness."

"THE Fathers of Our Republic" received the following indorsement from the pen of Colonel Ingersoll: "MY DEAR REMSBURG: Accept my thanks for 'The Fathers of Our Republic.' I was greatly interested in the lecture, and at the time I heard it hoped it would be issued in book form. You hav done a good work, and hav done it well. Your facts are stated in an admirable way, and your conclusions justly and naturally drawn. The pamphlet will do great good. The minds of thousands will be disabused. It has been and still is the business of most ministers and priests to show that all the great dead—the patriots, scientists, and philosophers—were small enough, and ignorant enough, and hypocritical enough to pretend to be what they were not, and to believe what they did not. Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL."

A MINISTER writing to the Christian at Work from West Virginia reveals his discovery of a book describing Maryland, by George Alsop. The book was written two hundred years ago. Mr. Alsop was an enthusiastic admirer of Maryland and her institutions, and among the many marvels he found there when he came from England was Roman Catholics and Episcopalians dwelling together without bloody warfare. Such a state of affairs he never before conceived possible. In admiring surprise he writes:

"Here the Roman Catholick and Protestant Episcopal concur in unanimous parallel of friendship and inseparable love intoyled into one another. All inquisitions, martyrdoms, and banishments are not so much as named but unexpressably abhorred by each other. The several opinions and sects that lodge within this government meet not together in mutinous contempts to disquiet the power that bears Rule, but with renewed quietness obey the legal commands of Authority."

Because of this phenomenon, and the fact that the people of Maryland usually had enough to eat, he calls her The Miracle of this Age.

A VERY large proportion of the sixty-eight thousand votes received last fall by Henry George, candidate for the mayoralty of this city, were cast by the Socialists. Since then, however, Mr. George and his aiders and abettors hav shown small respect to this class of supporters, and hav endeavored to curry favor with the conservativs of society by repudiating them. Naturally enough, the Socialists resent this conduct, and in the election of delegates to the coming convention of the United Labor party at Syracuse they are coming out strong. In several districts the George men hav been defeated, and pledged and known Socialists chosen delegates. The proceedings at the primary in the Tenth Assembly district on the 27th ult. are interesting. After much quarreling between the George men and the Socialists, the meeting arrived at the voting point, with the Socialists several laps ahead numerically and oratorically. Three Socialist tellers were appointed, and the voters put their ballots in the hat. There were 140 votes cast, and only 111 voters present. The George men wanted the vote declared at once, but the Socialists roared dissent. They accused the George men of stuffing the hat, which was denied, but feebly. On a second ballot, the Socialist delegates were elected. The sympathy of the general public will in this case go with the Socialists. It was scarcely fair, after their support of George last fall, to giv them the cold shoulder for the sake of pleasing the conservativs who did not, and never would, vote for Mr. George. Whatever we may think of Socialism, to entertain that philosophy can scarcely be deemed as discreditable as stuffing ballot-boxes.

WHAT a Chicago journal calls "the rock ahead in woman suffrage" came to light in a recent convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, at Rock Island, Ill., after a speech by Mrs. Clara Neymann, of this city. The Union, as is well known, is an organization of the most fanatical women in the Christian church, while Mrs. Neymann is a very heterodox person. Her paper at this convention dealt exclusivly with woman suffrage, but it did not satisfy her Christian sisters, if we credit the correspondent of the Boston Woman's Journal, who wrote to that paper:

"Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, state president of the Illinois Woman's Christian Temperance Union, spoke of the paper presented by Mrs. Neymann. She said she had heard names quoted—Emerson, John Stuart Mill, and Herbert Spencer—eminent names that would liv for years, perhaps, but not one word of Jesus, to whom alone this reform could look for permanent support. She was first of all a Christian, then a temperance woman, and, last of all—having come to the position 'gingerly,' as her hearers would witness—a believer in suffrage for women on temperance grounds. She was tired of hearing the old, threadbare cry, the long harped-on tune, of 'woman's rights,' preached by the godless women who had been leaders in the cause. She spoke with much vehemence, and struck the pew with her hand to enforce her remarks."

The same criticism of the suffrage workers was forced upon the Cook county Women's Suffrage Association by Mrs. M. E. Holmes, president of the Illinois Suffrage Association. Mrs. Holmes claimed that "the one thing necessary was to consider the relation of suffrage to the church; that suffragists stand out from church work too much. She claimed that they cannot do the work until they, as suffragists, get into the churches; that a strict spiritual as well as a suffrage society is necessary. She said this is the only way to get the church people in the work. A strong feeling is prevalent that suffrage has nothing to do with religion, and if that be the case, she wanted nothing to do with suffrage." The advocates of woman suffrage will find, like all reformers, that Christian allies are a detriment rather than a help. Unless the reform will make to the glory of God, the sewing circle, and the beloved pastor, the dear sisters will hav none of it.

THE story goes that a Wolf, seeing a Lamb drinking at a stream below him, resolved to find some plea which should justify to the Lamb himself his right to eat him. He therefore accused him of roiling the water. The Lamb called the attention of the Wolf to the fact that he was below the Wolf and could not possibly effect the water upstream. The Wolf then charged him with insulting him the year previously, but the Lamb replied that he was not then born. After a further conversation, in which the Lamb had decidedly the best of the argument, the Wolf seized him, remarking that he would not go without a victim even though the Lamb refuted every one of his imputations. There is, therefore, a similarity between the Wolf and Anthony Comstock, as represented this week by our front-page picture.

THE Rev. J. A. Scott, of Hot Creek, Va., writes the following charges against the Christian church:

"In the Southern states the negro Baptist preachers [and perhaps others] are very ignorant, very venal, and hav great control over their people. In nearly all sections of the South, in closely contested elections, the effort is made to bribe the preacher, and through him control the congregation. This effort is largely successful. Few negroes can resist a bribe. The church is prostituted for money to be the servant of corrupt political partisans.

"The English prelatical church, and other established churches receiving from the civil power protection and support and honor, pay it back in loyal protestations and service. The church serves the state as its master. Note the loyalty of the Anglican church to the Stuarts. Note the Toryism of the Episcopalians during the Revolutionary war.

"Several of the Protestant churches of this country hav voluntarily sold themselvs or bestowed their church influence to the furtherance of some political issue. For instance, the Northern Methodists enacted and tried to enforce Abolitionism; the Northern Presbyterians decided to uphold the Federalists as opposed to the State's Rights interpretation of our Constitution, and to compel its people so to do. And various denominations hav since, protesting their loyalty to the present government, sought to, by way of return, shape its policy. They memoralize it about how to treat the Mormons, Prohibition, Knights of Labor, etc. Of course this is apart from the proper work of the church. The church teaches her members to be good citizens, but she has nothing to do with dogmatizing about forms of government or questions of civil policy. Whenever she has done so she has blundered, and her shame has sooner or later become manifest.

"But chiefly the Romish church has sold herself to the governments on earth. It is her policy in every land. Through her priests she controls her people. Everywhere she trafficks with the civil power, to enhance her ecclesiastical prerogatives. In the United States she sells her votes to the party that is most subservient, and that gives the largest returns in the way of money and influence. In Ireland she, so far as she dares, throws her influence with the Home Rule party, to maintain her power over them. In Germany she sells her influence to despotic Bismarck, that she may increase the influence of her bishops. Such is her policy. Everywhere, for her own advancement, she bargains and trafficks with the powers of the world. And it is to that shameless and persistent policy that she owes her worldly grandeur and power."

Mr. Scott's criticism of the Northern Methodists is scarcely deserved. The Methodists of the North did not really want to "enact Abolitionism," but they were driven to it at last. Aside from this, Mr. Scott's indictment is a true bill.

Two Magazines.

The two articles in the Popular Science Monthly for August that will more particularly interest Freethinkers are Andrew D. White's "New Chapters in the Warfare of Science," and Grant Allen's "Progress of Science from 1836 to 1886," taken from the Fortnightly Review. The Monthly shows no falling off from its high standard since the death of its founder.

The Forum for August contains eleven papers of interest to almost everybody. From partisan Governor Foraker to peaceful Professor Ely, the writers are men of exceptional ability, though most of them are conservativly and piously wrong in their philosophizing. The Forum is published at 97 Fifth avenue.

Tortured by Means of Christian "Science."

A Physician's Letter in Boston Evening Transcript.

I make this protest because of the agony and death which a so-called Christian science practitioner has brought to an aged woman. For months she had been allowed to suffer, and her life has been shortened by weeks, and perhaps by months. Less than three months ago I was asked to see this poor woman, who had been under the care of a Christian scientist for more than six months. I found her in a very feeble condition, hardly able to get out of bed alone, and blanched from the continual loss of blood. She was told, however, that nothing was the matter, and that she must act after such a belief. On examination I found that she was suffering from cancer, which had been allowed to advance so far that it was impossible to remove it by operation. Much, however, could be done to relieve the intense pain and check the loss of blood. The "scientist" had full control, and notwithstanding the patient's protestations of weakness and pain, she was told to forget it, and was urged into the street. The patient was not allowed to use the ordinary means of relieving pain, such as hot cloths, because "in reality there was no pain." Now, what was needed was the most absolute quiet. As the result of her efforts to be about there were frequent and very profuse hemorrhages. The patient was told that she was getting better. A few days before her death, after dragging herself down three flights of stairs and into the street, a hemorrhage began, which lasted all night. Being alone, and having used every available article, she was obliged to tear up a blanket in her endeavor to stanch the flow of blood. In the morning she was again told that it was of no account, and that the disease was passing from her. When the patient, with some doubt in her mind, referred to the torn blanket she was told that it merely told how strong she was. Her faith in this mode of treatment at last gave way. A bed in one of the hospitals of the city was procured for her, but she died on the following day before she could be removed to it.

Letters from Friends.

ANDOVER, July 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am one week in the rear, but credit me from July 1st. I don't want to miss one paper; too good to be lost. I may not want the old lien long, for I am nearly eighty years old, but here is $3 to venture for another year. May truth increase and fogyism decrease.

WARREN STRICKLAND.

MARSHFIELD, OR., July 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, half of it to pay for the paper for another year for myself, and the balance to pay for it for a year to be sent to Prairie City, Ill. I hope you will continue the pictures in the paper, for they are not only amusing, but very instructiv in illustrating and showing up some of the many humbugs and wrongs that are being perpetrated upon a credulous and superstitious world.

S. P. Putnam was here a short time ago, and gave a number of his thought-awakening lectures, and, judging from the numbers that were out to hear him, I think they will bear good and abundant fruit. In fact, I certainly think there are but few men, if any, that are doing the same amount of good in this land that he is, with his earnest and logical lectures, together with the disposal of the many Freethought books and pamphlets, and securing of many subscribers to your valuable paper. Long may he and others of his faith liv to struggle for the right. W. A. GILMORE.

605 RIVER STREET, TROY, N.Y.

MR. EDITOR: If you hav space in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I wish you would print in them for me the following appeal: I am a young man and hav a family, and I am tired of living in New York state working for another man. I want for myself and family to work. I want to go out where the earth, the air, and the sunlight are free. Now, I wish some of the subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER would giv me some idea of the government land in the Western states. I see a great many articles printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER that hav been written by parties who live in Colorado, Iowa, Wyoming, Illinois, Wisconsin, Nebraska, and other states. Will they please be so kind as to giv me some idea of the land in their vicinity—land that I can liv on and cultivate for five years and then call my own? Or, perhaps, some Infidel is rich enough to giv me some land, for they are very liberal people. They can notify me by letter. I am an American and an Infidel, and am not afraid to sign myself as such. S. D. JEFFERS.

TEXAS, MICH., July 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Is it necessary, in order to show our lack of faith in prayer to a being no one knows anything about, to resort to the orthodox style of writing Sunday-school yarns?

In your issue of June 11th S. P. Wood, of Kalamazoo, Mich., tells a tale of horror, if true, of a small child slipping into an eight-inch well, and that God, as usual, did not come to the aid of the praying mother.

Now, the above story fully illustrates the non-interference of the gods in human affairs. But, alas for the story! like the Christian's account of the blasphemer that was turned to fire, it lacks the element of truth. I hav lived in Kalamazoo county, Mich., over fifty years, and never heard of such an accident; and, to add to the impossibility of such an account being true, there is not known such a rocky ledge within fifty miles of Kalamazoo.

No use telling Sunday-school stories to wipe out faith in a prayer-answering God. Let the faithful believer point to one well-authenticated case where the gods responded to the cry of a grief-stricken mother. L. S. BURDICK.

FORT MADISON, IA., July 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for subscription due. I hav been expecting to get one or two names to send in with mine, and in fact hav one partly promised, but am too busy to see them now. I shall work for them all the same after sending mine.

I am very much pleased with the way you conduct the paper, and notwithstanding we do not agree on the subject of immortality, still I hav not one word of censure.

Of course, we are all well pleased with Brother Putnam. He is a genial, good fellow, and a gentleman "from the ground up." He gave me much more than I care to claim when he wrote me a Spiritualist, for I am quite sure 95 per cent of the phenomena is fraud for money-making. I am "rock-rooted" on the continued existence philosophy, and hav no fears that my individuality will ever be destroyed; and to the friends who entertain similar views (and all others) I wish to extend a cordial "shake"—failing here, to be given on the other shore; or, as our Christian friends say, "beyond the bounds of time and space."

J. R. TEWKSBURY.

AYER, MASS., July 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I felt well repaid for going three miles in the hot sun and returning in the dark (though with more light than when I went) to listen to the inspiring words of that champion of Freethought, L. K. Washburn. His avalanche of logic and truth, exposing the superstition, ignorance, fraud, and pretense of the Christians, fell serenely on the full-fledged Freethinkers, while it was quite too warm for the pinfeathered tribe, and altogether too much light for those just emerging from the orthodox shell, who had not supposed the world was so full of light. The orthodox were grieved and chagrined to see their idols thus smitten by the sword of truth which proceeded out of the mouth, and turned every way to guard the way of the tree of life—the freedom of man, woman, and child.

And the wail that was afterward heard: "Oh, if we only had the power the church once had we would hunt these Infidels down! They should no more endanger our craft. We would accept their blood in lieu of the blood of Christ!"

This inspired apostle of truth challenged the Christians to show wherein they carried out the precepts of their divine master, but it was much easier to show wherein they did not than wherein they did. When the lecturer compared the Bible to John Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," I was reminded of Bunyan's "holy war," prophetic of the battle now being fought—the bombardment of eye-gate and ear-gate. The bolts, bars, and keepers are inside, short of ammunition, acting only on the defensiv, and their sure surrender is only a question of time.

The cheerful faces of the Freethinkers evinced their love of music—the rattling of the dry bones of historic Christianity; while the Christians wore mourning for their wounded idols, and their sad faces showed how painfully they swapped human affections for the love of the deities—left the warm, growing, green earth for the skies. The protracted prayer-meetings were proof that they loved darkness rather than light.

I should say Brother Washburn was a good commander of heavy artillery, and is well practiced with siege guns. His early experience as a sharp-shooter while in the church was good practice for the heavy work. Long may he liv to break the shell of superstition and let the oppressed go free and giv sight to the blind, is the confident hope of

Yours truly, ELIJAH MYRICK.

HANNIBAL, MO., July 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You hav doubtless been informed that a separation of the Moralist Society of this city has taken place. I feel it to be a duty, which is mine in common with others who are cognizant of the facts and equally interested, to giv without undue emphasis an impartial account of this so-called separation. The objects for which this society was formed are briefly and plainly set forth in its constitutional declaration of principles: "To promote the development of a general diffusion of knowledge on all subjects appertaining to the amelioration of the human race, and that enlightened reason is the highest tribunal known to man by which we are to be condemned or exonerated. No dogmatical acknowledgment is required as a prerequisit to membership. But the sole requirement, aside from social and moral fitness, is an acquiescence in all the elementary truths of human intelligence, and the right to think on any and all subjects as to them may seem best; and, above all, to show charity and tolerance, which alone constitute what is known as Liberalism."

These claims were contained in the constitution when the Spiritualists joined the society about six years ago, since which time there has been a most perfect unanimity on all questions of Liberalism, no Spiritualistic discourse having in that time been delivered before the society.

Actuated by these sentiments, the Spiritualistic portion hav given their most hearty coöperation, having in view the highest aims and purposes of the society.

About a month ago a few discontents, for no known cause, calling themselvs Agnostics, sought to break up the society by first getting possession of all the property belonging to the society. They then induced the superintendent to order a called meeting on a very short notice, and passed a resolution, declaring the Spiritualistic portion of the society separated from the society. No question of this kind had ever been brought before or discussed by the society. They then held a meeting among themselvs, and made and adopted an amendment to the Moralist constitution, debarring all "Christians, Spiritualists, and free-lovers from membership in the society." The Moralist Society met in regular session at its quarterly meeting on the first Sunday in July, and ignored entirely the proceedings of this called meeting, on the ground that as no belief or unbelief is a fundamental principle of the society, therefore the position taken is unconstitutional, and cannot be made a cause of separation.

J. B. CHESLEY.

NEWPORT, ME., July 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot satisfy my conscience till I tell you and the readers of your truly valuable paper what my feelings were while reading Parker Pillsbury's book, "The Plague and Peril of Monopoly."

So deep down was I stirred that I wanted every man and woman in the world to read it. Is that book, full of startling facts, to be read by a comparativly few, when it ought to be scattered broadcast and read by millions? Unless the people awake to a realization of the true condition they are in, another "sea of blood" is sure to come to this nation. When he says, "Oh, but there is such a need of intelligence everywhere!" my soul was sick and sad, because it is true. While the people hav been, and are, asleep, they are being bound hand and foot. To me the situation is appalling, and I fear that only the thunder of another bloody revolution will awake them. I earnestly hope the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will send for thousands of copies of this book.

But what is the cause of this fearful condition of things? How came this about? How did a few become so vastly rich? By what power do they hold all the wealth? Has pay for the use of money, called usury or interest, been the cause of bringing the people to the state of slavery they are in? There is, there must be, some great underlying cause for this appalling state of things, and unless the people know why they are in bondage, why a few hold these vast estates, why their incomes are so enormous, we make but slow progress toward a solution of this momentous question. Could men amass the vast amount of wealth they do if it were not for the pay they got for the use of money, called interest? I am in earnest about this intensely important subject. Who will answer it?

To "A Poor Man from Kent" I will say, the first thing for the people to do is to demand of the government that it take its robber hands out of the people's pockets; that it shall repeal a great many laws, and that it stop "making" laws. I want law-makers, state and national, to stop legalizing crime. Countless millions of days' work are done every year by the poor to get money to pay for the use of money, called interest, when it should be free. Never until this system of infernalism, interest on money, is stopped can the people hav their rights.

I want the people to demand of the government that it abolish the army and navy immediately. Armies are kept for the sole and only purpose to keep the people from asserting their rights. It costs billions of days' work of the producers to support this entirely useless, disgraceful affair, an army and navy.

I want the government to abolish their custom houses, and giv us free trade. When the army is disbanded, and those legalized robbers, custom-house officers, and the soldiers go to work, there will be millions less paupers to support, which will do a great deal to help the poor to a home.

And now a word about going home sober. As it has been hundreds of years that the stomach has been a receptacle for all manner of abominable food, it will take a long while for men to get a natural, healthy appetite, so I will not discuss that question, though it would be a pleasure to do so.

To me it is very easy to see "if no land is to be sold," everyone would hav a plenty. When people stop selling the land, men will not hav to build a house on "land belonging to another." Every man has a natural right to land enough by a reasonable amount of labor for a home, and the vandal hand of the usurer should never touch it, and it never should be taxed, Henry George to the contrary notwithstanding.

"The debts of our country." If you mean the "public debt," so-called, I say, if the people were not slaves they would never pay another dollar, for it has already been paid in principal and interest. And as for private debts, so-called, when the interest equals the principal, the debt is paid. Whether "the capitalist puts in more hours than the poor man" is of not much consequence. In every kind of business in the world there should be coöperation, and finally community life, where they shall "hold all things common," and work for love. This, and this only, will prove to be the panacea for all the ills or woes that afflict the race. Never until the people stop working for pay, and grow to a condition of true human brotherhood, and work each for the good of all, will there be peace on earth and good will among men and women. Upon that principle I hav worked for many years. Brother, will you join my church?

SEWARD MITCHELL.

BURLINGTON, KAN., July 4, 1887.

To ELMINA: You are sixty-three, and I am sixty-nine. We hav lived to witness many changes in the arts and sciences, in mechanics, and in politics and religion. The railroads for the transportation of passengers and freight from the rock-bound coast of the East to the Golden Gate of the West, and from the frozen regions of the North to the summer land of the South, were unknown when you and I were enjoying our childhood days. And we can realize, too, that in politics and religion we hav not progressed as in the above-named sciences and mechanics. We well remember when we had in our United States Senate chamber senators who were men of renown—a Webster, Calhoun, Silas Wright, Henry Clay, Hayens of South Carolina, Louis Cass of Michigan, and others who were noted for their patriotism and integrity.

We had no sleuthhound of the ilk of Comstock sneaking around the national capital to approach senators and representativs to buy them for a few shekels to support his inquisitorial schemes to decoy innocent people into his construction of crime in violating his obscenity laws, emanating from his bigoted and superstitious mind, and a clan of inquisitors called the Young Men's Christian Association, endeavoring, with other Christian parties, to get control of our government. And, our Congress having retrograded from the high position that it occupied in those days into a body (with few exceptions) of millionaires and attorneys for the railroads, banking and other monopolies, we can realize how those infamous laws were enacted that you are arrested under and condemned as a criminal by an unprincipled, subsidized press, and an ignorant populace who are controled by the priesthood and dishonest politicians, for endeavoring to educate the people on the baneful influence of intemperance on themselvs and their posterity. But you know that according to the Christian standard of morals (the Bible), one of the first commands given to Adam and Eve was to be fruitful, multiply, and replenish the earth. And the clergy will not be condemned for not trying to fulfil the command. And Paul, who is the author of two-thirds of the New Testament, advises that if a man take a virgin unto himself, let him do whatsoever he will to her. There is no sin; let them marry.

Elmina, I hav learned that there are too many of our professed Liberals who are not free from their superstitious notions of obeying unjust laws which hav been enacted by ignorant and unprincipled legislators. The Comstock obscenity law, as I understand, was passed by our Congress in the last small hours of a session, when the members were more or less asleep under the effect of intoxicating beverages and anxious to adjourn and go home. The law demonitizing silver in 1873 was enacted under similar circumstances, and members acknowledge since that they did not understand the features of the bill; and the president (Grant) pleaded the same ignorance for his dereliction of duty after he approved it.

I hav cited you a few of the many unjust laws enacted in the last twenty years in the interest of church and a corrupt state, and proving that our civilization is very deficient in moral principle.

You are arrested under the notorious Comstock law, and condemned as a criminal and felon for committing no offense, against the rights of the people, but to satisfy an ignorant priest-ridden populace, and an unprincipled, superstitious, and bigoted priestcraft. And you are not alone. Seven men are confined in prison in Chicago for committing no crime, but exercising the right of the freedom of speech contrary to the dictum of the monopolistic power and a subsidized press, and the ignorance of the court, jury, and people. What will be the end it is difficult to divine. I cannot assist you financially, for I am crippled with rheumatism in my feet, hands, and arms, and hav given up all manual labor, and it is difficult to write. Hoping that you will be liberated, I remain,

Your friend, CHRIS. BROWN.

MR. EDITOR: We in this county are literally enshrouded by Christian ignorance and Christian bigotry; nevertheless, I am glad when I can send even a small order to THE TRUTH SEEKER office. I am not quite alone, but I at times feel very lonely and poor because ostracism in its most virulent form is ever present. JOHN M. LOGAN, M.D.

LEON, IA., July 18, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Miss Katie Kehm, of Ottumwa, Iowa, gave two lectures near Leon, Iowa—out-door meetings—subjects, "Religion of Humanity," and "The Influence Christianity Has on the Minds of the Rising Generation." They were delivered July 10th and 17th to good audiences, and were a success in every particular. J. W. LONG.

MR. EDITOR: Not receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER as usual, I reasoned that its failure to appear was my own fault, as I had not renewed my subscription for the present year, which I now hasten to send you, together with a new subscriber. I feel your paper is a necessity, and I do not intend to do without it, and the least that I can do is to wish you well and renew promptly.

Inclosed please find $5 for the same and oblige,

Yours truly, CLARK BURCHARD.

MARSHFIELD, OR., June 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3, for which we wish you to send us THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Mr. Putuam, your famous lecturer, has just been here sowing Freethought seeds. I think in time there will spring up a tree of liberty of thought even here, where there are two churches among a population of five hundred.

Mr. Putnam left a part of himself here in the way of books of his own writing. I hav read "Adami and Heva," "Lend a Hand," "Problems of the Universe," "Waifs and Wanderings," and "A Lay Sermon" by Robert G. Ingersoll; and I think when I get them all properly digested I will be a pretty good Liberal. He was kindly received here, even by those who differed with him in his theological views. Perhaps he has already sent you the nice little notices both papers here gave him. Mr. Putnam, as well as being a good lecturer, is quite a romancer; "Waifs and Wanderings" I liked very much. Fiction is a part of literature, I think, that should be true to our human nature in the characters, even if the plot is somewhat fairy-like. Fiction is read more than any other literature; our boys stuff their pockets with dime novels, and our girls read them inside their grammars at school. I sometimes think if we could weave something in this for the good of the young no better work could be done.

My husband had not made up his mind to take THE TRUTH SEEKER when Mr. Putnam was here. Will you please tell me who George Francis Train was, what kind of a writer he was, and if he is living now? E. A. H.

[George Francis Train is an eccentric philosopher, at present living in New York. He is about sixty years of age, and spends his time in Madison Square Park among the children. He has been wealthy, but is believed to hav lost the greater part of his money. He is a rather witty writer, though more noted for his eccentric style than any great merit. He is generally regarded as a "crank."—ED. T. S.]

BUSHNELL, ILL., July 15, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read Mr. R. G. Ingersoll's tribute to Henry Ward Beecher. It is a very fine production, and, I suppose, very appropriately applied to the minister so long the ruling star of Plymouth church. He seemed to use all there is in genius's thought upon the great theologian. Yet it seems to me he was very much limited in his task as far as theology was concerned. The denunciation of endless punishment by Mr. Beecher seemed to giv Mr. Ingersoll his greatest admiration for Beecher. It was that dogma of the orthodox creed that Mr. Beecher denounced as without justice, mercy, or goodness that secured the esteemed admiration. True, Mr. Ingersoll speaks highly of that bravery, independence, and moral courage that Mr. Beecher possessed, before which many theologians would quail with intimidation, also of the great preacher's magnanimity, his enlarged, generous, and liberal views when directed and molded by his reflections on the investigation of nature, and of the great goodness of his heart. These all received a share, and probably not too much, of the great orator's eulogy. That hight of goodness, charity, and mercy that Mr. Beecher reached in his expression and declaration, "I will not serve a God who has an endless punishment for his subjects," furnishes the greatest boom for the tribute. The ability of the man was good; the rejection of everlasting punishment one of his greatest acts. He seemed to add to his merits by adding to the character of God.

But the real Liberals in general, whether those born at Mr. Beecher's time or since, will ask for a more thorough denunciation of theological falsehoods—the doctrin of original sin, the fall of man, the son of God from the ghost, and Virgin Mary story, the vicarious atonement, and the forgivness of sins, not from the one against whom you hav sinned, and many more absurd ideas in the orthodox creeds. Yet Mr. Beecher could single out but one of the abominable lies, and it seemed as though he dare not expose the others. But we are gratified and thankful for humanity's sake that the efforts of great men are engaged to correct some of the mistakes and errors of the creeds. S. WEST.

CITY OF FARIBAULT, MINN., July 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Fully realizing the value of your time, still I feel it a duty to encroach upon it far enough, at least, to render to you most sincere and hearty thanks for the favors shown me. I received the ANNUAL of 1886, and hav read it carefully. It contains several very useful hints and suggestions, besides much information which I shall use as seed when I go out again to sow. I always scatter a little seed upon every field that I pass by, and hav caused several people to stare when I hav called their attention to the enormous amount of church property that is untaxed, and several other points. I believe I hav a little mission on this earth, and, as I am able, I shall labor for the upbuilding of the temple of truth, and razing of the old ruin of error, that the hoot-owls of superstition and priestcraft may be without a resting-place in our land. Faribault is the head and front of Episcopalianism in the Northwest, and here it has its bishop, its schools—which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, the finest and most magnificent buildings of our beautiful city. Here, also, is the place where they (the Christians) boasted, two years ago, when I had been here but a few months, that if I did not "join" they would starve me out in six months. If any of our folks come this way, please call, and we won't let you starve. I am enlisted for life, and mean to fight it out and die in the ranks, starve or otherwise.

Belief avails nothing, therefore it is folly for me to say what I believe, but I believe in a supreme power. I don't know much of that power, and the little knowledge I do possess does not prove him a fiend. I teach that if there is immortality for man (which I hope, and trust, and fully believe there is), man's happiness, then as now, will depend upon not what he has believed, but upon what he has done. Good works, a pure life, a noble life, a life devoted to the welfare of his fellow-men, a life upon which a man may look back without regret, will enable him to look forward without fear. I also teach that there is no forgivness for sin, nor punishment, except in the remembrance of the crime, which is always with us, whether we liv seventy or seventy million of years. Rewards and punishments are with us and in us, and are not from God, nor Jesus, who could bestow immortality no more than any other Jew or any other man, nor yet rob memory's urn of one grain of dust.

I write this to you that you may know something about me, and the effort that I am making; not because I feel that it is great, but that, if you will be so very kind, you may correct me where I go astray, and giv me truth where I hav error.

I intend to devote my whole time and attention to this matter as soon as I am able to do so, fully realizing that I must go out without recommendation or favor, with organized bands of church wolves to bark at my heels—but also satisfied that truth is mighty and must prevail.

If I dared, I would ask a question. Why not fix upon some time to date from that will not divide time into two parts? Why hav a B.C. and an A.D.? Why not fix upon a date that all historical literature and events can be arranged along upon a straight line? What do we care about when Jesus was born?

Now, thanking you for your patience, if you hav been patient, I will close with the names of some whom I think would be pleased to receive a copy of your paper, and who might subscribe. You will, of course, use your judgment as to sending the sample copies. DR. SEELEY.

HAVANA, CUBA, June 29, 1887.

FELLOW TRUTH SEEKERS: I don't desire to bore you with worthless trash, and, knowing that we hav at the helm the veritable Franklin of the age, Mr. Eugene Macdonald, to hold me in check, I will now lay before you a few ideas relativ to what I deem one of the most important subjects of our time.

I think I can safely predict that, ere long, England will hav afloat guns that can be made to throw red-hot shot a distance of twenty miles; and I think that I can now giv the plans for a gun that would do it. Had England such guns—and we don't know but that she has—and were she to go to war with us, she might steam along at full speed off Long Island, and leisurely lay New York and Brooklyn in one vast expanse of ruins; or, instead thereof, place the United States under bonds to the extent of thousands of millions of dollars in order to save those cities, and the wealth therein contained—which wealth has, to a great extent, been hoarded up there in the form of magnificent edifices by a goodly number of scheming, swindling, Tweedy, Sharp fellows who hav succeeded by and through swindling tricks that they, for a long time, hav been playing upon the gawkies throughout our entire Union.

After England, or any other foreign power, in collusion with our capitalists at home, might hav succeeded in thus securing against us bonds to the extent of thousands of millions of dollars, the gawkies, throughout our Union, would be compelled to writhe under an onerous and burdensome taxation to pay the interest on those bonds and for their final liquidation. Oh, what another great haul the capitalists would rake in from the gawkies!

Were you to go to Liverpool you would behold magnificent graving-docks there, extending for eight or ten miles along the Mersey, into which docks, when the tide is high, the largest steamer may ride with absolute safety, and after six hours, when the tide may hav gone down, the water-tight gates of that great granit apartment may be closed, and the steamer left perfectly high and dry for inspection, repairs, or for preservation; and, when desired, the gates at high tide may be opened, and when the water may hav flown in around the steamer, she may be floated out into the river and steam away to the ocean.

Now, I will ask my fellow-gawkies why it is that we don't build any such docks at New York, to which some one will say, "Why, you goose, don't you know that the tide doesn't ebb and flow to the extent of nearly thirty feet at New York, as it does at Liverpool?" To which I would say, "Why, yes, old gander, but we hav the beautiful Hudson at New York, and by building a lock, that might raise the water to a hight of forty feet, and a capacity to hold a hundred vessels at a time, about forty or fifty miles from the city, on that river, and then, for a distance of eight or ten miles below that lock, on both sides of the river, construct our docks, they would hav a better foundation, not cost half so much, and be far better protected from a foreign enemy than the great docks at Liverpool, which are within easy range of the guns of ships in the Irish Sea. This great lock on the Hudson might be made to open and close once every hour, for the accommodation of passing vessels.

Were all this done, the people of New York and Brooklyn might be notified that, if they persist in remaining where they are, themselvs and their property might suffer the consequences; in which case they would move up to the vicinity of the lock, graving-docks, and navy yard, and build a new and much better city, with streets a hundred feet wide, and, in the middle of them, and from crossing to crossing, a row of trees containing one of every kind of tree that grows in our American forests, and two eucalyptus-trees between each crossing. On either side of this row of trees there should be a ten-foot sidewalk. Then New York would be the most salubrious city in the world, and entirely beyond the reach of foreign enemies, and entirely free from the ten-foot rise and fall of the tide that now annoys the shipping there. An honest, an eminent civil engineer, such as General John Newton, might design and superintend the construction of the whole work, and the profit to the people would be immense.

GEORGE NEWTON.

SALEM, IA., July 10, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me space for a word. It is extremely queer that any reasonable man or woman can be so extremely foolish as to support a cause which is degrading to mankind, when a careful research is made and reason is the ruler supreme. How can mau believe he is on the down grade? Yet the ecclesiastical curs say that man is getting worse. History and reason tell us that we are on the progress instead of ou the decline. Never could I believe the most holy Bible was so outlandish, contradictory, absurd, and childish until I read it through carefully. At last I am thoroughly disgusted with anything that has anything but reason and humanity for its basis. My parents are both in the mire of superstition; so deep there is no chance for reason. I am going to do all that lies in my power for the advancement of liberty and fraternity. I came not to send division, but unity and love; not as the founder of Christianity, but to the contrary. It made me fairly shudder when I read "The Church and Its Influence," by John Peck, and some other correspondence of like character. When I think of the unspeakable cruelty of the church, it makes me wonder how man can uphold such things. Church-members say the church was right, but I say, Nay! I wish the influence of the church was trampled under foot; we would be the better. Many hav told me that all advancement was duc the church, but when they are sounded they will quail and say it is not for them to argue the case, but I will be damned if I do not believe all their nonsense—that nothing but the blood of Jesus will keep me from where fire-and-brimstone is plenty. I cannot go such foolishness. I believe that the only way to get to heaven is to be honest, upright, and kind in all things, and the better we are the better off we are. I sometimes think that the author of the "Religion of Science" is about right, but still I cannot tell exactly. But the theory of evolution comes more near to filling the bill than anything I hav read. Nature is the only god I recognize. I am in doubt as to whether there is a future existence, but if there is not, there is nothing lost by being honest in all things. Be so for principle's sake, not because of fear or reward, but for the general good of mankind—using the words of our worthy president, Robert G. Ingersoll. I neither want his heaven, nor fear his hell; any God who is so fiendish and bloodthirsty as the God of the Bible does not deserve the praise and flattery of anyone, but rather the contrary. He has broken every commandment he set forth but one, and that is the first—that no gods shall be before him. As I think of this it fills me with pity for such a poor, deluded people who would let such a tyrant be their guide. Reason rejects such as the word of God; reason asks for something of a higher nature than the so-called holy Bible.

Again, how can women—who hav been so oppressed by this Jehovah and the book claimed to be his word—oh, how can they submit to the atrocious crimes committed against them by this book and its priests? It is a wonder they are so silent, yet the majority of church membership are women. The men ought to go to their rescue. I wish all Liberals would unite to denounce such as an imposition.

There are several Liberals in this community, who do not care to subscribe for a Freethought paper, but who giv the preachers lots of trouble, and they are the best of citizens.

I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly a year, and I am very thankful we hav such papers to strengthen the sensible. I am lost without it. It has been given me by a friend, as I was so pinched to get along that I could not rake and scrape enough to spare to subscribe, but hope this will not always be the case. A LIBERAL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Midsummer Song.

Oh! father's gone to market town; he was up before the day,
And Jamie's after robins, and the man is making hay,
And whistling down the hollow goes the boy that minds the mill,
While mother from the kitchen door is calling with a will,
"Polly! Polly! the cows are in the corn!
Oh! where's Polly?"

From all the misty morning air there comes a summer sound,
A murmur as of waters from skies, and trees, and ground;
The birds they sing upon the wing, the pigeons bill and coo,
And over hill and hollow rings again the loud halloo,
"Polly! Polly! the cows are in the corn!
Oh! where's Polly?"

Above the trees the humming-bees swarm by with buzz and boom,
And in the field and garden a hundred flowers bloom,
Within the farmer's meadow a brown-eyed daisy blows,
And down at the edge of the hollow a red and thorny rose.
But, "Polly! Polly! the cows are in the corn!
Oh! where's Polly?"

How strange at such a time of day the mill should stop its clatter!
The farmer's wife is listening now, and wonders what's the matter.
Oh! wild birds are singing in the wood and on the hill,
While whistling up the hollow goes the boy that minds the mill.
But, "Polly! Polly! the cows are in the corn!
Oh! where's Polly?"

People Will Talk.

You may get through the world, but 'twill be very slow,
If you listen to all that is said as you go;
You'll be worried and fretted, and kept in a stew,
For meddlesome tongues will hav something to do—
For people will talk.

If quiet and modest, you'll hav it presumed
That your humble position is only assumed,
You're a wolf in sheep's clothing, or else you're a fool!
But don't get excited—keep perfectly cool—
For people will talk.

And then if you show the least boldness of heart,
Or a slight inclination to take your own part,
They will call you an upstart, conceited, and vain;
But keep straight ahead—don't stop to explain—
For people will talk.

If threadbare your dress, or old-fashioned your hat,
Some one will surely take notice of that,
And hint rather strong that you can't pay your way,
But don't get excited whatever they say—
For people will talk.

If you dress in the fashion, don't think to escape,
For they criticise then in a different shape;
You're ahead of your means, or your tailor's unpaid;
But mind your own business—there's naught to be made—
For people will talk.

Now, the best way to do is to do as you please,
For your own mind, if you hav one, will then be ease.
Of course you will meet with all sorts of abuse;
But don't think to stop them—it ain't any use—
For people will talk.

How Flossie Went Fishing.

Flossie is a dear little girl about eight years of age. She is very kind-hearted and very affectionate. She loves the beautiful in Nature, and is extremely fond of flowers. Many a bouquet has she brought me, and many bunches of beautiful wild grasses. Once at the close of the day she walked with me to the post-office, and while we were walking along on the plank sidewalk, talking of one thing and another, all at once she ran down the bluff, screaming, "Oh, see them! the darling sweet-pea blossoms!" She plucked the lovely flowers quickly, and came running with them to me. "Here, Miss Wickerson"—she always calls me Miss Wickerson—said she, "take them; they are so pretty to grow so near the water!"

But I was to tell you how she went fishing. She had made me a little call one day, and then ran down to the water. She was gone so long I feared something had befallen her, and went myself to see what she was about. As I went down the steps leading to the water's edge, I beheld Flossie seated on a rock, not far from the big rock Jumbo, and, leaning over, she seemed to be gazing into the water.

"What are you doing, Flossie, dear?" I inquired.

"Why, I'm fishing," said she. "I've caught five already!"

And, sure enough, there lay five little fishes—minnows, I guess they were—on the rock beside her.

She had a long blade of beach grass, and on the one end she had tied a little piece of the flesh of a mussel for bait, and with that she was catching fish.

"I thought," said she, "I would try to catch enough for Bonnie's supper. Now, Miss Wickerson, won't you please to fry them for that poor little dog's supper?"

"They are too small, I believe. But don't you think, Flossie, my dear, that it is cruel to catch these pretty fishes?" I said.

"Why, Miss Wickerson," said she, gravely, "you know there's no hook on the grass; if there had been they might hav been hurted."

"Well, but they are out of their nativ element; and see, dear"—and I pointed at one—"how this one pants, and the others are nearly, if not quite, dead."

Flossie mused a moment, and then said, solemnly, "Miss Wickerson, I think they are better offted dead!"

"Why so?" I asked.

"Well, they are young and good now, and innocent. If they lived to grow up into big fishes, they might get to be mean and steal some baby-fishes and eat them, and then the baby-fishes' mamma might cry and feel badly about it. And then, too, they might get a hook in their throats, and their mouths would bleed, and they might be caught with a hook—yes, and be put in a boat, with the hot sun beating down upon them all day, while the fishermen smoked cigars in their eyes! Oh, yes, I think, Miss Wickerson, they are much better offted to die this way!"

I was greatly amused at this quaint logic, and while she put two of the larger ones in my hand to take home to "fry for Bonnie's supper," she quietly dropped the other three back into the water, and was rejoiced to see them float away as lively as ever.

"I hope they'll know enough to go straight home and behave themselvs," said she, "and not be frolicking about until they get nabbed by an eel or a shark—the foolish little fishes."

Earliest Methods of Measuring Time.

The story is that King Alfred had no better way to tell the time than by burning twelve candles, each of which lasted two hours; and, when all the twelve were gone, another day had passed. Long before the time of Alfred, and long before the time of Christ, the shadow of the sun told the hour of the day by means of a sun-dial. The old Chaldeans so placed a hollow hemisphere, with a bead in the center, that the shadow of the bead on the inner surface told the hour of the day. Other kinds of dials were afterward made with a tablet of wood or straight piece of metal. On the tablets were marked the different hours. When the shadow came to the mark IX, it was nine o'clock in the morning. The dial was sometimes placed near the ground, or in towers of buildings. The old clock on the eastern end of Faneuil Hall, in Boston, was formerly a dial of this kind; and on some of the old church towers in England you may see them to-day. Aside from the kinds mentioned, the dials now in existence are intended more for ornament than for use. In the days when dials were used, each one contained a motto of some kind, like these: "Time flies like the shadow; or, "I tell no hours but those that are happy."

But the dial could be used only in the daytime, and, even then, it was worthless when the sun was covered with clouds. In order to measure the hours of the night as well as the hours of the day, the Greeks and Romans used the clepsydra, which means, "The water steals away." A large jar was filled with water, and a hole was made in the bottom through which the water could run. The glass in those days was not transparent. No one could see from the outside how much water had escaped. So there were made, on the inside, certain marks that told the hours as the water ran out; or else a stick with notches in the edge was dipped into the water, and the depth of what was left showed the hour. Sometimes the water dropped into another jar in which a block of wood was floating, the block rising as the hours went on. Once in a while, some very rich man had a clepsydra that sounded a musical note at every hour.—Popular Science Monthly.

PHYSICAL SERIES.—NO. 6. FORCE AND MOTION.

41. Force.—We hav seen that by virtue of mobility (12) bodies may be moved. Anything which thus tends to move a body is a force. If a body be moving, its motion may be increased, diminished, or altered by a force. Force may be defined as any cause which tends to alter the condition of rest or motion of a body.

42. Velocity.—Velocity is the distance which a body moves in a unit of time. Velocity may be expressed in different units according to circumstances. We speak of velocities of so many meters or feet per second, kilometers or miles per hour, etc. On the C. G. S. system the unit of velocity is one centimeter per second.

43. Table of Velocities.—The following table is useful for the information it contains; it will also show some of the different ways in which velocity may be expressed. It is partly taken from Ganot's "Physics." Of course, the values given are only approximations, but they will serve to giv a general idea. The numbers given in the table may be taken as about the average.

| | meters per second. | feet per second. |
|---|---|---|
| Military quick step, | 1.4 | 4.6 |
| Moderate wind, | 3 | 10 |
| Fast sailing vessel, | 5.5 | 18 |
| Channel steamer, | 7 | 23 |
| Racehorse, | 15 | 50 |
| Eagle, | 30 | 100 |
| Carrier pigeon, | 38 | 120 |
| Sound, | 332 | 1,090 |
| Shot from Armstrong gun, | 360 | 1,180 |
| Martini-Henry rifle bullet, | 405 | 1,330 |
| | kilometer per hour. | miles per hour. |
| Railway train, | 40 to 100 | 25 to 60 |
| Storm, | 55 | 35 |
| Hurricane, | 160 | 100 |
| | kilometer per second. | miles per second. |
| Light, | 300,000 | 186,000 |

44. Mass.—We shall learn later that the weight of a body varies slightly at different places, but it is evident that the quantity of matter remains the same wherever it may be. Mass is the quantity of matter which a body contains. The same units are used for mass as for weight. We speak of a mass of a gram, kilogram, ounce, pound, etc. A gram is the quantity of matter contained in one cubic centimeter of water at its greatest density—that is, at 4° C.

45. Momentum.—Momentum is the quantity of motion which a body possesses. It is evidently proportional to the velocity and to the mass; therefore, it is proportional to the velocity multiplied by the mass. Hence, to find the momentum of a body, multiply its mass by its velocity. When a body is at rest it has no momentum, for its velocity is zero. A mass of 20 grams, having a velocity of 10 cm. per second, has the same momentum as a mass of 10 g. with a velocity of 20 cm., or of 5 grams with a velocity of 40 cm. The momentum in each case will be seen to be 200.

46. Reflection of Motion.—By elasticity, bodies in collision will hav the direction of their motion changed; such motion is said to be reflected. The bouncing of balls and marbles when dropped on the ground are examples of reflected motion; also, the rebound of billiard-balls from the cushion of the table.

47. Law of Reflection.—The angle formed by the direction before collision with perpendicular to the surface of contact is the angle of incidence; that formed after contact is the angle of reflection.

The angles of incidence and reflection are equal and in the same plane. This is the law of reflection, and is equally true for all kinds, whether of ordinary motion, or of sound, heat, or light.

Experiment.—Roll a billiard-ball along the table, so that it will strike the cushion, and observe that the angle made with the cushion before contact is equal to that after contact. The same thing occurs when a ball is rolled along the floor so as to hit the wall; the angles before and after contact are equal. Since the angles made with the cushion or wall are equal, it follows that the angles made with the perpendiculars to the cushion or wall are equal. This experiment, therefore, proves the law of reflection.

QUESTIONS.

NOTE.—In solving problems relating to velocity, use the values given in the table.

1. How many meters can an eagle fly in a minute? A. 1,800 m.
2. How many feet can it fly? A. 6,000 ft.
3. Five seconds after a flash of lightning the thunder was heard—how many feet off did the lightning strike? A. 5 450 ft.
4. If the report of a gun be heard two seconds after firing, how many meters distant is it? A. 664 m.
5. If it takes light 498 seconds to reach the earth from the sun, how many miles distant is the sun? A. About 92,500,000 miles.
6. How many kilometers distant is the sun? A. Nearly 150.000.000 km.
7. What is the mass of three liters of pure water? A. 3,000 grams.
8. A man weighing 65 kg. is walking at the rate of 1.4 m. per second—what is his momentum? A. 91.
9. Find his momentum in C. G. S. units. (Note. We must reduce the weight to grams, and the velocity to cm.) A. 9,100.000.
10. A mass of 10 lbs is moving with a velocity of 60 feet per second—find its momentum. A. 600.

A Curious Story.

There is a tale told of a sea captain who, in a distant corner of the southern seas, visited an undiscovered or unexplored group of beautiful islands. After landing and trading with the gentle nativs, he was astonished by the visit of a white man, evidently a person of means and consequence, who, after making himself very agreeable, implored the captain to giv him a story-book, if he had such a thing in his possession. The captain had, and, deeply touched by the pigs and cocoanuts which the white exile had given him, bestowed on him a copy of the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." Overcome by the present, the exile burst into tears and cried, "You hav saved my life, and given me rank and wealth." On explanation, he said: "I should long ago hav been eaten, but while they were fattening me I learned enough of their language to tell a child the story of 'Little Red Riding Hood.' The child repeated it, and the whole population were mad with joy. They had never heard a story before. From that day I became a great and honored man. When they had a grand national festival, I sat on top of a hill, and thousands wept (while some elderly relativ was being cooked for a feast) at the cruel death of the grandmother as caused by the wicked wolf. I had with me a volume of fairy tales, and I soon began to set a price on my performances. 'Red Riding Hood' is rather worn; I get only a hundred cocoanuts for her now. But 'Cinderella' is still good for four pigs and a turtle, and 'Beauty and the Beast' brings six or seven, according to the quality. But with the 'Arabian Nights" I shall be able to go on accumulating pork to the end of my days."

Correspondence.

RUMNEY, N. H., July 18, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Just think, I am away up in the mountains—mountains all around us—they are so steep that I hav been only upon one. In the clear evening one can hear an echo. There is a little one called Pinnacle; the Indians had a fort upon it once, and Indian arrowheads hav been plowed up. At the base there is a running brook where we can catch fish. Forty-eight trout we had for supper the other night; but, you must know, some were very small.

July 19th.—Yesterday was stormy, and so I stayed indoors all day; but to-day is lovely. There is a camphor refinery here—there are but seven in the country—it smells so strong it makes our eyes run water; it is very hot in the refinery. There are mica mines six or seven miles away. It is not very warm here, and we are all well, and hope you are all well. With love to you and Mrs. Phillips.

From your little friend, JOSIE.

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Bepublic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. ## Opinions of Our Books.

THE STRUGGLE FOR RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL LIBERTY. By Theo. C. Spencer. "Every effect must hav a cause; and, as every man is subject to these effects, he has a right to make use of his reasoning faculties in finding the cause." New York: The Truth Seeker Co., Lafayette Place.

This book is an educator. In fact, it may be said to be multum in parvo. It is the history of the struggles of Freethought with the various churches from time immemorial to the present. In describing these conflicts and victories in his introductory chapter, the author says:

We would notice that, even in this modified government, the people continued the same old struggle to obtain political rights, in which victories would be followed by defeats; the heads of tyrannical kings fall under the ax of the public executioner; kings mounting the throne to take the places made vacant by those who were forced to retire into banishment disgraced—all this by the will and power of a determined and resolute people. In England we would see King John signing the Magna Charta—the great charter of liberty, restraining the royal prerogativ, relieving many grievances of the people, and guaranteeing to them the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, unless declared forfeited by the judgment of their peers, or the laws of the land; the throne made vacant by revolution, to be followed by a commonwealth, which, on gaining sufficient authority, becomes a despotic government under the rule and control of religious fanaticism, until the people, exhausted and weary of the strife, placed a king again upon the throne.

William and Mary, before ascending the throne made vacant by the abdication of James, we find assenting to the declaration of rights, in which it was solemnly guaranteed that Protestant subjects might bear arms for their defense; that elections of members of Parliament might be free to all; that freedom of speech in Parliament should not be questioned in any place out of Parliament; that excessiv bail should not be required; and that cruel and unnatural punishments should not be imposed.

We would see in the New World of the West sturdy, earnest men and women, who had been driven from their homes in the Old World, by their religious and political persecutors, to seek homes in the wild forests, where they might enjoy equal rights with all others in the political government of the country, and what, to them, was the dearest of all privileges, the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience, and not the conscience of a haughty king or pope.

On civilization, and what does it, Mr. Spencer has the following:

The brawny farmer may take his all with him to a new country; the ingenious mechanic his machinery; the engineer his plans for railroads and other public improvements; the merchant his goods; but still the priest would say, "All these men are of no account in building up and civilizing a country." They would claim that it required a few of them to distribute the Bible and religious tracts to build up a lasting foundation. Although they may reach the country after the hardest of the struggle is over, still they are soon able to send back a vivid account, showing how zealous missionaries hav carried on the glorious work of civilizing the world by redeeming one more benighted spot on earth, so that the people are, with their Christian help, prosperous and happy.

This book contains twenty chapters, mostly of historical facts, all deeply interesting. One chapter on Mythology compresses a world of information as to the origin of our Bible and its stories. This chapter is so interesting, and contains so much that thousands of pages of mythology must be read to obtain, that New Thought readers may draw on us within thirty days for a five-page extract.—New Thought.

The Truth Seeker Publishing Company hav become the leading Liberal publishers in this country, and almost every week we receive something new from their prolific presses. And they are doing good work, both in the mechanical execution of their books and in the mental and moral quality of their contributions to the Freethought literature of the world.

Here is the contents table of Mr. Spencer's book, and it will giv the reader some idea of the scope and tendency of the publication:

Introductory, the Beginning, the Pagans and Jews, the Church of Rome, Mormonism, Mohammedanism, Dogmatism, Martin Luther and John Calvin, the Godhead, Persecution of Early Christians, Christians Persecute Christians, the Wrongs of Ireland, Huguenots Persecute Catholics, Catholics Persecute Huguenots, the Puritans, the Pilgrims, the Revolution, the Church of England, Protestants of America, Slavery, the Cause Found.

Mr. Chas. Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, sends us, through the Truth Seeker Company, a beautiful photo-engraving group of portraits, the size of the sheet being 19x24 inches and containing as a center piece the Demands of Liberalism, nicely printed. In the upper left-hand corner we find the portrait of Jefferson, with this motto from his writings:

In every country and in every age the priest has been hostil to liberty.

In the center at the top is Washington's portrait, with the words beneath:

The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion.

In the upper right-hand corner comes Paine with:

The world is my country; to do good my religion.

At the left of the Demands is Franklin, saying:

Don't let me be mistaken—it was not for Christ's sake, but for your sake.

At the right is John Adams, with this sentence:

Their [Jesuits] restoration is indeed a step toward darkness, cruelty, perfidy, despotism, death, and——

In the lower left-hand corner we see Lafayette, and he says:

May this immense temple of freedom ever stand as a lesson to oppressors, an example for the oppressed, a sanctuary for the rights of mankind.

In the middle at the bottom Stephen Girard looks out, and, concerning his college, says:

I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatsoever, shall hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in said college; nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purpose of the said college.

In the lower right-hand corner we find the last portrait of the group, that of R. G. Ingersoll, and this is his challenge to the enemies of liberty:

The combined wisdom and genius of mankind cannot conceiv of an argument against the liberty of thought.

It will be observed that each portrait is followed by a selection from the writings of the person himself. Price $1. For sale at this office.—Lucifer.

GOOD WORDS FOR ELMINA'S BOOKS.

I hav received Elmina's "The Darwins" and "John's Way." They are excellent. I hardly know which I like best. John's way was a pretty good way, and the Darwins were such a nice family, I wish we had them for neighbors, so I could know more of them.

We like "Little Lessons on Science." I am reading it aloud to my little girl. It is splendid. I hope there will be more such books for Liberal children.

HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C., on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Stenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable; it may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

PRICE, CLOTH, $1.50.

For Schools in Quantities, $1.50.

FREETHOUGHT NOVELS.

The Heathens of the Heath. A finely written Radical romance. By Wm. McDonnell, author of Exeter Hall, Family Creeds, Day of Rest, etc. 500 pages. Price reduced. Paper, 90 cents; cloth, $1.25.

All in a Lifetime. A Romance. By Miss Susan H. Wixon. "The great charm of this novel is its absolute fidelity to nature. Its personages are those one meets with in common life, and are portrayed with a vividness and perspicuity I was scarcely prepared to expect to find, in such a marked degree, even from so gifted a pen as that of Miss Wixon, whose brilliant and lucid style is familiar to most readers in the Freethought ranks." Price, $1.50. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Outcast. A deep, finely written Radical story. From the London edition. By Winwood Reade, author of Martyrdom of Man. 30 cents.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

"I could pronounce no benediction upon Romanism. It has done mischief enough to deserve transportation for life. I regard Roman Christianity as the worst form of tyranny. ## News of the Week.

DR. MCGLYNN spoke in Brooklyn last Sunday evening to an audience of over 3,000.

THE torrid weather has now lasted nearly six weeks without intermission. The death rate in New York is large but not without precedent.

BOODLER MCGARIGLE, the convicted Chicago alderman, is safe in Canada.

LAWYER REED, who defended Guiteau, attempted suicide by jumping from a New Jersey ferryboat last Saturday.

THE Voice, a Prohibition organ, states that nearly ninety bar-rooms are doing an open business in the Prohibition city of Bangor, Me.

THE Rev. G. M. Hanselman, of Brooklyn, was stricken with a hemorrhage while intoning vespers last Sunday, and died immediately.

To make a test case, a New York policeman arrested a Chinese laundryman last Sunday for ironing shirts. The judge spoiled the test by discharging the prisoner.

THE pope has decided that there is no need of a special letter in regard to the Knights of Labor, who, he says, will not be molested by the church so long as the members remain good Catholics.

JOHN TAYLOR, head of the Mormon church, is reported to hav died last week. He had been in hiding for two years under an indictment for polygamy.

THE Scotch cutter Thistle is on her way to New York to try for the America's cup.

JEFFERSON DAVIS recently wrote a strong letter to ex-Governor Lubbock, of Texas, denouncing Prohibition on the ground that the world is governed too much.

A JEW called Rabbi Hirsch died in Brooklyn last week whose age was said to be 109. He was born in Poland in 1778, and saw Napoleon on his march to Moscow.

MISS HUSABOE, who was betrayed by the Rev. Peter Roberts, Congregationalist, of Pittsburgh, Pa., under promis of marriage, has sued the pastor for breach of promis, laying the damages at $50,000.

A COMPANY met at a house in Brooklyn last Sunday evening to baptize a child in the name of the father, son, and Holy Ghost. A quarrel arose during the proceedings, and Dennis Hillen stabbed Michael Mullen to death.

THE Free Religious Association is holding a camp-meeting at Cassadaga Lake, New York. The platform is reported to be free for the expression of all religious sentiments "from Presbyterianism to Atheism." The managers are Spiritualists.

THE Fall River steamboat line is about to build the largest steamer ever launched. She is to be 420 feet long over all, 52 feet beam, and 21 feet depth of hold. She will hav 355 state-rooms and 7,500 horse-power engins, will be called the Puritan, and will cost $1,500,000.

THE Rev. Ulysses S. Glick is pastor of a Methodist church at Harrisburg, Pa., but he did not preach a week ago Sunday. While on his way to his pulpit he was arrested by a constable and compelled to marry a young woman who was the mother of a three-months-old child. He acknowledges his guilt.

THE Rev. William Thomas Abbott is a Methodist preacher recently located at Chesterton, Ind. While there he seduced and eloped with a young girl named Susie Beck, taking her to St. Louis, where they lived as husband and wife. On the 18th ult. Susie died under suspicious circumstances, and Abbott fled. It is now discovered that she was poisoned, and that the arsenic which caused her death was administered by Abbott ostensibly to produce an abortion. The police are on the lookout for him.

Odds and Ends.

THE Chinese always weep at their weddings. As usual, the Chinese are ahead.

"RESOLVED, That the common schools in this country hav done more for its prosperity than the circus," was the question before a Paterson, N. J., debating society last week. Decided in the negativ.

"LIFE has been for me a succession of sad blows," said Mr. Breather. "Ah!" said the new pastor, sympathetically. "Yes, indeed," replied the parishioner. "I've had the asthma twenty-two years."

"MA," said Bobby, "hav I been a very good boy to-day?" "Yes, Bobby, and I am very proud of you." "Well, will you do me a favor, ma?" "If it's reasonable, Bobby. What is it?" "Let me go to bed to-night without saying my prayers."

"REMEMBER, Bobby," said his mother, "when you are about to do something you know to be wrong, that, although I may not see you, there is one who does." "Who do you mean?" inquired Bobby, anxiously. "God." "Oh," said Bobby, with a look of intense relief, "I thought you meant pa."

"Do you not often wonder, George," she said, softly, as they stood at the gate, "at the infinit number of stars, where that vast, silent, eternal procession is going, and whence it came?" "Ye-es," replied George, rather hesitatingly, "but don't you find that to look at the sky for any length of time makes the back of your neck ache?"

PUBLISHER: "Got that case of Bibles packed for the Old Orchard camp-meeting, William?" William: "Yes, sir. The order was light this season; only four dozen. Shall I hang out the express card?" Publisher: "No, never mind. The box can go in the same freight-car with that consignment of 'As In a Looking-Glass' novels."

THREE Frenchmen who were studying a volume of Shakspere in their nativ language endeavored to translate into English the well-known opening to Hamlet's soliloquy, "To be, or not to be." The following was the result: First Frenchman: "To was, or not to am." Second ditto: "To where, or is to not" Third ditto: "To should, or not to will."

JAKE SHARP, who has just been convicted of bribery, is said to hav never drunk anything stronger than milk. Mr. Sharp's sad fate should teach our youth to drink something stronger than mi—that is, to swear off drinking milk, before they are drawn into the awful whirlpool of—of—of one thing and another, if not worse.—Norristown Herald.

DEACON HADDEM: "Put that air picter-book daoun immejetly, Jonathan Haddem! Don't ye know it's a sin ter read sech literatoor on th' holy Sabbath! Nex' y' know ye'll be wantin' ter take th' Peter Parleys off'n th' best-room mantel afore church!" (Grabs book from his son's hands, and is soon buried head over heels in its contents himself.) Jonathan: "I don't see why I can't read it if you do, dad. It's jest as much Sabbath fer you 's 'tis fer me!" The deacon (guiltily): "I—er—wa'n't readin' it, my son; I wuz jest—er-er—seein' what it said!"

"WOULD you believe it," she gurgled, "while I was bathing in the sea the other morning a nasty crab fastened itself to my toe?" "Quite an intelligent crab, I should think," her lover replied. "Intelligent! Why do you think so?" "Because it knew how to catch on to a nice thing." Then she blushed, and when he attempted to take a kiss she made scarcely any resistance.

ON THE UMBRIA.

Staid-looking passenger: "Will you kindly let me know when we cross the three-mile shore-limit, sir?"

First officer: "Certainly sir. Defaulter?"

Passenger: "Do I look like one? No, sir. I am a deacon of Saint Pharisee's church, and the rest of the boys in the smoking-room hav regard enough for my calling not to start the game until we get out of the diocese."

"STRANGER," he said, as he tendered his pocket-pistol, "join me in a drink. You'll find that the real old stuff." "Thanks, no liquor," was the reply. "Well, will you smoke a cigar?" "Not any cigars." An old gentleman who had observed all this grasped the stranger warmly by the hand. "Sir," he said, "it fills my heart with joy to see a young man like you turn away from such vile destroyers." "Yes, sir," the young man replied; "you see I'm a prize-fighter in training, and I've got to go slow."

H. W. RIPLEY, of Portland, Me., who has passed forty-nine summers in the White Mountains, tells a story about Henry Ward Beecher. Mr. Beecher once drove a passenger wagon from the Twin to the Crawford, just for fun. In turning around, his team became tangled up, and his wagon bid fair to tip, when a Portland and Ogdensburg conductor, looking out of a chamber window of the hotel, shouted, "Let go your leaders, you —— old fool!" "That's good advice, young man," was Mr. Beecher's calm reply, as he followed it.

LAST Sunday a favorit local minister was delivering an impassioned account of the destruction of Gomorrah. He thundered away until he disturbed the tired boomers in the front pews "What," he shouted, "what could be worse than that city's lot!" "If it's a city lot," replied a just-awakened man, "I'll giv you $75 a foot." "Eighty!" shouted another speculator in the gallery, aroused by the familiar sounds. "Ninety!" roared another, jumping up. "One hundred!" And the whole congregation chipped in and would hav boomed Gomorrah clear out of sight had not the sexton with great presence of mind called the worshipers to their senses by passing round the plate. That busted the corner.

Gems of Thought.

IN spreading peace over the world, Christianity has proved a failure. If war is ever done away with, and the nations study peace instead of war, Rationalism will hav to effect it; Christianity will hav to giv way, and a better religion take its place.—D. M. Bennett.

I HAV already lived long enough to see the passing away of several successiv stars, each one of which seemed, in its season, to enlighten the whole world—in the days when Coleridge was in the zenith, for instance, or Cousin, or Comte, or J. S. Mill, or, if you please, Emerson. After all, these seeming triumphs are often temporary; and the real safety is to be found in free discussion and in giving the advocates of each school their say.—T. W. Higginson.

THE annual judgment day in which the Jews believed is nearer the truth than the indefinit doomsday of Christian superstition. Every day is, indeed, a judgment day, wherein man reaps what he has sown, and new truth sentences old error; but there are eras in history, worlds of belief and feeling, that come to an end, others that come into existence. No clock strikes as they go or come. They come and go "without observation."—M. D. Conway.

NOTHING can long endure which has not struck root into the true, the admirable, the everlasting; and Christianity has now endured for nearly two thousand years. But it is a product of humanity, and every thing human is born to die. To-day Christianity is dying a lingering death—to be prolonged until its usefulness to the world shall hav been wholly exhausted. To many it is dead already, and the number of these is increasing day by day.—The Impeachment of Christianity

SWEET day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and sky,
Sweet dews shall weep thy fall to-night,
For thou must die

Sweet rose, whose hue, angry and brave,
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye,
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die.
—George Herbert (1593-1682).

WE were once accosted by an inquisitiv Irishman thus: "D'ye believe in the mother of God?" "No." "By gory, thin, y're Atheist. I wouldn't be in your boots for twenty pounds." Was that a satisfactory basis for classification? Professor Huxley had a cook who got on a drunken spree and made such a row in the house that the police were called. As she was hustled through the yard she sent back a blast, of which all that could be heard was an emphatic "damn Atheist." Is Professor Huxley, therefore, to be ranked as a "pronounced Atheist?" But if a drunken cook is not an authority, is a sober bigot any better?—Popular Science Monthly.

WHEN I consider that without a miracle the stars swing in their circles, that without a miracle seed-time and harvest keep their punctual round, that without a miracle the immanent life climbed from the fiery mist of worlds unmade to all their myriad shapeliness and interacting harmony, to mineral and vegetable and animal life, and from the wallowing saurian to the man or woman whom you love—when I consider all these things, I must confess it seems to me little less than blasphemous to suggest that the power which is equal to them all is not equal to the development of humanity from any possible depth to any possible hight, by methods as serene as those which keep the stars from wandering or convert the substance of the planet into human smiles and tears.—J. W. Chadwick.

STERN law-giver! Yet thou dost wear
The godhead's most benignant grace;
Nor know we anything so fair

Flowers laugh before thee in their beds;
And fragrance in thy footing treads;
Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong;
And the most ancient heavens, through thee, are fresh and strong.

The spirit of self-sacrifice;
The confidence of reason giv,
And, in the light of truth, thy bondman let me liv!

THAT over-exertion of the intellect in youth does a man harm is true, though not a very fruitful proposition; but knowledge does not destroy decisivness: it only turns it from the decisivness of a bull into the decisivness of a man. SOME EXAMPLES OF CHRISTIAN FAITH IN CONNECTION WITH THE DROUGHT IN SOME PARTS OF THE WEST.

Notes and Clippings.

A CURIOUS old anchor, very probably lost by the early French missionaries, was found at the head of Green Bay. It appears to hav been constructed from a young maple-tree having three branches from the root. Another bar was fastened on. Thus far it is like a round-topped stool with four legs. On the bottom of these legs were fastened, with mortis and tenon, the flukes, which were bars of oak crossing each other.

A NUGGET of gold weighing 156 ounces and 5 pennyweights was recently found near Breckenridge. It is worth as a specimen close to $5,000. It is said to be the largest lump of gold ever found in California, but one almost, if not quite as large, was taken from the Little Annie mine in Summit district, Rio Grande county, late in 1876. Australia produced the largest nugget of gold ever discovered. It weighed 136 pounds, and was found at Ballarat, near Geelong.

THE London Chronicle reports a curious outbreak of superstitition in Spain. A crazy woman at Torrox gave out that the Virgin Mary had appeared to her, and told her to preach a new gospel for the salvation of mankind, as the end of the world was at hand. The woman's story was believed, and the whole village was soon in a state of frenzy. Like the primitiv Christians, they went in at once for community of goods. Finally they burnt their valuables and clothes in a big fire, round which they all danced in a state of nudity. The gendarmerie arrived just in time to prevent the parents from flinging their children into the flames.

THE conviction of several druggists in Pittsburgh last week for selling soda water on Sunday, notwithstanding their plea that soda water is a necessity because it is a medicin, suggests to the Sun a consideration of what might be the state of thirsty people in this big town if the Sunday Closing Association should get a similar decision from a New York court. Next to the corner liquor saloon the corner drug store, perhaps, numbers the most patrons, and if soda water is to become a tabooed drink on Sunday thirsty travelers on that day may hav to carry refreshing liquids in their pockets or hand bags, or perchance resort with the horses to the watering troughs, if they can find any.

IT is physically easier to giv money to the churches now than it was two hundred years ago, when the following was the order at the contribution box: "The Magistrates and chiefe Gentlemen first, and then the elders and all the congregation of men and most of them that are not of the Church, all single persons, widows, and women in absence of their husbands, come up one after another one way, and bring their offerings to the Deacon at his seate and put it into a box of wood for the purpose, if it bee money or papers; if it be any other chattle, they set it or lay it downe before the Deacons, and so passe another way to their seats again." In those days the clergy had the people by the throat, and knew they would pay at however great inconvenience. Nowadays, a polite deacon gently insinuates the contribution box under the notice of the alleged worshiper, and with deferential manner craves a "tribute to the Lord." And the box is not always heavy with cash, at that!

THE question of the successor to the presidency of the Mormon church has been settled temporarily by the appearance of an address signed by Wilford Woodruff, president of the Apostles. He says: "As upon two former occasions in our history, the duty and responsibility of presiding over and directing the affairs of the Church of Jesus Christ in all the world devolves upon the twelve apostles. With the blessing of the Lord and the faith and prayers of his people, we hope to do our duty until we, too, shall be laid to rest." It has been thought by some that either George Q. Cannon or Joseph Smith, nephew of the original Joseph Smith, would assume the leadership. Woodruff is in the regular line of succession, and his address, assuming control, would indicate there is to be no departure from the orders. Woodruff is eighty years old, and a man of mediocre ability. He has been in hiding two years, and is still out of sight to all save the faithful.

THE Rev. W. W. Everts, a Southern preacher, is a cool beggar. He writes in the National Baptist: "If the provisions contemplated by the Blair Bill are to fall into the hands of political manipulators and cultured skeptics seeking employment and position, and not into the hands of religious people, in all ages and all lands the trusted educators of the people, the rejection of them by the South may be no evil. Will not the Christian educators of the South, as well as of the North, agree upon some basis of coöperation by which the present drift toward secularization of all public schools, colleges, and universities receiving subsidies from the state may be arrested? May not the denominational schools share the state funds and the public charities so equitably as to make separate state endowments, with their moral and physical perils, unnecessary?" There is one consolation to be derived by Secularists, and that is that the Blair Bill has no prospect of becoming law.

A PENSION examiner in Illinois was required to take the deposition of an applicant for a pension who seemed very positiv about the date on which he contracted a severe cold, which resulted in a chronic difficulty, for which he claimed the bounty of the government. His positivness as to the date led to the inquiry how it was that he could swear to an incident which was comparativly trival when it occurred. He said: "I know that the cold was contracted on the 21st of February, 1862, because Bob Ingersoll was married on the following day. How do I come to remember that so well? Why, Bob was the colonel of our regiment. I was on guard duty near Peoria on the night of the 21st. It was as cold as I ever felt it, and as I stood at my post Bob came along, and after saluting him I said, 'Bob, if you don't giv me an overcoat, a bottle of whisky, or relieve me from this duty, I will freeze to death.' He replied, 'I'll do all three.' With that he took off his overcoat, which had been made as a portion of his wedding outfit, and handed it to me. Then from his inside pocket he hoisted out a flask of prime old red-eye and chucked that over too. After that he left me and returned to his quarters, and I'll be blamed if he didn't issue orders for the relief of the entire guard, as he said it was too cussed cold for guard duty that night. You see, that event impressed dates on my memory, and I am not likely to soon forget Colonel Bob's wedding."—Buffalo Times.

The Bible of Nature; or, The Principles of Secularism.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Secret of the East," etc.

I.—Physical Maxims.

CHAPTER III.—CHASTITY.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

The manifestations of the sexual instinct are guided by the plain and emphatic monitions of a physical conscience, developed partly with the primordial evolution of our organism, partly by the hereditary experience transmitted during the social development of our species. The guardians of our prevailing system of ethics, too, have enforced the regulations of their added supervision with a zeal apparently justified by the importance of its purpose; but an analysis of those regulations strikingly illustrates the perils of abandoning the plain path of Nature, to follow the vagaries of hyper-physical dogmatists. The Nature guided bias of sexual intuitions refers to time, selection, and circumstantial restrictions. The control of our clerical moralists ignores the first and second law of modification, while their recognition of the third involves a large number of irrelevant and irrational precepts.

In a state of nature, instinct and circumstances coöperate in the prevention of sexual precocity. Active exercise furnishes a vent to those potential energies which physical sloth forces to explode in sensual excesses The adult males of all species of vertebrate animals fiercely resent the encroachments of immature rivals. Savages postpone their nuptials to a period of life when the possession of property or prestige enables them to undertake the adequate support of a family. In countries where both sexes spend a large portion of their time in outdoor occupations, precocious prurience is very rare. In the pastoral highlands of the Austrian Alps (Styria, Salzburg, and the Tyrol), boys and girls meet only at church festivals, but enjoy their amusements apart, the girls in dances and singing-picnics; the boys in shooting-matches, foot-races, and mountain excursions. A lad under eighteen caught in flirtations is at once laughed back to manlier pastimes, while girls even more jealously guard the exclusiveness of their festivals, and would chase away an intrusive bachelor as promptly as a trespassing boy. Lycurgus fixes the marriageable age of a groom at thirty years, of a bride at twenty. Among the martial Visigoths thirty and twenty-five years were the respective minima.

The importance of limiting the license of precocious passion has never been directly denied, but the significance of the instinct of sexual selection seems to have been unaccountably misunderstood. Marriages without the sanction, and even against the direct protest, of that instinct are constantly encouraged. "Love matches," in the opinion of thousands of Christian parents, seem to be thought fit only for the characters of a sentimental romance, or the heroes of the stage. The overpowering sway of a passion which asserts its claims against all other claims whatever ought sufficiently to proclaim the importance of its purpose and the absurdity of the mistake which treats its appeals as a matter of frivolous fancy.

And, in fact, only the universality of that passion transcends the importance of its direction. For, while the sexual instinct, per se, guarantees the perpetuation of the species, the instinct of selection refers to the composition of the next generation, of which it thus determines the quality as the other determines the quantity. And just as the vital powers of the individual organism strive back from disease to health, the genius of the species seeks to reëstablish the perfection of the type, and to neutralize the effects of degenerating influences. We accordingly find that the individuals of each sex seek the complement of their own defects. Small women prefer tall men; fickle men worship strong-minded women; dark grooms select fair brides; practical business men are attracted by romantic girls; city belles admire a rustic Hercules, and vice versa. Exceptional intensity of mutual passion denotes exceptional fitness of the contemplated union, or rather the results of that union; for, here as elsewhere, Nature, in a choice of consequences, will sacrifice the interests of individuals to the interests of the species. Passionate love, accordingly, is ever ready to attain its purpose at the price of the temporary advantages of life, nay, of life itself; and the voluntary renunciation of such advantage is, therefore, in the truest sense a self-sacrifice for the benefit of posterity, a surrender of personal interests to the welfare of the species. In spite of the far-gone perversion of our ethical standards, we accordingly find an instinctive recognition of such truth in the popular verdict that applauds heroic loyalty to a higher law when lovers break the fetters of sordid interest or caste restrictions. In their hearts, the very flatterers condemn the decision of a bride who has sacrificed love to wealth, even in obedience to a parental mandate, or the monitions of Nature-estranged moralists.

In extremes of adverse circumstances, love itself, however, will often voluntarily withdraw its claim. Hopeless inequality of station, disease, and irremediable disabilities will extinguish the flame of a passion that would have defied time and torture. A lover struck with a cureless malady will shrink from transmitting his affliction; a proud barbarian will refuse to make a refined bride the witness of his humiliations. The perils of consanguinity may reveal themselves to a sort of hereditary (if not aboriginal) instinct; and the discovery of an unsuspected relationship has more than once deadened desire as if by magic, and turned love into self-possessed friendship.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

In the oldest chronicle of the human race the historian of the patriarchs has preserved a genealogical record which seems to have been transmitted for the special purpose of showing the casual connection of continence and longevity. That record (the fifth chapter of Genesis) states the age and the marriage date of the progenitors of ten different generations, with a regularly correspondent decrease of period in both respects, from the first to the sixth, when both increase in a single instance and then decrease to the end of the list. The lessons of that record might be read in every branch of every genealogical chronicle from Noah to the latest posterity of his sons. In all countries, among all nations of all times, premature courtship has courted premature death. Continence during the years of development rewards itself in health and vigor, both of body and of mind. Success in every line of endeavor is the reward of reserved strength. That strength becomes available in the needs of after years, and is the chief basis of that love of independence and impatience of tyranny found only among manful and continent nations. The love of the gentlest females is reserved for the manliest males of their species, while precocious coveters of such prizes meet with humiliations and disappointments. Those who forbear to anticipate the promptings of Nature can rely on the favor of her undiminished aid; and to such only is given the power of that "love that spurs to exertions."

And if marriages are planned in heaven, that heaven manifests its will in the appeals of love, and not in the counsels of avarice or expedience. If the sorrows of poverty-straitened love could be measured against the misery of disgust blighted wealth, it would be admitted that the course of true love is, after all, the smoothest, in the long run as well as in the beginning. For the inspirations of genuine love will resist the assaults of misfortune as they defied its menace, and the ban of prejudice can detract but little from the happiness of a union hallowed by the sanction of Nature.

C.—PERVERSION.

The enemies of Nature have not failed to pervert an instinct which they could not wholly suppress. That this suppression was actually attempted in the first outbreak of antinatural insanity is abundantly proved by the history of the early Christian sects, the Novatians, the Marcionites, and the followers of self-mutilating Origenes. Absolute abstinence from sexual intercourse was made the chief text of "unworldliness." Novices were brought up in strict seclusion; mutilation was the usual penalty of violated vows, but was also practiced as an à priori safeguard against the awakening of the sexual instinct. St. Clemens of Alexandria, one of the few semi-rational leaders of the patristic era, gives an appalling account of the consequences of those crimes against Nature, and vehemently denounces the fatuous dogma, which was nevertheless only modified, but never wholly renounced, by the moralists of a church whose ethics were undoubtedly derived from the physical nihilism of Buddha Sakiamuni. The Galilean apostle of Antinaturalism indirectly inculcates the superior merit of suppression in his allusions to "eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake," and the saints "who neither marry nor are given in marriage," as well as in the example of his personal asceticism; and Paul distinctly informs us that marriage is only a lesser evil, a compromise with the passions of the unregenerate, which perfect virtue should forbear to gratify: "It is good for a man not to touch a woman; nevertheless to avoid . . . ," etc. Such dogmas bore their natural fruit in the society-shunning fanaticism of hermits and anchorites; in aberrations à la Origenes, and in that dreadful source of unnatural vice, the enforced celibacy of monks and priests.

In the philosophy of those moralists, the physical interests of mankind were of no moment whatever. The church that burnt nuns and priests for yielding to the power of an irrepressible instinct, has in millions of cases sanctioned the nuptials of immature minors and the nature-insulting unions of avarice and flunkeyism. For the sake of a small fee it has encouraged the marriage of reluctant paupers, but howled its anathemas against the unions of orthodox Christians with gentiles, Jews, or Christian dissenters. Thus encouraged, Christian parents have not hesitated to sacrifice the highest interests of their children and children's children to considerations of "expedience." In Spanish America thousands of baby-brides—girls of twelve and thirteen; nay, even of ten years—are delivered to the marital tyranny of wealthy old debauchees; in France, Italy, and Austria millions of mutually reluctant boys and girls are compelled to wed in obedience to the decision of a business committee of relatives and panders. In the cities of the northland nations marriages of expedience, though rarer, are still of daily occurrence. "Whatever is natural is wrong," was the shibboleth of the medieval dogmatists, and the protests of instinct were suppressed in the name of morality.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Next to dietetic abuses, premature and unfit marriage is undoubtedly the most fruitful cause of the degeneration of the human species. The penalties of Nature, which every husbandman knows to avoid in the case of his cattle, are recklessly risked by parents and guardians of helpless children—perhaps in the vague hope that the normal consequences might be averted by the intercession of supernatural agencies. But miracles have ceased to suspend the operation of Nature's laws, and it would not be an over-estimate to say that a hundred million Christians annually incur the penalty of moral or physical sufferings and premature death, as a retribution of their own or their parents' outrages against the laws of the sexual instinct. Premature intercourse of the sexes stunts the further development of the organism and entails physical defects on the offspring of a series of successive generations. Puny, weakly, and scrofulous children people the cities of southern Europe from Havre to Messina, though infant mortality has assumed proportions which partly counteract the evil by the sternest of Nature's remedies. Our fatuous modes of indoor education, combined with the influence of a stimulating diet (meat, pepper-sauces, and coffee, instead of fruit, bread, and milk) systematically promote premature prurience. Our school-boys are thus driven to vices of which they know neither the name nor the physiological significance, though, like the victims of convent-life, they suffer the consequences—

Losing their beauty and their native grace, with but a small chance of subsequent redemption by healthier occupations. The monasteries of southern Europe are foster-schools of even more baneful vices—crimes against Nature, which in the slave-dens of the Middle Ages were more frequent than in the most dissolute cities of pagan antiquity. Dr. Layton's report on the result of the "Royal Commission of Investigation" (1538) describes the moral status of the British convents as an absolute ne plus ultra of imaginable corruption. The memoirs of Guiccardini and Pedro Sanchez depict a depth of immorality that would have revolted the libertines of the Neronic era. The indictment of Pope John XXII. contains forty-six specifications that can hardly be quoted in Latin. Jordanus Bruno, however, sums up the secret of such aberrations:

Insani fugiant mundum, immundumque sequuntur.
(The maniacs, despising earth, stray into unearthly abominations.)

The absurd interdictions of marriage on account of a difference in speculative opinions were for centuries enforced with all the truculence of Inquisitorial butcher-laws; the espouser of a Jewess or a Morisca was burnt at the stake, together with his bride; even clandestine intercourse with an unbelieving paramour was punished with barbarous severity; and a similar prejudice still frowns upon the loves of Catholics and Protestants, of Christians and Mohammedans, and even Freethinkers. In Ireland the priest encouraged custom of early marriages has filled the rural districts with starving children; in thousands of cities marriages of expedience invoke the curse of Nature on the traitors to the highest interests of our species. Every marriage, unsanctioned by love, avenges itself on several generations of innocent offspring, as well as directly in blighted hopes and years of unavailing regrets.

E.—REFORM.

Before we can hope to abate the prevalence of genetic abuses we must promote a more general recognition of the truth that the organism of the human body is subject to the same laws that govern the organic functions of our fellow-creatures; and that health does not dispense its blessings as a reward of prayer and theological conformity, but of conformity to the promptings of our sanitary intuitions. We must dispel the delusion which hopes to conciliate the favor of a miracle-working deity by sacrificing the physical interests of our species to the interests of a clerical dogma.

Like the seductions of Intemperance, the temptations of precocious Incontinence may be counteracted by more abundant opportunities of diverting pastimes. According to the significant allegory of a Grecian myth, Diana, the goddess of hunters and forest-dwellers, was the adversary of Venus, and out-door exercise is, indeed, the best preventive of sexual aberrations. Athletes are instinctively continent. Sensuality seems incompatible with a hardy, active mode of life, as that of hunters, trappers, and backwoodsmen. The stigma of public opinion alone would, however, suffice to reduce the frequency of premature marriages; for, in the island of Corsica, where the recognition of their baneful tendency is based on purely economical considerations (the perils of over-population), the dread of social ostracism has proved more deterrent than the fear of poverty and starvation.

In a community of Reformants (as the German philosopher Schelling proposed to call the friends of reform) twenty-five and thirty years should be accepted as the lawful minima of a marriage age, and the teachers of Secularism should lose no opportunity to plead the cause of Nature against the usurpations of priestcraft and conventionalism. Public opinion should be trained to the recognition of the truth that the sacrifice of love to lucre, caste-prejudice, and bigotry is a crime against the genius of mankind, and that a marriage, vetoed by the verdict of Nature, cannot be hallowed by the mumbling of a priest.

Letter by Helen H. Gardener.

"If selfishness were contagious and fatal, what an awful epidemic there would be, and what a lot of good material for funerals would be gathered up right here," said a witty lady on Decoration Day as forty or fifty of us stood on the steps of the Fifth avenue branch of the Mercantile Library, trying to see over and through each other so as to now and then catch a glimpse of the procession as it marched by.

Everbody laughed except the brass-nosed woman who had provoked the remark by spreading a parasol directly in front of three small but eager children.

She heard the remark and the laugh. She understood both perfectly; but she did not close that parasol, so she enjoyed the supreme satisfaction of seeing the soldiers herself while she possessed the proud consciousness of preventing a number of other people from catching even a glimpse of anything below the tops of the flagstaffs.

And what a pathetic lot of flags those were! Poor, tattered old shreds, clinging to their posts, and reverently carried by old and broken men who, themselvs young and activ, had followed these same flags when they came fresh and crisp from the loving hands that worked so bravely to send banners that should be worthy of the men who were to follow them.

Poor, tattered, silken wrecks! What memories they arouse! what tears they start! I found myself with pictures of unutterable sorrow in my heart and tears on my cheeks, and I realized that it was the flags and not the men that stirred my blood and made me fiercely angry that nobody cheered them, and that men stood stolidly by with covered heads while these pathetic symbols of glory and of death were borne once more to the graves of those who had followed them so bravely and fallen under their folds.

I hope that this did not happen anywhere else along the line of march, and that all of the brass-nosed, selfish women, and stolid, unenthusiastic men happened to be massed on that particular block, where even the banner with Lincoln on it did not call forth one single cheer, and made no man lift his hat.

A little further down a pretty girl about the kissable age—you may decide for yourself how old she was—with lips as fresh as a rose and eyes so pure and clear that no other jewels could be half so rich and beautiful, exclaimed: "Oh, which one is General Sherman? I must see General Sherman! I never hav, and he might die!"

Her companion laughed. "Well, the very homeliest old codger you see to-day will be the general."

"Provided your ugly old chap is as thin as a match and as dry as a New York Sunday," put in one of the party.

"I don't care how homely he is, I shall cheer," said the pretty little maiden.

I thought that I would tell her that she would hav to go down to Madison square to see Sherman; but I yielded to the temptation to see what man she would cheer on the strength of deciding that he took the palm for homeliness.

A puffy old German, commanding one division of the Grand Army, came near receiving the honor vicariously, but she suddenly stopped and said: "Thin? Well, he's not thin, and besides he looks as if he drank beer. Does Sherman?"

"No. Sherman looks as if he drank bran," said a bystander, and everybody laughed.

Just then Mr. Bergh hove in sight, and the little miss hesitated no longer. She cheered lustily.

"There he is! There he is! He looks just like you said; but I don't care, he's just splendid, anyhow. Oh, why don't the people cheer him?"

And before her escort knew which man she had chosen to bestow her enthusiasm for General Sherman upon, Mr. Bergh had passed, all unconscious of the distinguished honor done him and the compliments paid his manly beauty and showered upon his humane head.

So the man whose profession it is to prevent suffering and death was mistaken for the one whose profession requires him to dispense both when occasion demands—and all because both men are tall, thin, and look as dry as a powder magazine

Talking about men's looks, did you notice the Zouaves? Why is it that a man looks so phenomenally fiendish and reckless without anything white about his neck? Did you ever notice that? Two or three of the Zouaves had added a white neckerchief to their usual uniform, and the effect was simply magical. They did not look half so fierce as their comrades. An army looks twice as formidable and ever so much less human if only the uniform excludes anything white at the throat.

I strongly suspect that all this is taken into account by Bismarck in uniforming his troops. I know I would a good deal rather fight a man—if I had to fight one at all—who had on a nice linen collar. If he affected the usual Zouave toggery or the Prussian uniform, I'd run. Ugh! they look wicked enough to make a Gatling gun turn pale! Now, I like to see soldiers look as if they meant business, but there is no use in trying to dress an army so as to scare the other side to death.

That is not civilized warfare.

And, by the way, what an absurd contradiction of terms that form of expression is! "Civilized warfare," indeed! One might as well talk about a warm freeze or a wet drouth.

One of the features of Decoration Day which was entirely new was a meeting held in honor of the women who served, in one way and another, in the war. There was an interesting paper, of a historical nature, read by Mrs. Hussey, of New Jersey; a clever "poem" by another lady; some good music, by two ladies and a gentleman, and a lot of talk more or less about the subject in hand.

The chairman seemed to get Prohibition and "providence" hopelessly mixed up with the women of the war. Abraham Lincoln and Jehovah, Clara Barton and Jesus, Anna Ella Carroll, Grant, and the Holy Ghost got pretty badly tangled in the course of her remarks.

Prohibition seemed to hav taken a lively part in freeing the slaves, some way or other, and "providence," the soldiers, and the women each appeared to hav saved the Union in turn.

Nevertheless, it was an interesting meeting, and if these ladies could only lay aside their two pet fads one day in the year, it would be an excellent idea to start a movement which shall result in proper understanding of the fact that, after all, women do bear the hardest part of every war, and their services should hav proper recognition on our national Decoration Day.

It is proverbial that an American crowd is the best-natured crowd in the world. But what is an American crowd? and where is it to be found? Surely not in New York city. Among the thousands and hundreds of thousands on Broadway and Fifth avenue yesterday, certainly not one-third of the faces indicated that they were American born. And right here I want to say that the whole length of those two streets I saw but one drunken man. That is a pretty good record for a big city on a holiday, and is thrown in here for the information of the Prohibition party, as well as for the pleasure and happiness of all of us.

Holidays, of whatever nature, so soon take on the character of gala days that I heard it asked a number of times as people looked at the flag on some large building, "Why is that flag at half mast?"

The marching thousands in uniform did not mean a funeral procession, but a parade, to the tired workers who got an extra day of rest; and to the impecunious loafer it meant a rare chance to see a free show. Each made the most of it in his own way, with small regret for the veterans dead, and vastly more interest in the uniforms than in the records and wounds of the veterans living.

"The veterans don't march half so well as the militiamen," remarked one hair-brained biped; and another athletic youth said that he'd bet fifty cents if he had command that they would keep their lines straighter or he'd know the reason why.

They appeared to be under the impression that Grant drew a chalk line in front of Vicksburg, and every soldier kept his eye and his toe on that mark during the entire battle.

The human biped is a queer animal. It lacks feathers, it is true, and that is one reason why it is neither a vulture nor a loon; and it would require two more legs and an octave or so added to his voice to make him a perfect donkey; but little physical defects like these are perhaps of but small weight when it comes to a real test of character and capacity, after all.

There was one sight which seemed to astonish my English friend more than anything else, and I fancy it is, as he said, not to be matched in the world.

That was the very patent fact that the standing, regular, trained defenders of this city and state are almost all foreigners. Very few, indeed, of the policeman are Americans, and, excepting only two of the regiments, most of the faces of the militiamen were the faces of other nations than ours.

The Irish and German, of course, predominated; but almost every nation under the sun was represented, and the nativ American was conspicuous by his absence. The Seventh and Twenty-second regiments are, of course, chiefly American. The others are mainly foreign. What other nation on the globe would dare to hav its defense composed of those who were with it, but not of its blood? In a republic only could it be either safe or possible, and this is the only republic that has tried it so far.

"Do I think it an element of danger?"

Oh, no! my English friend, I do not think it an element of danger, but quite the reverse. Our policemen and militia do not serve because they must. They serve because they want to; and they are as loyal and as brave in the defense of the country they hav come to for refuge as if they had been born under its flag and cradled by nativ mothers. That the service is absolutely voluntary goes a long way toward explaining why this is true.

"Would it not be extremely difficult to get Irish police to fire on an Irish mob, if such a mob were to be?"

I think not, unless it were of a religious as well as of a race nature. There is never likely to be a race mob in this city unless it were of a religious character, for there is no other exciting cause which would not divide all race sympathies. And I very much doubt if the trouble you apprehend would exist even if it took that one form. American atmosphere is not conduciv to fanaticism of a warlike nature in large cities. There are always too many varieties of opinion in our great centers for it to flourish, or for any one to be unduly aggressiv openly.

When George Jacob Holyoke was over here he remarked that this was the only country which had some two hundred religions—all equally respectable. He thought it was because Americans must hav variety. They sample everything that comes along, and they make choice of their religions and their drinks with equal freedom from dictation and compulsion.

In small towns, of course, this is less apparent; but there the nativ American is usually at the helm, which would render a race conflict next to impossible. He retains the keys to his own court-house, and the Gatling guns are at his command. Oh, you need not lose any sleep while you are with us because our police force and militia are foreigners, my friend!

They are all right, and we Americans sleep quite sound with Patrick in the army, Fritz in the navy, Sambo coquetting with the militia, Jacques on the police force, Angelo with a key to the powder magazine, and Ah Sin beginning to cast tender glances from his fluting iron toward the ballot box and the perquisits of the plethoric pocketed alderman.

Mr. Washburn's Record and Prospectus.

From the Investigator.

I hav delivered for the Investigator Lectureship nearly seventy lectures the past season, and hav distributed a large quantity of Liberal tracts, papers, etc. In most places where I hav visited I hav found the people interested in our cause, and willing, as far as able, to help advance its principles. Through the very generous donations of friends, whose contributions were acknowledged in the Investigator, and through the loyalty of Mr. J. P. Mendum to the lectureship, who was responsible for my salary, I hav been enabled to devote one year to the work of Liberalism; and I wish to thank every person who aided me in the work for their kind and noble support. The outlook for another year is brighter for what has been done this year, and it is my desire to continue in the Liberal field, and do my share of the work for the overthrow of superstition in the land. I hav been lecturing this month in Lunenburg, Ayer, and Fitchburg.

That able and devoted worker for Freethought, Capt. Robert Davis, of Lunenburg, Mass., is not satisfied with what he is doing alone with his pen and tongue, and so has paid me for five lectures in the above-named places. His method is to hire a hall, hav posters distributed advertising the lecture, and after the lecture to giv away all the tracts and books that the people wish to read, and to pay every cent of the expenses himself. Only a few Liberals are able to do this, but a great many are vastly more able than is Captain Davis. This gentleman's enthusiasm for Liberalism amounts to almost religious zeal, and he is never happier than when doing something for the spread of truth and the cause of mental liberty.

Through the generous encouragement of Captain Davis and others, I hav decided to continue the lectureship, but hav not yet arranged any particular program. It has been suggested that the best and wisest course would be to try to build up a strong Society in Boston, and radiate from this point, giving lectures as they may be called for in adjoining places. This plan can be carried out if support enough is pledged to make the undertaking a success. I do not wish to engage in a failure, and there is no need of making a failure if the friends of Liberalism who are interested in the cause will but giv their principles the support they deserve.

We can hav a large and flourishing Society in Paine Memorial, that shall carry on a work whose influence for good may be felt throughout the land. I am anxious to do that which will best promote the progress of our movement, and would invite the opinions of others upon the question.

Fraternally, L. K. Washburn.

News and Notes.

Saturday evening, July 23d, I strike Puget Sound at Tacoma. Tacoma is a thriving place, with more hills to the acre than any other spot on the globe. I should judge that every dwelling-house was on an eminence of its own. Tacoma expects to be the terminus of the Northern Pacific, and is growing rapidly.

Puget Sound is a beautiful sheet of water. It is dotted with hundreds of islands, and the landscapes are constantly changing. The skies are so full of smoke now that the far-off sceneries of snow-capped mountains cannot be viewed. The sun is almost hidden from sight. Only a faint effulgence from the setting orb illuminates the wide floods and romantic shores, but enough to make a picture of indescribable beauty and fascination. Long ago, upon the hills of New England, I used to read of Puget Sound. Then its waves broke upon a vast wildnesss—so remote that it seemed almost impossible for civilization to reach it in my day. But the shores now resound with the whistle of the locomotiv, and wealth and elegance greet the eye. At nine o'clock, in the bosom of the darkness, Seattle, on its lofty eminence, shines like a constellation, with its many quivering lights. At the dock we are met by our good allies, Lyman Wood, Walter Walker, A. Amunds, and John H. Hummell, and soon find comfortable quarters in the Occidental Hotel, which is one of the finest houses along the coast. Seattle has a population of twelve or fifteen thousand. It has plenty of enterprise. Up to this time it is the metropolis of the sound, and, I guess, will maintain its supremacy, although it keeps its laurels only by a persistent fight.

Seattle has been full of tumult on the Chinese question, but the banners of peace are beginning to wave. At the last election the Liberals came out on top, and some of our representativ men, like Lyman Wood and others, are in responsible official positions. The worst act I hav heard of in regard to the riots was that committed by a clergyman who, as a member of the militia, shot down, without cause, an unarmed citizen amid crowds of women and children. The clergyman has fled the country. This shows the spirit of Christianity. Theology has always been the greatest of murderers, and the clergyman delights in bloodshed when he can do it with safety. A more cruel and dastardly act was never committed than this shooting by an irresponsible militia.

I had good audiences Sunday afternoon and evening, but our forces at this point are somewhat disorganized owing to many causes, and it will require time and patience and wise action to gather the hundreds of Liberals of this city into a harmonious and powerful society. But there is splendid material, and I hav high hopes of its future usefulness.

One of our noblest and most generous comrades has passed away, D. M. Crane, a venerable and worthy leader in our cause. It was one of my most pleasant anticipations in coming to the coast to see this brave and high-minded Freethinker, whose communications were always so full of cheer and noble kindness. I was doomed to be disappointed. He died suddenly in the very midst of his work and usefulness. But his memory is bright and beautiful, an influence that cannot perish for liberty, for justice, and for humanity.

Monday, July 25th, I go up to Newcastle, a mining town of about seven hundred inhabitants amid the wood-covered hills. I had a cordial reception, and full houses the two evenings I lectured. The band played, and everything went off in fine style. Never in the history of the place had there been so large an assembly of men and women. The ministers can't do anything here; they hav all been starved out. One of them, like a sensible fellow, has gone to work in the mines at two dollars per day. He would rather grow fat in the bowels of the earth than fast and pray in the courts of the Lord.

Frank Murdock sang at our first meeting, and Joseph Aspen at the second, and so the muses made our way pleasant amid these gloomy realms of Pluto. We went down into the mine, nine hundred feet below the surface, and dwelt for a few hours in this subterranean world, where the weird lights and thunderous reports make it seem like sheol. It is a comfortable summer residence, the air being delightfully cool. They had a strike here lately of six months' duration, but the working people came out ahead. This is one of the best mining properties in the territory, and large quantities of coal, about five hundred tons, are daily shipped.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins Morgan while here, of Welsh blood and Liberal to the core, and time passed pleasantly by, although it did seem as if I were out of the world, so quiet it was, especially in the morning when the men were asleep, or at work in the mines. The miners work eight hours a day and come out about four in the afternoon, and the evenings are quite lively with ball playing, etc. The Newcastle nine are among the best in the territory, and hav won many a famous victory.

Among our other jovial and Liberal friends here are John Williams, Wm. George, Thos. Oakley, leader of the band; G. D. Spencer, Rufus Calhoun, Wm. Penman, Thos. Naylor, Henry Bloom, Thos. Price, Wm. Under, Thos. Macdonald, Richard Roesiger, Jas. Carrington, John Hutchenson, August Saunders, John John, J. P. Rich, John Clark, Ben. Atkinson, Andrew Brown, August Farley, Wallace Fonier, Geo. Davis, G. Getschman, James Raper, Thos. Edge, etc., and it will be seen that the banners of Liberalism in Newcastle will never fall to the dust. We expect to return here on our next trip and organize a Secular Union.

We come back to Seattle on Wednesday, and giv two lectures Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and organize the Seattle Secular Union; and I believe we shall hav a royal company to defend our cause in this city of the hills, and the setting sun will shine upon our victorious forces. Walter Walker used to liv in Utah, and he kept things lively there for reform, and he will do the same wherever he goes. He is a born agitator for the right. He believes in progress with all his heart. John H. Hummell is equally devoted, an activ worker, generous and enthusiastic. Another stanch advocate is A. Amunds, always ready to lend a hand, and who looks forward and not backward, and is one of the live men of the city. With him goes his partner, P. Wickston, as solid as the hills and true as steel; and the father-in-law, Mr. Stone, who in old age keeps up the fires of freedom, and believes still in the "good time coming." Also, A. C. Bowman and his wife, at whose charming residence on the banks of Union Lake I was entertained. Bowman has many a fight on hand, especially with the ministers, who are always, however, obliged to beat a retreat, and not in the best of order. He is surrounded with Christian neighbors, who are determined to convert him and bring him to his knees; but so far he is right side up with care, and he doesn't giv much evidence of a "new birth."

Among others are Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Wood, Mr. and Mrs. C. J. Clark, Mr. and Mrs. Hummell and family, who are all Liberals; Mrs. D. M. Crane, Mrs. Laura Hall, our potent worker at Port Angeles; W. W. White, Michael Pilling, Miller Galloway, Frank Pontius, R. Scott, O. A. Carr, Wm. Cochran, B. F. Sweeny, Samuel Combs, Judge Soderborg, C. M. Bridges, Dr. Done, Mrs. Josephine Giddings, A. J. Charleston, C. J. Childberg, Wm. Moran, John Coolage, H. F. Phillips, E. Roberts, Robert W. Wincipaw, N. Childberg, Messrs. Erlin, Robertson, etc.

I was pleased to make the acquaintance of Judge Bush, formerly of Washington, D. C., who is now located in this territory. He is well known to the readers of The Truth Seeker by his contributions to its columns. He is a genial and able man, and is quite an addition to our forces in this country.

I expect to lecture at Seattle next Tuesday, and close my work at this point with bright hopes of future progress. I am now on route amid the islands of the sound to Snohomish, where I lecture to-day, to-morrow, and Sunday and Monday. Next week I shall be at Port Angeles and Port Townsend, Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, August 7th, 8th, and 9th; at Portland, August 11th; at Colfax, August 13th, 14th, and 15th; at Pendleton, I expect, August 21st; at Union, August 23d, 24th, and 25th; at Baker City, August 26th, 27th, and 28th; at Prairie City and vicinity, from August 29th to September 6th; at Emmetts and Boise City and neighborhood, from September 6th to 19th; at Salt Lake, September 24th and 25th; and eastward by Canon City, Denver, Nebraska, to Chicago, for the National Congress in November. Samuel P. Putnam.

Mrs. Slenker.

I suppose "you alls" will think me somewhat lacking in backbone to hav allowed the remarks on my case in the last Truth Seeker to worry and keep me lying awake nearly all night. Though willing to do and dare all, where I believe it right and best, I am not the less sensitiv to being skinned alive, or irritated by unjust adverse criticism. I claim to hav sent nothing to anyone that I did not send for the best of purposes, and even if not directly educating at the time, I meant it as good seed and to be exchanged for facts from the receiver which were needed in the work.

In writing up any branch of science, few save the students and teachers will be able to comprehend the usefulness of much matter that seems entirely irrelevant to the subject; so when our editor calls the item referred to as having appeared in the Word "very disgusting" "stuff," others who see and know its full import realize that it was of the greatest importance, because it was a fact and truth touching the most important problem of social sexual science.

So far as I am concerned, it was not so much the publishing of the matter in the objectionable item in the Word that I disliked as it was the way in which it was done. If I had intended making the fact known in print (and it was a real fact), I should hav put it in an entirely different shape. I never like to needlessly shock or even disgust people by presenting truths in too rude or rough a style.

But what is done can't be helped. I hav perhaps unwittingly sown better seed than I intended even in this; for I feel that Mr. Heywood is correct in thinking "pain is incidental to convalescence," and also as regards the "clandestin role of the reformer." I always prefer frank and open work wherever it is possible, yet we often write in private what is "unfit for publication," because for the average reader it would require too much preface and explanation to make it understandable.

To Mr. Heywood and others who were studying the science of sexual passions, the Word item was perfectly in place, but to outsiders, robbed of all that should hav accompanied it, it looked to be entirely uncalled for.

We cannot please all, even of our friends. But we can be kindly tolerant, and giv those who differ from us the benefit of the widest charity and consideration. I am truly sorry if I hav hurt Mr. Heywood's feelings in what I said regarding this matter, for I hold him and his good wife as true reformers, and true friends, not only of Elmina, but of all human kind.

Probably, next to Thomas Paine, no radicals of these latter days hav been more maligned, misrepresented, and misjudged than hav Ezra and Angela Heywood.

Now a word to Geo. W. Baum. I would respectfully inform him that the churning incident is a real fact, and occurred within a mile of Snowville, and the parties are personally known to me. "Churning all day" is frequently done by thrifty farm-wives who depend on butter-money for many little household purchases. Not unfrequently the cream refuses to yield up the buttery particles, and so the churn is kept standing around to be worked at odd moments, and hour after hour the dasher vainly does its work. I remember many such a "thro' of it" in my own past experience; especially one during my girlhood. We had tried salt, soda, hot water, and dropping in a small roll of butter, all in vain; finally, "old Aunt Morey" called, and at once pronounced the cream bewitched, and she heated a smoothing iron and threw it in the cream, saying it would make a burn on the witch, and she would leave the house. Surely enough, in a few moments, the butter came. Probably the hot iron wrought the needed change in the cream. Now, this was in the Empire State, and not in Dixie, and there are still plenty of people in probably every state in the Union who are quite intelligent in many respects, but who believe in signs, omens, witches, gods, and devils. I know I find such wherever I liv.

If Mrs. Slenker has "violated a national law," it is curious that so many of our best lawyers, scientists, and thinkers, who hav seen specimens of all that was mailed, are so ready to defend them as being mailable under the law; and that so many of our best physicians are in favor of "quashing the indictment" as unjust and unrighteous.

Think you as good, great, and wise a doctor as E. B. Foote would fill page after page of his Health Monthly, issue after issue, with letters, articles, and editorials of defense, if he believed what was mailed was lewd and obscene? As to "nasty and vulgar language," that is all a matter of education and taste. If a scientist whose merits and works are of world-wide reputation, such as are those of H. M. Parkhurst, can use and defend this language as clean, proper, correct, and legitimate, shall we lesser lights carp and cavil over it?

Are Liberals truly Liberal? It would almost seem that many of them would like to shut out from our papers everything save comments upon Noah and the ark, Solomon and his numerous wives, and Jesus and the enemies he wanted slain before him, and it almost seems that Elmina's enemies would like her to be imprisoned, if not slain outright, for touching the forbidden subject of sex.

I see Mr. Chamberlain asks those who hav been benefited by Elmina's work please to send statements to that effect. Does he mean simply sexual work, or does he yoke in all her work against theology, alcohol, tobacco, and punishment—especially of helpless little children? If so, I fear the responses will be overwhelming; unless the sexual shock has paralyzed the pens of the people.

You see, I am judging by the appreciativ and flattering personal letters I hav received during thirty years of public and private correspondence, and the real outcome may be far less than I anticipated. Honest in intent and clean of heart, hav I ever given to the world my best. The seed is sown and time will ripen the grain, and the future shall judge of the harvest. I need, also, the words written against as well as for me, and friends who see mention of my case in papers other than those for which I write will confer a great favor upon me by sending such extracts, giving name and date of the journal from which they are taken.

Friends, July will be gone ere you read this, and August will hav begun. The months pass swiftly away, and near and more near draws the fateful day when I must once more go to be judged, and probably condemned and convicted. It is a great strain on one's nerves to feel the shadow of a prison resting on and over one for weeks and months together; to realize that the end is ever approaching nearer and still nearer, as inevitable as death itself, and no arm to avert the blow.

You may say I risked it all open-eyed. Well, so does every soldier in the army risk wounds, capture, and death open-eyed; but each one hopes to escape, just as I hoped to do my duty and escape, unharmed by fire and foe.

My object in writing this is to ask all the silent ones, the spectators of the combat, to jump down from the fence and take sides in the work; to show their colors, to let us know who our friends are. We need every name of every friend to free mails and free speech. We need the indorsement of everyone who believes in a clean heredity and a broader scientific sexual education.

If the hundreds who hav spoken brave, true, earnest, inspiriting words in private letter would only send just a few lines of public approval, or simply send twenty-five cents, with their names, so they might be placed in the roll of honor, and help to swell the ranks, they would be accomplishing far more than they imagin. We ask none to do this save those who truly sympathize in the work. But so many think it is of no use to write or send unless they can do big things. They forget that little drops of water make the mighty ocean. So, right here, I ask each one to become a drop.

The day is not far off when you will realize that this little fight way down in old Virginia is something more than a mere personal matter; that I hav not risked fine and imprisonment, slander, contumely, and disgrace for the paltry privilege of mailing a few words.

Behind me are noble, scientific, grand, and true men and women, each and all of whom are in the work and of it. One by one they are coming to the front, and lifting a part of the load from my shoulders. The first dark, dense desolation is passing by.

Not one of you will ever know the terrible horror of that first week in Wytheville jail, when I did not know if even my husband or child would ever care for me again.

Right here I wish to say that Mr. Slenker stood by me stanchly and kindly all through the stay in Abingdon, and closed up the trip by donating $10 to the defense fund, and promised still more help toward it.

It has cost me over $200 for being arrested, jailed, bailed, indicted, and re-bailed, and what the real trial, fine, etc., will cost only the future will tell.

Church and State.

Edward McGlynn in the Standard.

I shall giv you a little chapter of unpublished history. A priest, Edward J. O'Reilly, pastor of St. Mary's church in Grand street, this city, a man of ability and culture, had shortly before the date of that interview been promoted from the parish of Newburgh, where he had begun to agitate in writing the so-called "school question," which largely consisted of the demand for public moneys for Catholic parochial schools. When he came to St. Mary's parish in New York, he found himself burdened with two parochial school buildings which he found it all but impossible to support, even with the aid of fairs, and raffles (in violation of law), and picnics and excursions, the chief profits of which would come from the sale of beer and intoxicating drinks. He said to me one day, "I can't support my schools." "Well, then," said I, "don't support them." "But," said he, "I must support them." "Well," said I, "support them, then." I simply meant to say that if he and his people wanted private, religious, parochial schools, nobody should deny them the right of enjoying that luxury, but that reasonable beings would suppose that he and his people should also enjoy the privilege of paying for the luxury. But the fact is that the Catholic people as a rule are not very eager for parochial schools, which are forced upon them by the fanaticism of bishops and priests, so that the support of the schools has to be extorted from the people by never-ending scoldings from the altar and pulpit, by choking people at church doors to sell them excursion tickets, and by other similar un-Christlike arts. In the conversation referred to, Father O'Reilly quickly made known his view on the subject. He said: "We are paying our share of the taxes. We are therefore entitled to our share of the public school fund. We hav the votes and the political influence, and we must demand, and shall obtain, our rights." I answered that he might hav a majority of the voters in some of the wards in New York city, but that he should not forget the bitter hostility of the great majority of the people of the state and country to such demands, and that the pressing of such demends by him and his friends would provoke bitter denunciation and caricatures from pulpit and press, and would do irreparable injury to the Catholic church throughout the United States. He replied: "What hav I to do with the Catholic church in the United States? My mission is to my own church and to the children of my own people"—a sentiment which I thought very uncatholic, and one that was rebuked by the action of children in his own Sunday-school, who showed that they were concerned not merely for the interests of religion in the United States, but in far-away China and Japan, for the spiritual help of which they were collecting and contributing their pence.

This Father O'Reilly, determined to carry out his views, associated with himself a number of priests, among whom were Fathers Cloury, of St. Gabriel's, Treanor, of the Transfiguration church, and McKenna, of St. Rose's. They formed what may be called an offensiv and defensiv alliance with the Tammany ring, of which at that time the chief ornaments were Tweed, Sweeney, Connolly, and Oakey Hall. It was a matter of life and death for the ring at that time, already deep in its unparalleled thievery and general rascality, to secure the reëlection of Oakey Hall as mayor. It was like a godsend to the desperate ring to be permitted to hope that they could buy the "Catholic vote" and the support of the Catholic ecclesiastical machine, at so cheap a price as that of a few hundred thousand dollars a year for Catholic schools, which sum they could easily procure by legislativ trick and fraud. To giv to the alliance more surety and dignity it was desired by the ring, and the desire was gratified, that Archbishop McCloskey should hav a conference on the subject with Peter B. Sweeney, who was known as the "brains" of the ring. This conference was held on a Sunday evening, in a room in the old episcopal, now pastoral, residence of St. Patrick's church in Mulberry street. In due time the ring maintained its part of the bargain by passing through the legislature an appropriation which granted to the Catholic parochial schools of New York city an amount somewhere between two hundred and three hundred thousand dollars. Mr. Sweeney got great credit for his cleverness in so managing that the appropriation was tacked on to a bill on, I believe, the last night of the session, and in such shape and language that but few of the legislators could hav known or guessed the real intent of the appropriation or the amount appropriated. The appropriation awarded "a sum equivalent to twenty per cent of the excise money in New York county for the year 1868 to such free schools as are not already in receipt of any share of the public school fund." A commissioner was by the act itself to be appointed for the distribution of the fund. Mr. Nathaniel Jarvis, Jr., was appointed such commissioner, and even he, who is somewhat known as a practical politician, was shocked at the cupidity and unscrupulousness of Catholic clergymen in their unseemly scramble to get more than their share of the appropriation. One worthy pastor had the coolness to ask for a share, although he had no school, on the ground that, if he could get a liberal slice of the fund, he would start a school. The parochial schools enjoyed this gift of the ring for a year or two, and clergymen privy to the bargain did what they could to keep their part of the pact by doing their best to reëlect Mayor Hall, and therefore to oppose the rival candidate, Judge Ledwith, who was himself a Catholic, and for whom personally some of the clergy referred to had the kindest feeling. More than one priest recommended the Tammany party from the altar the Sunday before election, and Mr. John Mullally, a well known Catholic journalist and politician, recently a tax commissioner, went about to priests the Saturday evening before with what was equivalent to a message from Vicar-general Starrs, with whom he had just been in conference, to the effect that the Tammany party were willing to do the best they could for the Catholic schools, and it was but fair that the Catholics and the clergy should do the best they could for Tammany Hall.

Is is not high time to hav done with this wretched business once for all by such legislation, or rather amendment of the constitution, as was suggested by me seventeen years ago? I am happy to hav reason to believe that even gentlemen prominently connected with the House of Refuge are beginning to see this matter in the same light as I do, and that they will be willing to coöperate with citizens of all denominations and of no denomination in procuring through the constitutional convention, which is to be held in spite of the efforts of Archbishop Corrigan to prevent it, such provisions as will make such irritation and scandal impossible in future. My reason for saying this is that some of these gentlemen are, I believe, activly interested in the work of a committee that has for one of its objects the procuring of some such provision or amendment in the constitution of this state. I will giv you, as entirely pertinent to this subject, the text of a correspondence which I had some three months ago with the acting secretary of that committee, the Rev. Mr. Baker. But first I should like to say that some suggestions in my part of the correspondence were deliberately intended to make impossible in the future the miserable evasions that hav been common in the past, by which, under the pretense of non-sectarianism, people hav been deprived of the reasonable enjoyment of such religious ministrations as they preferred, and, on the other hand, hav been coerced into attending religious service and instruction which were utterly distasteful to them, and at which very often they felt that they could not voluntarily be present without grievously sinning against conscience. Surely it is the rational doctrin of the soundest Christian philosophy, as it is a cherished American principle, that liberty of conscience shall be inviolate. The correspondence is as follows:

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL, 54TH ST. AND FIFTH AVE.,
NEW YORK, April 29, 1887.

REV. EDWARD MCGLYNN, D.D., Rev. and Dear Sir: A conference of the executiv and finance committee of the "central committee for protecting and perpetuating the separation of church and state" will be held at this hospital on Tuesday evening, May 3d, at 8 o'clock, at which the following proposed amendment to the state constitution will be discussed:

"No moneys from the public treasury, state, county, or municipal, or moneys raised by taxation, shall be given, paid, or loaned to any sectarian institution, or any institution under sectarian teaching or control."

I hav been specially requested to ask you and the following gentlemen to be with us on that occasion: Rev. Joshua Strong, D.D., Mr. Henry George, Mr. Henry A. Cram.

I sincerely trust that it will be in your power to be present. Yours truly, GEORGE S. BAKER, Acting Secretary.

Executiv Committee—E. M. Kingsley, S. Hastings Grant, Churchill H. Cutting, Andrew Powell. Finance Committee—H. A. Oakley, Hugh N. Camp, William Alexander Smith.

NEW YORK, May 3, 1887.

Mr. George S. Baker, Acting Secretary of Committee for Protecting and Perpetuating the Separation of Church and State, St. Luke's Hospital, New York city:

SIR: I hav received your favor inviting me to take part in a conference of the executiv and financial committees of your committee to be held this evening, to which conference you inform me that you were requested to invite also Rev. Joshua Strong, D.D., Mr. Henry George, and Mr. Henry A. Cram. I thank you for the courteous invitation, and regret that another engagement will not permit me to be present.

I am glad to be able to express my sincere concurrence in the general proposition which, as I understand it, underlies the purpose of your committee and the amendment to the state constitution it proposes as follows: "No moneys from the public treasury—state, county, or municipal—or moneys raised by taxation, shall be given, paid, or loaned to any sectarian institution, or any institution under sectarian teaching or control."

I am convinced from my reading of history that too often the liberty of religion has suffered by the so-called protection of the state, and its purity has been corrupted by state endowments, while, on the other hand, the liberties of the people and the rights of the state as representativ of these liberties, hav been time and time again encroached upon by churchmen grown rich and powerful by the endowments of the state. I could not, however, with perfect satisfaction to myself, approve of the proposed amendment unless I were permitted to amend the amendment by making it broader and more radical, and so clear in its provision as to render impossible all quibbling and evasion. I would therefore suggest the insertion after the word "taxation" of the following words: "From licenses, excises, or in any other way, by authority of law." Again, after the word "control" I would suggest the addition of the following words: "Or to any private institutions, or to any institution that shall not be the property of the people in their political capacity, and entirely controled by officers elected or appointed by the people."

I hope that these suggestions will meet with acceptance from the conference, in which case I shall cheerfully and earnestly defend the proposed amendment with voice and pen, and use what influence I may hav in the matter of the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, and with the members of the convention in behalf of the amendment.

With best wishes for the committee and yourself, I am, sir,
Yours sincerely, EDWARD MCGLYNN.

I received another letter from Rev. Mr. Baker, telling me that my suggestions had been submitted to the conference and were referred to a legal committee, from which, no doubt, we shall hear in good time a favorable report.

What I say in my letter to Rev. Mr. Baker is what I said in the Sun in 1870, and I am glad to know that what was said so long ago is in substance and spirit and largely in phraseology the same as the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union. I can cordially and unreservedly subscribe to those demands, and I should be glad to see them granted by appropriate changes in our constitutions, state and federal.

W. S. BELL and J. E. Remsburg are both at work in Nebraska.

REUBEN CLEMENT, the thieving president of the Citizens' Savings bank of Leavenworth, Kan., is a good Christian. He formerly lived in Fredonia, N. Y., where he was an activ elder in the Presbyterian church, interested in all church work. His character as a religious man was the same in Leavenworth as in Fredonia, and the pious folk of that town took him to their bosoms and compelled the faithful to withdraw their deposits from the four ungodly banks of the city and place the money with Brother Clement. The only unchristian act Mr. Clement is accused of is breaking the Sabbath by starting for Canada on that day. He took with him $51,000 of the brethren's money, but that is a small offense in the eyes of God's church compared to breaking the Sabbath,

Why Am I a Heathen?

From the North American Review.

Men raised in a certain faith usually adhere to it, or drift into one of its cognates. Thus a heathen may wander from simple Confucianism into some form of Buddhism or Brahmanism, just as a Christian may tire of following the Golden Rule, and adopt some special sect—one more latitudinarian or ceremonious, according to the temper of his religious conscientiousness; but the latter continues still a Christian, though a pervert; while the heathen, in Christian parlance, is still a pagan.

The main element of all religion is the moral code controling and regulating the relations and acts of individuals toward "God, neighbor, and self;" and this intelligent "heathenism" was taught thousands of years before Christianity existed or Jewry borrowed it. Heathenism has not lost or lessened it since.

Born and raised a heathen, I learned and practiced its moral and religious code; and acting thereunder I was useful to myself and many others. My conscience was clear, and my hopes as to future life were undimmed by distracting doubt. But, when about seventeen, I was transferred to the midst of our showy Christian civilization, and at this impressible period of life Christianity presented itself to me at first under its most alluring aspects; kind Christian friends became particularly solicitous for my material and religious welfare, and I was only too willing to know the truth.

I had to take a good deal for granted as to the inspiration of the Bible—as is necessary to do to Christianize a non-Christian mind; and I even advanced so far under the spell of my would be soul-savers that I seriously contemplated becoming the bearer of heavenly tidings to my "benighted" heathen people.

But before qualifying for this high mission, the Christian doctrin I would teach had to be learned, and here on the threshold I was bewildered by the multiplicity of Christian sects, each one claiming a monopoly of the only and narrow road to heaven.

I looked into Presbyterianism only to retreat shuddering from a belief in a merciless God who had long foreordained most of the helpless human race to an eternal hell. To preach such a doctrin to intelligent heathen would only raise in their minds doubts of my sanity, if they did not believe I was lying.

Then I dipped into Baptist doctrins, but found so many sects therein, of different "shells," warring over the merits of cold-water initiation and the method and time of using it, that I became disgusted with such trivialities; and the question of close communion or not only impressed me that some were very stingy and exclusiv with their bit of bread and wine, and others a little less so.

Methodism struck me as a thunder-and-lightning religion—all profession and noise. You struck it, or it struck you, like a spasm—and so you "experienced" religion.

The Congregationalists deterred me with their starchiness and self-conscious true-goodness, and their desire only for high-toned affiliates.

Unitarianism seemed all doubt, doubting even itself.

A number of other Protestant sects based on some novelty or eccentricity—like Quakerism—I found not worth a serious study by the non-Christian. But on one point this mass of Protestant dissension cordially agreed, and that was in a united hatred of Catholicism, the older form of Christianity. And Catholicism returned with interest this animosity. It haughtily declared itself the only true church, outside of which there was no salvation—for Protestants especially; that its chief prelate was the personal representativ of God on earth, and that he was infallible. Here was religious unity, power, and authority with a vengeance. But, in chorus, my solicitous Protestant friends beseeched me not to touch Catholicism, declaring it was worse than my heathenism—in which I agreed; but the same line of argument also convinced me that Protestantism stood in the same crtegory.

In fact, the more I studied Christianity in its various phases, and listened to the animadversions of one sect upon another, the more it all seemed to me "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals."

Disgusted with sectarianism, I turned to a simple study of the "inspired Bible" for enlightenment.

The creation fable did not disturb me, nor the Eden incident; but some vague doubts did arise with the deluge and Noah's ark; it seemed a reflection on a just and merciful divinity. And I was not at all satisfied of the honesty and goodness of Jacob, or his family, or their descendants, or that there was any particular merit or reason for their being the "chosen" of God, to the detriment of the rest of mankind; for they so appreciated God's special patronage that on every occasion they ran after other gods, and had a special idolatry for the "golden calf," to which some Christians allege they are still devoted. That God, failing to make something out of this stiff-necked race, concluded to send his son to redeem a few of them, and a few of the long-neglected gentiles, is not strikingly impressiv to the heathen.

It may be flattering to the Christian to know it required the crucifixion of God to save him, and that nothing less would do; but it opens up a series of inferences that makes the idea more and more incomprehensible, and more and more inconsistent with a will, purpose, wisdom, and justice thoroughly divine.

But when I got to the new dispensation, with its sin-forgiving business, I figurativly "went to pieces" on Christianity. The idea that, however wicked the sinner, he had the same chance of salvation, "through the blood of the lamb," as the most God fearing—in fact, that the eleventh-hour man was entitled to the same heavenly compensation as the one who had labored in the Lord's vineyard from the first hour—all this was absolutely preposterous. It was not just, and God is justice.

Applying this dogma, I began to think of my own prospects on the other side of Jordan. Suppose Dennis Kearney, the California sand-lotter, should slip in and meet me there, would he not be likely to forget his heavenly songs, and howl once more: "The Chinese must go!" and organize a heavenly crusade to hav me and others immediately cast out into the other place?

And then the murderers, cut-throats, and thieves whose very souls had become thoroughly impregnated with their life-long crimes—these were to become "pure as new-born babes"—all within a few short hours of a death-preparation—while I, the good heathen (supposing the case), who had done naught but good to my fellow-heathen, who had spent most of my hard earnings regularly in feeding the hungry, and clothing the naked, and succoring the distressed, and had died of yellow fever, contracted from a deserted fellow-being stricken with the disease, whom no Christian would nurse, I was unmercifully consigned to hell's everlasting fire, simply because I had not heard of the glorious saving power of the Lord Jesus, or because the construction of my mind would not permit me to believe in the peculiar redeeming powers of Christ!

But, then, it was gently insinuated: "Oh, no! You heathen who had not heard of Christ will not be punished quite so severely when you die as those 'who heard the gospel and believed it not.'"

The more I read the Bible the more afraid I was to become a Christian. The idea of coming into daily or hourly contact with cold-blooded murderers, cut-throats, and other human scourges, who had had but a few moments of repentance before roaming around heaven, was abhorrent. And suppose, to this horde of shrewd, "civilized" criminals should be added the fanatic thugs of India, the pirates of China, the slavers, the cannibals, et al. Well, this was enough to shock and dismay any mild, decent soul not schooled in eccentric Christianity.

It is not only because I want to be honest, and to be sure of a heavenly home, that I choose to sign myself "Your Heathen," but because I want to be as happy as I can, in order to liv longer; and I believe I can liv longer here by being sincere and practical in my faith.

In the first place, my faith does not teach me predestination, nor that my life is what the gods hath long foreordained, but is what I make it myself; and naturally much of this depends on the way I liv.

Unlike Christianity, "our" church is not eager for converts; but, like Free Masonry, we think our religious doctrin strong enough to attract the seekers after light and truth to offer themselvs without urging, or proselytizing efforts. It preëminently teaches me to mind my own business, to be contented with what I hav, to possess a mind that is tranquil, and a body at ease at all times—in a word, it says: "Whatsoever ye would not that others should do unto you do ye not even so unto them." We believe that if we are not able to do anybody any good, we should do nothing at all to harm them. This is better than the restless Christian doctrin of ceaseless action. Idleness is no wrong when actions fail to bring forth fruits of merit. It is these fruitless trials of one thing and another that produce so much trouble and misery in Christian society.

If my shoe factory employs 500 men, and givs me an annual profit of $10,000, why should I substitute therein machinery by the use of which I need only 100 men, thus not only throwing 400 contented, industrious men into misery, but making myself more miserable by heavier responsibilities, with possibly less profit?

We heathen believe in the happiness of a common humanity, while the Christian's only practical belief appears to be money making (golden calf worshiping); and there is more money to be made by being "in the swim" as a Christian than by being a heathen. Even a Christian minister makes more money in one year than a heathen banker in two. I do not blame them for their money-making, but for their way of making it.

How many eminent Christian preachers sincerely believe in all the Christian mysteries they preach? And yet it is policy to be apparently in earnest; in fact, some are in real earnest rather from the force of habit than otherwise—like a Bowery auctioneer who, to make trade, provides customers too—to keep up the appearance of rushing business. The more converts made, the more profit to the church, and the more wealth in the pocket of the dominie.

How would the hundreds of thousands of these Christian ministers in the United States make their living if they did not bulldoze it out of the pockets of the credulous by making the "pews" believe what the "pulpit" does not?

Nor do we heathen believe in a machine way of doing good. If we find a man starving in the streets we do not wait until we find the overseer of the poor, nor for the unwinding of other civilized red tape before relieving the man's hunger. If a heathen sees a man fall from a tree-top, and seriously injure himself, he does not first run to a hospital for an ambulance, nor does the ambulance-man first want to know what precinct the injured man belongs to; but forthwith he is cared for and taken to the nearest shelter for other needed treatment, and when the danger is over then red tape may come in—the Christian machinery.

If we do anything charitable we do not advertise it like the Christian, nor do we suppress knowledge of the meritorious acts of others, to humor our vanity or gratify our spleen. An instance of this was conspicuous during the Memphis yellow-fever epidemic a few years ago, and when the Chinese were virulently persecuted all over the United States. Chinese merchants in China donated $40,000 at that time to the relief of plague stricken Memphis, but the Christians quietly swallowed the sweet morsel without even a "thank you." But they did advertise it, heavily and strongly, all over the world, when they paid $137,000 to the Chinese government as petty compensation for the massacre of 23 Chinamen by civilized American Christians, and for robbing these and other poor heathen of their earthly possessions.

In matters of charity Christians invariably let their right hand know what the left is doing, and cry it out from the house-tops. The heathen is too dignified for such childish vainness.

Of course, we decline to admit all the advantages of your boasted civilization, or that the white race is the only civilized one. Its civilization is borrowed, adapted, and shaped from our older form.

China has a national history of at least 4,000 years, and had a printed history 3,500 years before a European discovered the art of type-printing. In the course of our national existence our race has passed, like others, through mythology, superstition, witchcraft, established religion, to philosophical religion. We hav been "blest" with at least a half dozen religions more than any other nation. None of them were rational enough to become the abiding faith of an intelligent people; but when we began to reason we succeeded in making society better and its government more protectiv, and our great Reasoner, Confucius, reduced our various social and religious ideas into book form, and so perpetuated them.

China, with its teeming population of 400 000,000, is demonstration enough of the satisfactory results of this religious evolution. Where else can it be paralleled?

Call us heathen, if you will, the Chinese are still superior in social administration and social order. Among 400.000.000 of Chinese there are fewer murders and robberies in a year than there are in New York state.

True, China supports a luxurious monarch—whose every whim must be gratified; yet, withal, its people are the most lightly taxed in the world, having nothing to pay but from tilled soil, rice, and salt; and yet she has not a single dollar of national debt.

Such implicit confidence hav we Chinese is our heathen politicians that we leave matters of jurisprudence entirely in their hands; and they are able to devise the best possible laws for the preservation of life, property, and happiness, without Christian demagogism, or by the cruel persecution of one class to promote the selfish interests of another; and we are so far heathenish as to no longer persecute men simply on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, but treat them all according to their individual worth.

Though we may differ from the Christian in appearance, manners, and general ideas of civilization, we do not organize into cowardly mobs under the guise of social or political reform, to plunder and murder with impunity; and we are so far advanced in our heathenism as to no longer tolerate popular feeling or religious prejudice to defeat justice or cause injustice.

We are simple enough, too, not to allow the neglect or abuse of age by youth, however mild the form. "The silent tears of age will call down the fire of heaven upon those who make them flow."

"He who witnesseth a crime without preventing its commission, or reporting the same to the nearest magistrate, is equally responsible with the principal."

"If a stronger man assaults another who is weaker, it is the duty of the passer-by to take the weak man's part." But to Christians this would be a spectacle merely—one to be encouraged rather than prevented.

A heathen is not allowed to marry unless he is a good citizen, moral, and capable to instruct the children he may be honored with.

"Parents are responsible for the crimes of their children." This is an axiom of the common law in Chinese heathendom.

We do not embrace our wives before our neighbor's eyes, and abuse them in the privacy of home. If we wish to fool our neighbors at all about our domestic affairs we would rather reverse the exhibition—let them think we disliked our wife, while love at home would be the warmer.

I would rather marry in the heathen fashion than in the Christian mode, because in the former instance I would take a wife for life, while in the second instance it is entirely a game of chance.

We bring up our children to be our second selvs in every sense of the word. The Christian's children, like himself, are all on the lookout for No. 1, and it is a common result that the old people are badly "left" in their old age.

While traveling among the Christians one has to keep his eyes wide open; even then he has to pay dear for his comforts. In traveling in China among the pure heathen, especially in the interior, a stranger is not everybody's cow—only good to be milked and then turned loose—but he is the public's guest; his money is a secondary consideration.

As the heathen does not encourage labor-saving machinery, I do not hav to be idle if I don't want to, and, as a result, work is more equally distributed.

If a hungry heathen steals a bowl of rice and milk, and eats it on the premises, the magistrate discharges him—as a case of necessity—like self-defense. But he who knows the law and violates it, is punished more severely than he who is ignorant of it.

Christians are continually fussing about religion; they build great churches and make long prayers; and yet there is more wickedness in the neighborhood of a single church district of one thousand people in New York than among one million heathen, churchless and unsermonized.

Christian talk is long and loud about how to be good and to act charitably. It is all charity, and no fraternity—"there, dog, take your crust and be thankful!" And is it, therefore, any wonder there is more heart-breaking and suicides in the single state of New York in a year than in all China?

The difference between the heathen and the Christian is that the heathen does good for the sake of doing good. With the Christian, what little good he does he does it for immediate honor and for future reward; he lends to the Lord and wants compound interest. In fact, the Christian is the worthy heir of his religious ancestors.

The heathen does much and says little about it; the Christian does little good, but when he does he wants it in the papers and on his tombstone.

Love men for the good they do you is a practical Christian idea, not for the good you should do them as a matter of human duty. So Christians love the heathen; yes, the heathen's possessions; and in proportion to these the Christian's love grows in intensity. When the English wanted the Chinamen's gold and trade, they said they wanted "to open China for their missionaries." And opium was the chief, in fact, only missionary they looked after, when they forced the ports open. And this infamous Christian introduction among Chinamen has done more injury, social and moral, in China than all the humanitarian agencies of Christianity could remedy in two hundred years. And on you, Christians, and on your greed of gold, we lay the burden of the crime resulting; of tens of millions of honest, useful men and women sent thereby to premature death after a short, miserable life, besides the physical and moral prostration it entails even where it does not prematurely kill! And this great national curse was thrust on us at the points of Christian bayonets. And you wonder why we are heathen?

The only positiv point Christians hav impressed on heathenism is that they would sacrifice religion, honor, principle, as they do life, for—gold. And then they sanctimoniously tell the poor heathen, "You must save your soul by believing as we do!"

Members of my faith do not so worship gold, although they know it is a very handy thing to hav in the house; but honor and principle are dearer than pelf to the average heathen. But I dare say when the heathen hav become sufficiently demoralized by contact with Christian civilization and its Vanity Fair of pretense, pride, and dress, they will probably be worse even than the Christian in beating their way through this wide, wicked world. Pupils are often too apt.

In public affairs, it is either niggardliness that puts a premium on dishonesty, or loose extravagance for show, that encourages political debauchery and jobbery. In general, business men are lauded as great financiers who actually conspire to buy laws, place judges, control senates, corner and regulate at will the price of natural products; and, in fact, act as if the whole political and social machinery should be a lever to them to operate against the interests of the nation and people. In a heathen country such conspirators against social order and the general welfare would hav short shrift.

Here in New York, the richest and the poorest city in the world, misery pines while wealth arrogantly stalks. The poor hav the votes, and yet elect those who betray them for lucre to corporate and capitalistic interests; and the administration of justice—in fact, the whole system of jurisprudence—is to stimulate crime rather than prevent it. As to preventing poverty, or rendering it less intolerable, that is the most remote thought of religious and political local administration.

It is no wonder, under such circumstances and conditions, that New York is a most heavily taxed city, and the worst governed for the interests of New York. "Public office a public trust?" Rather, it is a farm to be worked, Christian-like, for all it is worth. Public spiritedness and moral worth hav no value or utility in "practical" Christian politics. Such civic virtues "don't pay."

Do as we do. Giv public office to the competent. Pay them well. If they are inefficient or indifferent, remove them at once. If dishonest, morally or financially, kill them as traitors.

"It is better that a child knows only what is right and what is wrong than to hav a rote knowledge of all the books of the sages. and yet not know what is right and what is wrong." Collegiate education does not necessarily make a youth fit for the duties of life. And men like Lincoln, Greeley, and other such Americans prove it.

"The most successful youth in life is not the most learned, but the most unblemished in conduct." So say the heathen. But here, it is called smart when a boy is merely impudent to the old, and it is "smartness," and is excused by the phrase that "boys will be boys," when a boy throws a stone with malice to break some one's window, or do some injury. And parents of such a boy, while they chide, will secretly chuckle, "He's got the makings of a man in him."

It is our motto, "If we cannot bring up our children to think and do for us when we are old as we did for them when they were young, it is better not to rear them at all." But the Christian style is for children to expect their parents to do all for them, and then for the children to abandon the parents as soon as possible.

On the whole, the Christian way strikes us as decidedly an unnatural one; it is everyone for himself—parents and children even. Imagin my feelings, if my own son, whom I loved better than my own life, for whom I had sacrificed all my comforts and luxury, should, through some selfish motiv, go to law with me to get his share prematurely of my property, and even hav me declared a lunatic, or hav me arrested and imprisoned, to subserve his interest or intrigue! Is this a rare Christian case? Can it be charged against heathenism?

We heathen are a God-fearing race. Aye, we believe the whole universe-creation—whatever exists and has existed—is of God and in God; that, figuratively, the thunder is his voice and the lightning his mighty hands; that everything we do and contemplate doing is seen and known by him; that he has created this and other worlds to effectuate beneficent, not merciless, designs; and that all that he has done is for the steady, progressiv benefit of the creatures whom he endowed with life and sensibility, and to whom as a consequence he owes and givs paternal care, and will giv paternal compensation and justice; yet his voice will threaten and his mighty hand chastise those who deliberately disobey his sacred laws and their duty to their fellow-man.

"Do unto others as you wish they would do unto you," or "Love your neighbor as yourself," is the great divine law which Christians and heathen alike hold, but which the Christians ignore.

This is what keeps me the heathen I am! And I earnestly invite the Christians of America to come to Confucius.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

The war was over, the new president inaugurated, the heat of the summer was upon us, and it was time to return to my Northern home. I had grown old in these years of the war, chattel slavery was abolished, and I felt that I had fairly earned rest. Many very sad things had come into my domestic life—things that I do not record, because private sorrows are not for public ears. Death is easily talked about, as it is what sooner or later comes to us all, but there are troubles much harder to bear than death, which we hide in our own bosoms, and the world has no suspicion that we are not comfortably happy. It seemed best to remove my home to Syracuse, where a sister of mine was living, and where in a short time came another sister to die. We were at first four sisters; now only two of us remained.

H. L. Green was at this time a resident of Syracuse, and through his exertions a radical club was formed, that was for some years very prosperous. It was very democratic, and some people who belonged in it intellectually did not like to associate with people who were not always grammatical in speech or fashionable in attire. However, we held a very respectable meeting once, and sometimes twice, a week. I was myself chairman over three years. At last I left the city for a year, resigning my place and assuring the society that I would never again hold office. Age had come upon me, and my health was not good enough to admit of evening work. Mr. Green removed from the city, and the club gave up the ghost.

Soon Liberal Leagues were formed. and the two Liberal papers, the Index and THE TRUTH SEEKER, seemed to become partisan. I had taken the Index for two or three years, but it had become distasteful to me, and I had given it up.

I had seen but one or two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER when, receiving a letter from the editor of that paper, I learned that a league had been formed in Syracuse for the purpose of helping the editor of the Index, by votes, at the anniversary of the National League, which was soon to meet in Syracuse. I was surprised that the two leading members of the old Radical Club had entirely ignored the existence of myself and sister, and were as private with their League as though they were guilty of intrigue and deceit. I was somewhat angered, and, with my sister's help, soon obtained double the names required, sent for and obtained a charter, and in one week had a Liberal League in good running order. The history of the divisions in the National Society is familiar to us all; I do care to return to it. Suffice it to say it was a hard fight, but those of us who survived, though scarred, feel that for us the battle was a triumph. It is well to know our friends. I was so falsified at that time by men and women that Syracuse has never been the same to me, and never can be again. I hav a few friends whom I love as brothers and sisters, and they hav been to me all that I could desire. In the long sickness of my last sister, terminating in death, my only near relativ, they were all in all—but my work is nearly done. THE TRUTH SEEKER family, with its supporters, are very dear to me—my own family, I must call them, as I hav no other. They hav always treated me with kindness and appreciation far beyond my deserts, never having rejected anything which I hav sent them. I hav felt often that I hav had more than my share of the paper.

Since I came into this family of truth seekers we hav lost by death very many valuable members. First, our martyred editor and publisher, D. M. Bennett; but his soul has been marching on through all these years, inspiring his friends to continue the work so well begun by him. And then our loved and highly-talented secretary, T. C. Leland, how much we miss his genial presence and his gifted pen; and dear and most excellent Elizur Wright, almost peerless as a helper in all ways—his intellect was marvelous, his heart full of goodness, and his fearlessness was always activ. "Is it duty?"—that question answered in the affirmativ, he never shrank. We hav lost others less known—my own sister Mrs. Raymond, Mrs. Bonnell, of Junius; Mr. Mitchell, of West Junius, and many others—peace to them all! And now my reminiscences close for the present. By and by, when my readers are rested, if the Editor allows it, I will giv you a chapter of my own experience in Spiritualism. Just at present I can think of little else but the imprisonment of men and women for their opinions orally expressed or written upon paper.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

Syracuse, June 20, 287.

POPULAR opinions on subjects not palpable to sense are often true, but seldom or never the whole truth. They are a part of the truth; sometimes a greater, sometimes a smaller part, but exaggerated, distorted, and disjoined from the truths by which they ought to be accompanied and limited. Heretical opinions, on the other hand, are generally some of these suppressed and neglected truths, bursting the bonds which kept them down, and either seeking reconciliation with the truth contained in the common opinion, or fronting it as enemies, and setting themselvs up with similar exclusivness as the whole truth. The latter case is hitherto the most frequent, as in the human mind one-sidedness has always been the rule, and many-sidedness the exception. Hence even in revolutions of opinion one part of the truth usually sets while another rises. Even progress, which ought to superadd, for the most part only substitutes one partial and incomplete truth for another; improvement consisting chiefly in this, that the new fragment of truth is more wanted, more adapted to the needs of the time, than that which it displaces. Such being the partial character of prevailing opinions, even when resting on a true foundation, every opinion which embodies somewhat of the portion of truth which the common opinion omits, ought to be considered precious, with whatever amount of error and confusion that truth may be blended. No sober judge of human affairs will feel bound to be indignant because those who force on our notice truths which we should otherwise hav overlooked, overlook some of those which we see. Rather he will think that so long as popular truth is one-sided, it is more desirable than otherwise that unpopular truth should hav one-sided asserters, too; such being usually the most energetic, and the most likely to compel reluctant attention to the fragment of wisdom which they proclaim as if it were the whole.—J. S. Mill.

Where Will It End?

The Mormon church is organized under the Utah territorial laws, and its affairs are managed by thirteen trustees. The church owns a large amount of property, real estate and personal, has a fund for importing its converts, and is a thrifty concern generally. The Mormon theology is based upon the Jewish Bible; its members religiously believe in imitating the revered patriarchs of old in the number of their wives; it has revelations of later date, but equal authenticity, than the Christian church possesses, and is for these and other reasons cordially hated by its mother and rival, the Christian church.

At the last session of Congress Senator Edmunds procured the passage of a bill authorizing fourteen trustees to be appointed by the president, and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to take possession and control of the property and affairs of the corporation of the Mormon church, and wind up its affairs. The bill also authorized the attorney-general to sue for and escheat to the government all property of the Mormon church corporation in excess of $50,000 of value in real property, except buildings used exclusivly for religious worship, and to devote the funds realized to common school purposes. The bill further provided measures to disincorporate the Mormon "Perpetual Emigration Fund Society," winding up its affairs and devoting its funds to common school purposes. The bill, which President Cleveland allowed to become a law without his signature, enacts also severe penalties for polygamy, and forces the first wife to testify against her husband.

Under the provisions of this bill, Mr. George S. Peters, United States attorney for Utah, has now filed suit against the trustees and managers of the Mormon church in behalf of the United States to disincorporate the said church and wind up its business. The petition alleges that the property is valued at $3,000,000—$2,000,000 in real estate and $1,000,000 personal property. It sets forth the law of Congress we hav quoted, asks the appointment of a receiver, and that all the books, papers, accounts, etc., belonging to the church be turned over to him, together with all the deeds, notes, and property of every description. September 15th was set down by the court for hearing the petition, and subpœnas issued to the church authorities ordering them to attend on that day.

The United States, therefore, may now be considered as fairly embarked in the business of confiscation of religious property, and a precedent established for future crusades of the kind. But, in the beginning of this affair, as one who opposes the church about to be despoiled as well as the church which has started the crusade, we desire to enter a protest against the conduct of the United States authorities. These authorities are being made the tool of priestcraft—the catspaws of a rival religion. The Christian church dreads the progress of the Mormon church, and has determined to stamp it out. The United States are the boots the Christian church has put on to do it in. The reason for these forcible measures is that Christian ministers cannot answer the arguments of the Mormon elders. The Mormons carry out the precepts and follow the practice of the Christians' saints, and quote chapter and verse from the Christians' Bible to justify themselvs. No one who accepts the Bible as the word of God, divinely given to man to liv by and die by, can prove these Mormons wrong. If polygamy was not wrong among God's first-chosen people—among those to whom he gave his commands direct, and whose welfare he personally looked after—why is it wrong today? "A bishop shall hav but one wife," wrote Paul to Timothy, but he didn't write that a layman could not hav more. Yet the Christians do not confine their complaints to the bishops of the Mormon church. Yet why call the Utah people villains, and commend the early Christians as exemplars of virtue? By the Bible Christian theologians cannot show the Mormons to be wrong. Hence this legal and forcible crusade.

Polygamy is a disgusting and detestable institution. It debases the men, and degrades the women to the level of hired mistresses, prostituting their bodies that they may liv out their religion. The Mormon church is a tyrannical, poverty-compelling machine of tremendous power. Like the Roman Catholic machine, it keeps its people in slavery and ignorance. It exacts a large share of the productions of its devotees, and commands absolute and servil obedience to the orders of the hierarchy. It is a huge imposture, useless and vicious, built of deception and craft upon the fear of superstitious ignorance. In this, too, it is like the Roman Catholic church, and for it there is no reformation. Destruction is the only thing that will reform it.

But its destruction should not be undertaken by force by the government, unless the government is prepared to undertake the destruction of all religions. Neither should it be undertaken at the instance of a rival sect, anxious for revenge because of its argumentativ defeat. If the government is to destroy all detestable religions, where shall it stop? If it is to confiscate the property of every sect that becomes a menace to our institutions, where is the law against the Roman Catholics? If church-members are to be placed under the direct supervision of the national government because they vote for men of their faith, why did not Congress pass laws robbing the Methodists who combined at the instance of their church leaders and voted for Grant and Hayes for presidents? If Congress can appoint trustees for a church because five or ten per cent of its membership hav relations with more than one woman, where are the trustees for the Protestant churches? Aye, where are the trustees for the churches dishonored by the membership of the senators and representativs who spend their salaries on hired mistresses, and when their money is gone procure them places in government service?

The people of the United States owe such liberty as they possess to such freedom of speech and worship as the Christians cannot help permitting. The Constitution of the United States does not permit Congress to legislate regarding religion, and without violating the supreme authority of the land Congress cannot take from peaceful citizens private property for public use without compensation. The fundamental law of our country was framed to protect all alike, to throw the arm of the law around all alike, and to allow everyone to exercise and support his own professed religion, be it Christianity or Confucianism, Mormonism or Mohammedanism. Congress has precisely the same right to confiscate the Roman Catholic cathedral that it has to sell at auction the Mormon temples. If the Supreme Court sustains this law, we shall expect the Protestants to urge Congress to knock down to the highest bidder the territorial property of that other enemy of theirs, the Roman Catholic church.

The only reason that other governments than ours hav urged when taking steps of this nature, has been that the church possessed so much property and had such a hold upon the people thereby, that the existence of the state was menaced. This was the plea of the old English kings, and of the Italian and Mexican governments in recent times. But in this case there is no such plea. If there were, the insignificant amount of property attached, compared to that held by other sects, would disprove it. Three millions of dollars is nothing for religious corporations to hold. The sum would not build the bare walls of the Catholic cathedral, and scarcely repair the rotten tenements held by Trinity corporation. The only reason, therefore, for this unconstitutional proceeding is that polygamy must be suppressed. But this, in itself, is as flimsy a pretext as the other would be. Only a small percentage of the Mormons are polygamists, and the law for reaching them is ample and efficacious. Hundreds of them hav suffered under it, and it is not pretended that this suit will reach more. But, for the fault of the few—a fault, as we hav said, already expiated by many—a whole body of religionists, thousands and thousands of men, women, and children, are to be robbed of their property. It is no excuse that the proceeds of this robbery will be devoted to a purpose infinitly wiser and more beneficial than that chosen by the victims. The property is theirs, and they should be allowed to use it as they choose. The United States are rich enough to build all the schools Utah needs without this money. Instead, the robbery of the Mormons is deliberately planned and legally executed to satisfy the hatred of an opposing religious sect.

While no one would rejoice more than we to see the Mormon superstition as well as the Christian superstition become a thing of the past—a phase of barbarism from which the race had become emancipated by natural progress—it yet becomes our duty, in the name of freedom, of impartial justice, of religious liberty, to protest against the action of the United States. The Mormon has as good a right to advocate his religious compound of faith and foolishness as we hav to disclose its true character. And if, overriding our Constitution, it becomes a settled thing that Congress can legislate out of existence all religious bodies which it hates, what is to prevent the national government from stamping out the irreligious people whom the church hates more?

The New Aspect of Mrs. Slenker's Case.

We are very sorry indeed to hav caused Mrs. Slenker the night's sleeplessness of which she complains, but we are a thousand times more grieved that she should hav given us cause, however innocently, to use the words we were compelled to. For it appears from the indictment that the matter she sent was not the Word itself, but a circular or letter containing the same story. And as she was very much grieved that her private "information" to the Heywoods should hav been printed, we should not hav thought that she would further circulate it. Neither should we be blamed for printing the indictment. Those who are appealed to for aid hav the right to know what they are aiding, and how could they obtain that knowledge except by perusing the indictment?

It is better in this matter, as in all others, to be honest. Mrs. Slenker has been engaged in a work which to her seemed necessary and good. Her intentions and personal character cannot be questioned. Others, however, hav not seen the necessity of the work, and hav disapproved of it. Probably ninety of every hundred Freethinkers condemn the work as uncalled for and useless. This is their right as clearly as it is Mrs. Slenker's right to consider her labors scientific. We do not see, therefore, why she should scold because Liberals do not all agree with her. Let her be "kindly tolerant, and giv those who differ from her the benefit of the widest charity and consideration."

There is valid excuse for the conduct of those of whom Mrs. Slenker complains. If the sole consideration in her case were the matter complained of in the indictment, we frankly confess that we should hav little heart in her defense, beyond personal regard for her and natural sympathy for an aged woman, doing what she thinks good and right, decoyed by the unprincipled agents of a scoundrelly society. Apart from the facts that the court before which she is arraigned is an improper one; that the law under which she is indicted is unconstitutional, that it is a statute that has been shamefully abused, and is vicious in the last degree; that her prosecutors are urged on by an illegitimate religious society, one of whose objects is to crush, by fair means or foul, opponents of Christianity; that her arrest is made with no good motiv—and if we had never until now heard of Mrs. Slenker, and knew nothing of her work—we would not consider the case one that called for an uprising of Freethinkers to defend invaded principles.

But there is another side to the case, and, while we giv due weight to the side just presented, it is upon the other view of it that we base our plea for Mrs. Slenker. In matters of this kind, of course, personal considerations must be left aside. It would make no difference with the principle if Mrs. Slenker were as vicious as she is virtuous and honest. And, admitting that there exists a necessity for municipal regulations restraining the spread of depraved literature, we must defend Mrs. Slenker, as the matter now appears to us, for a good many reasons. In the first place, the prosecutor cannot produce a single person who has been injured in person, property, or morals by anything Mrs. Slenker has done. This fact alone is sufficient to acquit her.

Secondly, the post-office folks hav no legal nor moral right to interfere with private correspondence. Under the present law, even, matter sent from one person to another, in sealed envelope at letter rates, is wholly between the two correspondents, and should no more be made the basis of a prosecution by the United States than should the conversation between the parties. Mrs. Slenker was not offering her letters for sale, nor her circulars. She was not engaged in that business which it is the intent of the law to suppress.

Thirdly, it is monstrously absurd to punish a person for putting a piece of paper into a letter-box, when the contents of the paper could be circulated orally from person to person without exposing them to any punishment whatever.

Fourthly, the matter complained of is a mere incident in Mrs. Slenker's work—one alleged fact among hundreds—of no more consequence to her or her work than a single brick is in the building of a house. To prosecute her for it is like allowing a man to put up a huge building, and then arrest him because one brick in the foundation is ill-looking and dirty. If Mrs. Slenker had laid special stress upon this ill-formed brick, or if she had had it duplicated, and sold it simply because it was ill-formed, the prosecutors might hav had a peg to hang their suit upon. But now the prosecution appears to be wholly an invasion of the right to send information through the mail.

For these and other reasons we shall do what we can to secure the acquittal of Mrs. Slenker, and hope every other person in the country will also help.

We Hope It May All Be So.

The writer of the subjoined is of the firm of Ronald and Heermans, Blacksburg, Va., counsel for Mrs. Slenker:

"MONTGOMERY CO., VA., Aug. 3, 1887.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I hav just read your article of June 25th on 'Virginia.' You do injustice not only to the state and to Mrs. Slenker's cause, but open yourself to ridicule for a lack of knowledge of the people of whom you speak. The community in which Mrs. Slenker livs will compare favorably in intelligence with any rural community in the United States True, there may not be so many Freethinkers, but for liberty-loving, justice-dealing, they are peers to any, and I would rather select a jury from the people of these mountains to try Mrs. Slenker's case than from New York or New Jersey, where Bennett and Reynolds had the benefit of that high order of intelligence of which they boast. Montani semper liberi! Virginia has produced no Comstock nor disgraced her statutes with 'blasphemous' laws. The spirit of Jefferson abideth in these mountains and will preside at the trial of Mrs. Slenker. C. A. HEERMANS."

We hav but a word to say in reply. The incident Mr. Heermans denies was related to us by Mrs. Slenker herself, and, with due respect to Mr. Heermans, we must decline to doubt that lady's word. In Mrs. Slenker's communication in another column it will be seen that she reaffirms the truth of the story. Ignorance is not confined to Virginia, of course, and we honor that state for the blasphemous vacancy in her statutes. But, as Mr. Heermans well recalls, it was the Infidel Thomas Jefferson who guided Virginia's lawmakers into the right path.

A Misplaced Sermon.

A good many folks are making a great deal of fuss over the letter written by Colonel Ingersoll to his sick friend when he sent him some whisky. The letter is a little poem, to wit:

"NEW YORK, April, 1887.

"MY DEAR FRIEND: I send you some of the most wonderful whisky that ever drove the skeleton from a feast or painted landscapes in the brain of man. It is the mingled souls of wheat and corn. In it you will find the sunshine and the shadow that chased each other over the billowy fields, the breath of June, the carol of the lark, the dews of night, the wealth of summer, and autumn's rich content, all golden with imprisoned light. Drink it and you will hear the voice of men and maidens singing the 'Harvest Home,' mingled with the laughter of children. Drink it and you will feel within your blood the startled dawns, the dreamy, tawny dusks, of many perfect days. For forty years this liquid joy has been within the happy staves of oak, longing to touch the lips of man."

The liquor was rare old whisky, probably not to be duplicated, and was the best that the sick friend—who had been directed to use a stimulant—could hav. It was an act of kindness on Colonel Ingersoll's part to send it. The letter that accompanied the gift was a sort of testimonial to the quality of the whisky, but, proceeding from Colonel Ingersoll, was clothed in poetic garments that no other brain could fashion.

Somehow the letter got to the public, and created a sensation. The Christians began at once to call Colonel Ingersoll the advocate of whisky-drinking, the liquor-seller's friend, and all the other things that follow. This might be expected, and only shows the unfairness of the pietists. Anyone not thoroughly stupid can see at a glance just why the letter was written, and anyone not thoroughly dishonest would never try to twist it into evidence that Colonel Ingersoll thinks too much of whisky. However, the Christian editors are dishonest enough to do it, and use it with all the power they possess.

But we are surprised that a Freethinker—a man of ability, and generally credited with possessing some worldly wisdom—should deem it necessary, because of this letter, to tell Mr. Ingersoll that he has been "misused by the devil," that he sent his friend a poisonous drink, that he has written a whisky "ad." of exceeding danger, that Whisky is the destroyer of the world, "and it is awful to think how the most gifted become his victims and advocates—especially poets in prose or verse;" that it really was Alcohol which wrote the letter, "and thus misused the colonel's hand and pen and wonderful brain."

This is abusing a man because he is courteous and kind, and is a long way out of place. It shows, too, a woeful lack of comprehension.

The Imbecility of Woman's Suffrage Advocates.

In the Denison Sunday Gazetteer, John G. Hertwig, a naturalized citizen, says:

"In the ranks of Freethinkers of the United States there are men advocating woman suffrage. These Freethinkers consider the male portion of the American people are a lot of imbecils, unable to attend to the public affairs of this free country, and want the women of the United States to do this. Nature, however, has assigned the latter to the performance of other duties."

Our German friend goes on to say that though the male advocates of woman suffrage may be imbecils, lacking the necessary manhood (sic) or intellect to grasp the affairs of state, yet women could not better the matter, as they would simply vote for Prohibition and the overthrow of religious freedom. The rights he givs to women are narrowed to this, and he seems surprised that they are "not content therewith:"

"Under our American fundamental laws named, all of the women of the Union, presiding over households, hav the natural right to render their homes as attractiv as possible to their husbands and sons; and strictly to enjoy sobriety, each in her own family circle, thus promoting the cause of sobriety throughout the land."

Mr. Hertwig evidently views the Freethought advocacy of woman suffrage from a broad and all-comprehending elevation. Because we hold that a woman is as much an individual as is a man; that she is just as capable of making rules by which she is herself governed as men are; that she is equally entitled with men to say who shall administer those laws; that, as she is one of the governed, and just governments derive their power from the consent of those governed, it is unjust to deprive her of a voice in the making of that government, Mr. Hertwig concludes that we are all imbecils who want to retire from public affairs and turn them over to our mothers, wives, and sisters! The logic which leads to this conclusion is extremely unique, and exhibits to public view an original, if peculiar, mind. But there can be no doubt that the ladies will be pleased to learn that they are still accorded the right to perform the duties demanded of them by nature, and they may continue to minister to the wants of the male members of their families without fear of incurring our German friend's displeasure. Should they, however, so far forget themselvs as to make their homes attractiv to their daughters, the consequences must be upon their own heads.

In Mr. Hertwig's nativ land it is usual for the wife to go into the field and perform the hard labor incidental to agriculture, while the husband sits at home and smokes his pipe till she shall return and cook his dinner. Whenever the lord and master condescends to help her prepare the land for planting, he usually does it by holding the handles of the plow while she, yoked with a four-footed animal, draws the implement through the soil. Mr. Hertwig forgot to mention that this duty and right is still preserved to her, and probably will be forever, in countries governed by such liberty-loving gentlemen as our naturalized friend.

THE Sun, of this city, says:

"It does seem that there is a certain incongruity in a struggle against Socialism in the United Labor Party. Mr. George's land scheme is distinctly Socialistic. Where is the line to be drawn in the United Labor party between the Socialism that is permitted and the Socialism that is tabooed?"

That is an easy conundrum. The line is drawn between Mr. George's theories and those of any other Socialist.

WE get this important item of news from the Sacramento, Cal., Bee: "A religious census was instituted in Eureka, Humboldt county, for the purpose of ascertaining just how many people professed allegiance to the various churches. The parsons are alarmed, not because they hav found how many nominal Christians there are in the community, but for the better reason that the census uncovered three thousand Infidels in the town. The churches proposed to go into politics on a teetotal-Sunday-law platform, but the nest of Infidelity which their curiosity stirred up has brought about a halt in their ambitions."

IN 1879 the following brief editorial appeared in the Seymour (Ind.) Times: "While Elmina is capering around in her kitchen and cow-lot with Brother Heermans's bleeding scalp dangling at her belt, it remained for Brother Remsburg to step in and harvest his hide and tallow. There isn't anything at all left of that poor orthodox man. We sincerely trust that he may gather up his scattered remains and bring them on board our gallant craft for a heavenward cruise." The above refers to a theological controversy which Mrs. Slenker and J. E. Remsburg had with Charles A. Heermans, who is now counsel for Mrs. Slenker in her pending case.

THE issue of John Swinton's Paper of August 7th contains the announcement that the paper is to be discontinued. Mr. Swinton says:

"I hav been wrecked by this paper and by the labors associated therewith—in which during the past four years I hav sunk tens of thousands of dollars—all of it out of my own pocket. The publication of John Swinton's Paper must now, therefore, be brought to an end."

This is regrettable indeed, for, of all the labor papers, John Swinton's easily stood at the head. It was better edited, contained more labor news, and had more editorial vigor than any labor paper now in the field. Mr. Swinton was the first to wake the workers up and set them to thinking. His appeals and advice led to the compact labor organizations of this city. Only for him and his paper, Henry George's wonderful canvass would hav been impossible. But, with the gratitude peculiar to masses, the workers hav deserted their old friend and taken up with newer theorists and more sensational teachers. The political leaders of the Labor party found that, because of Mr. Swinton's honest adherence to principle and repugnance to political deals, they could not use him, and they, too, went back on him, as they will on any square, up-and-down, one-hundred-cents-on-the-dollar man who will not resort to tricks to push his purposes. The workingmen will find they hav made a great mistake in allowing John Swinton's Paper to die. It will not be many moons ere an unflinchingly honest journal will be needed to expose the underhand deals of some of the Labor party politicians.

THE Sacramento Bee is honest enough with itself to say: "The Beecher memorial volume will soon be out. It is said that the tribute paid by Col. R. G. Ingersoll is really the only one worthy of perusal. We hav not had an opportunity of reading any of the others, but Ingersoll's is certainly a most remarkable example of magnificent poetry in prose. It is a song as grandly beautiful and as melodiously harmonious as anything that has ever entranced the ears of man. Ingersoll is the greatest orator, the sublimest word painter, that the world has ever seen. It is the fashion of cobwebbed brains to point to the ancients as masters of eloquence, to worship at the shrine of the philippics of Demosthenes or bow down in awed humility before Cicero's orations. And yet all their garnered words together could not form such a wreath of eloquence as is to be found in this one tribute to a dead American patriot by a living American genius. As one reads it he can hear the murmur of the brooks, the warbling of birds, the merry laughter of children, the songs of harvesters, can see the cattle standing in the pools, like 'statues of content,' be enchanted with nature in nature's happiest mood, and awed with her majesty and grandeur. More than that, one can sweep over the life of our greatest pulpit orator at a glance, and can follow him with the eye from that 'Puritan penitentiary' in which he was born, through all the successiv stages of battling with the prejudices instilled into him, until he stood on the mountain top, preaching that same liberty of thought for others that he deemed to be an inalienable right of his own. To our mind, there is nothing superior in the English language to this tribute penned by Ingersoll, unless it be that wonderful word panorama in which this same orator briefly traces the life of Napoleon I. from his lowly birth in Corsica until he pictures him with folded arms at St. Helena, gazing out upon the sad and solemn sea."

Letters from Friends.

WOODSTOCK, VT., July 27, 1887.

FRIEND MACDONALD: I hav $10, which I wish to get rid of in such a way that it will do the most good. I see no better way than to look after those that most need it. The first, Sister Elmina Slenker, is calling. She must hav $2. Then come the pictures that so please the orthodox part of the community; Mr. Heston must hav $3. Next, Dr. Edward McGlynn must hav $5, for he has stepped out into the wide world. Don't let any true American say "cold, cold world." In his honest movement and self-sacrifice stand by him and see him through those troubles ahead.

JOHN D. POWERS.

ATOKA, I. T., July 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please to change my address to this place. You see I am floating about so I can subscribe for a short time only. I send you fifty cents to extend my time. I am at present prospecting for a gold and silver mine at this place; hav a good showing. By the way, I would like to inquire through your columns (as prospectors) if any gospel sharp can giv me any information regarding the gold or silver mines that those Bible people worked. I see great accounts of large quantities of it, but no account of miners or mines which must hav been worked to produce it. Now if those old mines could be traced up they must be immensely rich, and with modern machinery ought to pay handsomely. I make this proposition. If any one will look them up I will go ahead and work them, giv him one-third, keep one-third, and giv the Lord one-third. I. A. VAIL.

LESLIE, MICH., July 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In the death and burial of my father, Franklin Elmer, July 12th, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, we can truly say a philosopher has passed away. He had emerged from darkness in the proud light of reason. As was requested, a Liberal lecturer was engaged, a Mr. Potter, of Eaton Rapids, who gave an address on death. Death was as natural as birth, especially in old age—but not in youth, as that is contrary to the laws of nature, and the time would surely come when death would not be known in youth; when we shall know how to rear our young as well as the birds of the forest, and when we will advance much faster in the future than in the past. The day has come when the world demands knowledge and will hav it. The most learned and intelligent clergy are to-day making science and the developments of nature a study for the coming generation.

SARAH A. HAYNES.

NEW YORK, Aug. 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: W. H. Burr's discovery of a woman in the moon is not new. Longfellow's infant Hiawatha observed it. It attracted his attention once while in company with his grandmother, the aged Nokomis, and he inquired of her who the woman was. She gave this explanation (I quote from memory):

Once a warrior very angry
Seized his grandmother and threw her,
Right against the moon he threw her,
'Tis her body that you see there.

It was certainly many years ago that Hiawatha remarked this feature of the lunar orb; and I would venture to point out that Nokomis's story is much superior to Mr. Burr's, in that it not only postulates a woman in the moon but explains how she got there. Very respectfullly,

G. E. MACDONALD.

OTO, IA., July 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Being a regular reader of your paper, and seldom seeing anything from this section in your columns, I thought you and the friends of Freethought might be pleased to hear how the cause is prospering away out here in the Northwest. Just at this moment I am enjoying the hospitality of my friend Mr. S. R. Day, one of the pioneers of western Iowa, and who has resided for over thirty years upon the farm he now owns, a beautiful plateau of some six hundred acres, situated in the pleasant valley of the Little Sioux river, Woodbury county, Iowa. As I hav already stated, Mr. Day is one of the pioneers of this section, and also one of the pioneers of Freethought, and much good has he accomplished for the cause of moral and mental liberty in this county. Just now we are being "favored" by a series of meetings by a doubtful sort of an evangelist, known as the Rev. Weber. As an orator the reverend gentleman is a success, if low, vulgar slang and dirty tales go to make up oratorical ability. While I write I am at the same time being edified by one of his finest efforts (as his tent is but a stone's throw from my friend's house). And at the close of each tirade of abuse, which he never fails to pour out upon the unprotected head of any who dares to disagree with him on the duties and destinies of mankind, or doesn't come down with the necessary wealth to keep the reverend gentleman's pay-roll good, or at the close of some vulgar story, wholly unfit for any respectable audience—expressions that ought to banish from society any man in a respectable community—there goes up a shout and hurrah that would do justice to Red Cloud and his entire army of painted braves. But all is not gold that glitters, nor all bombastic egotism reason, as the reverend gentleman discovered one day last week, while making his rounds of pastoral visits. It so happened that by mistake he dropped in at the home of one of our best-posted Liberals, and asked to pray with him. My friend placed his pocket-knife upon the floor, and told Mr. Preacher, if he thought he could move the knife, to go ahead, but the reverend concluded not to pray. My friend then asked him why prayer did not save Garfield, when all Christendom were praying for his recovery, which he avoided by saying that he did not pray for Garfield because he knew he could not recover. Good logic, not to pray for what you believe to be impossible; for the Lord is generally, if not always, all things being equal, "on the side of the heaviest battalions." But I hav already infringed upon your space. Inclosed you will find $2, one for S. R. Day, and one for myself, which you will please forward to the proper parties for the defense of Mrs. E. D. Slenker. N. E. P.

COLUMBUS, O., July 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A thought struck me to-day; it would be a good idea to publish an illustrated Bible by Watson Heston. The only trouble would be that to be properly done it would be so disgusting that it would bother Comstock, and he would be under the necessity of refusing the holy Bible his countenance, and prosecuting the publisher for publishing the worst book in the language. What a joke! If a company could be formed for the purpose I would take some of the stock, certain.

I am pleased to see Father McGlynn is inclined to expose some of the villainies of the Catholic church. He will prove to be an able coadjutor of THE TRUTH SEEKER in that line. At least, I hope so. Now, if Mr. George will come out and combat its superstitions there will be some chance of their doing good; for it is no use talking, this superstition and priestcraft must be torn up root and branch before the condition of the masses can be improved any worth talking about. It is the foundation stone of all the misery, poverty, and ignorance that exist among us. JOHN DOWNES.

FRANKFORT, MICH., July 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want to let the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know that I am growing up for the right, the good, and the true, although I hav had a hard chance so far in my life. But the light is beginning to gleam around me, for I hav read five copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which gave me an insight into the nature of things. I hav read the Michigan Christian Advocate, in which I found things I could not understand. I was told by the Christians that God did not intend we should understand all of his ways. But I am free from sin, for I was baptized in the name of the Holy Ghost last February. I ate and drank in remembrance of Christ at a Methodist quarterly meeting. I thought it looked very silly to eat and drink in remembrance of something which I knew nothing about. So I commenced a hymn which I had heard sung, as follows:

Can it be right for me to go
Along this dark, uncertain way,
Say I believe, and yet not know
Whether my sins are washed away?

I will no longer go this way,
Leading and being led astray;
But forward come, defend the right,
Led and leading into light.

One night as I went to prayer-meeting a gentleman said to me, "Be true to yourself;" and so I hav been up to this time. I hav seen men of all creeds, and men without a creed, whom Christians call Infidels. I am tempted to say:

Hurrah! hurrah! for the Infidel;
Hurrah! hurrah! for his fame;
Hurrah! hurrah! for his children—
May they grow up the same.

I would like to hear from some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for it seems lonely here. My mother is dead; my father is in Iowa.

MYNDRED L. D. LANSING (age 17).

WEST UNION, O., July 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In looking back over the various and almost innumerable positions occupied by the church, but finally given up when compelled by reason, common-sense, and public sentiment, one is forced to exclaim, "Consistency, thou art a jewel!" and to wonder what foolish position she will next occupy.

I cannot call to mind one single reform proposed or adopted, for the benefit of civilization and for the ennobling of mankind, for the last fifteen hundred years, that has not been tenaciously opposed by the dominant sect in the locality or country in which it was proposed; and the reformers were persecuted, cast into prison, or burnt at the stake, just as public sentiment would permit. By taking a close observation of the past and present, the liberal "Infidel" is made to feel glad that religious superstition and priestcraft are rapidly losing their oppressiv and murderous grip on man.

Superstition and supernaturalism always go hand in hand—neither of them has any existence except in imagination. They are twin-sisters, and their mother's name is Ignorance. Fanaticism and Enthusiasm are their legitimate offspring. This constitutes the family group down to the second generation, beyond which it is useless to trace them. It was from this family that first sprang that horribly diabolical doctrin of a personal devil and a literal hell, and with their extinction must go their favorits, i.e., hell and devil. When I read of the horrible murders committed in the name and defense of a so-called all-powerful God by self-instituted and ignorant adherents, my blood runs hot, and I wonder how long this thing will be tolerated by intelligent men and women.

When such men as Sir Wm. Blackstone, Bishop Jewell, and a great many others eminent in English literature, science, and art, believed in witchcraft, we of the present can point to the mile-stone along the highway of progress, and say with pride: "So much for free government, free speech, and a free press, bequeathed to us by the untiring efforts of the immortal Paine, Washington, Jefferson, and their noble fellow-laborers in the great cause of humanity."

When my long-faced orthodox friends begin to boast of their all-powerful God, I like to giv them one good solid left-hander like this: "Can your God make a stone so heavy he can't lift it?" which generally knocks them clean out on the first round.

We expect to hold our third annual Liberal camp-meeting here in a short time, with Watts or York as our priest-exterminator, and expect a glorious Liberal feast.

I like your excellent paper better every week; always find something interesting and instructiv, and would not be without it for twice its cost.

The pictures speak volumes, and are doing more to expose the foolish doings of the Bible than anything I hav seen of the kind. Heston is certainly a brick. Long may you both liv and prosper. R. J. WILSON.

HUTCHINSON, KAN., July 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: George Newton, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 18th, cannot see but that money is as much a measure of value as a yardstick is a measure of length or a pound weight is a measure of weight. It does not occur to him that value is an ideal thing which can no more be measured than love, or hope, or fear. Take, for example, a horse. His hight, circumference, length, and weight can be definitly measured so that no two will differ regarding them. But his value cannot be so measured. If put up at auction, he might be sold at $100, and in one hour the buyer might resell him for $150, or for only $50, and that without any change in the condition of the horse. The hight, length, and weight of a horse do not depend upon how many horses there are in the country, but his value does. The value of a thing—by this I mean its selling price in dollars—depends upon the whims and fancies of purchasers, upon supply and demand. Length and weight are definit qualities which can be definitly measured.

The value of a dollar is just as uncertain and as changeable as that of a horse, or even more so, because its supply can be changed easier and quicker. It takes years to rear horses, but the quantity of money in circulation in the country can be changed in a few months. When bankers cease to loan, but continue to collect in the money due them, it can take only a few months to reduce the circulating medium to one-half. If we had a financial system by which we could maintain a uniform amount of money per capita in circulation, the value of the dollar would be about unchangeable, but even then it could not be properly called a measure of value, though it would represent value. How can a thing measure value that has itself no fixed value? During the war, when the amount of money in circulation was greatly increased, we still called a dollar a dollar, and a dollar was worth a hundred cents. But the price of wheat and everything else went up in proportion to the increase of money per capita. In this case it was not the value of things that changed, but the value of the money. It is this that makes our financial system so unjust and dangerous. Bankers can change the value of money at any time they please and to any extent they please. When they want to make the value of the dollar high-priced, they can stop loaning and thus reduce the amount in circulation. When they want to make its value low, they can start loaning. They usually loan only to one-third the value of the securities, because they know that they can reduce the value of the securities to one-third when they please.

Let me illustrate: Suppose A to own a horse worth $100, and B to hav $100 in cash. Let us also suppose that B has the power to increase and decrease the value of money, at will, by changing the amount in circulation. Let us suppose that he first reduces the amount in circulation one-half. Then the value of the dollar will be double; or, in other words, half the number of dollars will buy the horse. Let us suppose that B buys the horse then for $50. Now, let us suppose that B doubles the amount of money in circulation. The horse will then be worth $100 again, and if A should buy him he would hav to pay back the $50 he got from B, and giv his note for $50 more. Then let B reduce the amount of dollars per capita in circulation to one-half again; he could buy the horse back for $50 and pay B with his own note. This shows that the present financial system is one of legalized robbery. Nor can any just system of money ever be established that does not maintain a fixed sum of money per capita in circulation. This, in my opinion, can only be done by having national banks just as we now hav a national post-office. These banks should loan at a monthly rate of interest, and every borrower should be compelled to pay the rate of interest for the time he had the money. The rate should be raised monthly when the amount in circulation was above the sum per capita fixed upon, and lowered monthly when the amount in circulation was below that sum. In this way, and in no other, can the volume of money per capita be kept the same. On no other plan can we hav honest money.

But there is another important defect in our money. It has generally been believed that money should represent labor, and hence we hav held that it should be made of gold or silver, because that represents labor. But even gold does not represent labor if it can be got without labor. Let us suppose the case of a man homesteading 160 acres of land and afterwards a gold mine is found upon it. The owner of the land lets out the job of mining the gold to others and gets half of the proceeds. His gold does not represent labor in his hands. He did neither toil nor spin, and yet he got gold. It is therefore a poor way to make money represent labor to hav it redeemable in gold or silver. It can be made to represent labor more perfectly in another way. Let it be loaned only on securities of the products of labor. It should not be loaned on land or mines, but on houses, barns, machinery, grain, cotton, wool, stock, etc. Then and not till then will money hav a labor basis. Paper money loaned on this principle is as good as gold and much easier got. Money loaned on land as security represents land and not labor, even if the money should be made of gold. But money loaned on labor or its products as security represents labor, even if the money is made of paper.

GLENWOOD SPRINGS, COL., July 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50 to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been almost a constant reader of it since Mr. Bennett's time, and I think it grows richer and better as the years go by. I am especially interested in "Tales Told Out of School," and "News and Notes." The cartoons are good. I think that in the issue of July 9th, "Religion in the Man and Instinct in the Brute," is particularly good, and it tells a particularly sad story.

Out here in sunny Colorado, and especially in Glenwood Springs, the people do about as they please both on Sunday and Monday. Stores of every description—dry goods, clothing, hardware, and grocery stores—are open boldly and aboveboard until noon on Sundays, while drug-stores and saloons are open all day. We hav a population of fifteen hundred, and hav only one church building. It is Catholic. The Presbyterians will soon hav one completed.

There seems to be an inspiration in these grand old mountains here that is fatal to superstition and orthodoxy. The whole country is so big and so broad, the atmosphere is so pure and life-giving, and all nature is so grand and beautiful, that human nature cannot but be influenced by them, and the result is that we hav a great many broad, Liberal-minded men and women.

We are all waiting anxiously for Ingersoll's address to the jury in the blasphemy case. MISS MAGGIE PATTERSON.

LONDON, ONT., July 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav never seen any letters from this orthodox city, I thought I would like to send you a line or two. I just wrote a letter to my wife in Toronto; she is getting some books and some TRUTH SEEKERS bound there. Canada needs all the help it can get to enlighten the people. Mr. Watts is doing grand work in Toronto, and Secular Thought is a fine paper, but I could not be without THE TRUTH SEEKER. The cartoons are just grand. I never was much of a Christian; I always tried to make honesty my religion. I never could see any sense in this sin-and-repent business, but I did not hav so much knowledge until I began to read Liberal papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER in particular. Now I am always ready for them; and, although I bake bread and peddle it all over the east end of London, I always speak my honest thoughts, and sometimes giv a short lecture when time permits. I don't think I hav lost a customer of any consequence through it. I hav been the means of making a good many skeptics, although I cannot get them to subscribe for a paper. They all plead hard times. When I see a person—man or woman—with the slightest spark of reason, I keep at them until I finish them; otherwise it is a waste of time. There are a great many Freethinkers in this taxed-to-death city, but they are not game. I would soon get up a society if I was not peddling bread at all hours.

Inclosed is $1 for "Self-Contradictions of the Bible;" one of my converts asked me to get it for him. I did not see it advertised lately, and I forgot the price. I will attend to the paper a little later. If there is a balance let it be for Elmina D. Slenker. I always said I would never shoulder a musket for anything but liberty. JOSEPH ALLASTER.

ITHACA, N. Y., July 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A new heaven and earth presupposes old ones, which hav died or faded, being the experience of nature's embryo, at the advance of knowledge. Man is a substitute for nature, as all things whatever are embodied in him; hence he is not a part of nature, but the whole in mental and original form. He is the masculin and the feminin poles united. When we talk about nature, we mean man, for in him dwells every possible expression; he is the founder of the to be new heaven and the new earth; the creator of all wisdom in heaven or earth; a son of the virgin embryo old world from whose conception the new was, or is, overshadowed.

It is a species of insanity to suppose that the Bible is to be blotted from nature's acts, while the facts are that plain nature, as in Gen. i, 1, came into the embryo state of mental knowledge having only the capacity to exercise the animal or base brain, and has but just now passed through the animal state of knowledge and come to its birth and mental form. Thus in the end of the old embryo state (or world) God (nature the auimal) sent forth his son; born of nature, history of virginity (the Bible). Thus the old world of embryo ignorance has passed away, and behold, I, the son, the science, the mental form of virgin nature, make all things new. Thence I will use a Bible term for the want of a better one. Thus, "In the beginning was the word" (which means a conception) or declaration, and this declaration was with God (nature's mental form) in man, and the declaration was (or is) God (the science) of mental form. Thus this is the potency of mental creation of the new heaven and earth. Hence he, this new-born son, is the God and creator of all things in mental form, and as the earth from the same soil brings forth special varieties, so does the moral earth (the feminin of mental nature) bring forth a variety of ideas, the mold of which it is impossible to change. Hence wars and contentions may as well cease at once, and join in the revolving principle of the natural universe, where all collisions must cease. It is a great wonder that among so many wise, so little knowledge is manifest. Can we not see that we are one people (as in "Isaac shall thy seed be called"). Thus in the cartoon of July 23d we behold the oneness and pleasure of Isaac with Rebekah his wife. "Isaac" means laughter, or a pleasing reflection; as much as to say sectarianism will cease when knowledge shall cover our nakedness.

I write this as a standpoint to which all must finally come. But you will, as usual, say, Can any good come out of Nazareth? All new beginnings are unpopular and infidel. The old world has passed away, and behold I create a new heaven and earth wherein dwelleth righteousness and unity. This is a collectiv creation of class unity, a creation of Free-thought personality; that is to say, each creates his own world according to his mental capacity. Thus all things are made by him (plural) that are made, and without him (plural) nothing can be made; hence our collectiv individuality hav become one, the bridegroom and the bride. The only positiv guide to truth is comparativ; thus, as we see in plain nature variety in perfection growing from the same soil, so a variety of ideas are produced from the new heaven and earth (the brain of man), each in perfection, as in plain earth, and no collision. Though I am a crank in the eyes of some, and my experience is unpopular, the fact of these observations cannot be avoided. ZENAS KENT.

NEW YORK, July 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In to-day's TRUTH SEEKER Boston's great mathematician, G. N. Hill—Horace Seaver's sensible young man—is out again, and writes: "What need has the world of any professional mathematicians if other professions can do their work just as well?" He would not trust for a decision to an editor of a daily, or to Mr. R. G. Ingersoll. No! he wrote to me: "Our gallant colonel is a lawyer, and may not hav more knowledge of mathematics than you hav; every man to his trade, you know." I hav full proof that he does not even comprehend or understand what he reads, as years ago he cited for his support the Encyclopedia Brittanica and Martin's Calendar, but never gave a sentence thereof, because, of course, both are against what he says and pretends to know; but, nevertheless, he still crows lustily. He would not trust Mr. Ingersoll nor any editor, except, perhaps, Mr. Seaver, but tells me to "just drop a few lines to the principal professor of mathematics, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass. He [I] will soon be on the high road to knowledge." I will try to accommodate this mathematician of the Hub, and change my offer to suit him, and see whether he will take the bait. Herewith I renew my wager of twenty-five dollars or more: "That, to start from and with the first of January, 1600, is, to count correctly, now the 288th, and not the 287th year." I am perfectly willing to leave the decision to the principal professor of mathematics of Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Cornell, or Rutgers—either he may select. If the decision be against me, Mr. Hill shall be at liberty to pocket the stake-money or do as he pleases; but if he loses, I shall turn over the gain for the Liberal cause. Is this not fair? Will it suit him now? Let him come out like a man. I am not rich, but the one or the other, whoever is wrong, deserves a little punishment for this year's long mulish stupidity. Then we will see the high road to knowledge clear. FRED. KOEZLY.

OREGON, Mo., July 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A little item of interest to our Freethinkers generally: This vicinity and place, like so many others, is thoroughly priest-ridden. Although it has not over one thousand souls, there are several churches existing with regular services—Presbyterian, Methodist, German Methodist, Christian, Colored Baptist—the colored folks are Baptist "kase Jon de Babtist he was one"—besides a large sprinkling of Catholics, and half a dozen others. The Presbyterian is the aristocratic one of the village, where none are very wealthy, and it is amusing to see "high-flyers" at fashion who immigrate here as Methodists, or other dissenters and heretics, attach themselvs to this representativ of our oi aristoi. It proves that modern sectarianism is nothing but a variety of social companies. Take away the social feature and the churches would all perish shortly. They are places where pride, vainglory, and hypocrisy exhibit themselvs in all their pomp and circumstance. Of course the heathen are cared for (those at Borriboola Gha), but occasionally a poor member of the church comes near starving to death. And this in the "over-producing West." There are a few very poor people who belong to the Presbyterian church for some reason or other. Now there is a Woman's Union here, started originally for social purposes, but by the persecution of some priests it developed into what said priests had predicted—a woman's rights affair. It is an old, firm institution. Sometime ago a woman with a large family in extreme destitution, a widow and good Presbyterian, and faithful member of that church society here, appealed to this union for aid, for fuel and flour. This union had done some charitable work before. The help was given, but a Freethinking member offered the following resolution in substance:

> WHEREAS, Many appeals for charity are made to this society; and,
> WHEREAS, This society was not founded with a view to doing acts of charity; therefore,
> Resolved, That hereafter in all cases of appeals to it by members of churches for aid, the appeal be referred to the church of which the applicant is a member, and that the present appeal of Mrs. —— be referred to the Presbyterian congregation of this place.
> Resolved, That these resolutions be published, etc.

It was beautiful to see what a stirring among dry bones this caused. You may imagin how many rich brothers and sisters there were who stand high as givers to heathen, and never knew anything about the poor sister who actually livs close by them. I.

KENT, O., July 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I think when we see an honest man in the pulpit, he should be mentioned as well as the bigots who would dethrone reason and enslave the mind as well as the person of man. We hav both these in our little village. One divine proclaimed from his pulpit, yesterday, that there was no use disguising the fact that if two neighbors were to sow a crop of wheat on adjoining lands, and one should prepare his ground well, sow good seed, and follow well the conditions necessary to make a good crop, but should swear from morning till night and curse God the year round, he would get a much better crop than the one who used poor seed, sown on poor ground and poorly prepared, even though he prayed continually, with the neighborhood to help him. Now see how much better truth looks on paper than a lie as expressed by our Romish father, who says, "Reason belongs to man, as a governor, but no man has the right to reason against the dictates of the gospel; and unless the mind of man is influenced directly by the spirit of God he should not be allowed to reason, for reason ofttimes causes a man to murder," etc. He would hav us believe that only the great infallible at Rome (think of that) and his spiritual legates, over whom he has spread his (should I use a capital H) garments, should be allowed to use reason at all. If this was the case (and I am sorry to say it is too much so), Bridget could "pay the praste" for even the breath she draws, and be made to think it God's will.

I am the recipient, of late, of several letters and postals, some of which, although in a friendly spirit, are rather inclined to giv me "particular fits" for some of the opinions expressed in my correspondence to your valuable paper. Well, brothers, fire away, for by such means we learn from each other. To my mind nothing at this present time, when the mind of man is so deeply contaminated with evil, both from heredity and contagion, can take the place of law and government. I mean by law certain fixed rules and principles by which we are governed. Every individual has, or should hav, a code of laws or principles by which he is governed in his dally walk—such laws as his reason and sound judgment hav dictated to him as the best for his physical and mental development. As his mind grows and ascends higher up in the more matured man, he sees the necessity for new laws; the old must be repealed and new ones, better adapted to his needs, must be made. This is self-apparent to all. Now when we see man making so many mistakes in the laws he has set down for his own individual guidance, how can we expect a select few to make perfect laws to govern the many? From individual law comes family law, by which the members and heads of a family are governed; then the law for societies; then states and nations. Then comes the law of nations by which they hav amicable intercourse with each other. They buy, sell, and traffic in a friendly way under certain laws which each has agreed upon as just. As new laws are needed the old ones are annulled. Who can say that because one law, or a portion of the laws, of our land, as made by our law-makers, and suitable to the majority, do not harmonize with the ideas and feelings of a few, or minority, the entire code of laws should be abolished, and man left like the more inferior portion of the mammalian family, the strong to feast upon the weak? One man writes me, "The curse of the ages has been man-made laws," and speaks of a "monster criminal, the state;" and he still further speaks of "our organized pirate called government." Another says, "Do away with law, and educate the people so we will need no law." Oh that all men were so educated! What a beautiful world this would be! But, unhappily, it is not the case, and something within asks, Is it possible to educate man to perfection? How many of us do as best we know? Will it not be easier to teach man to do right with a constraining law to punish him when he does wrong? No man who does not wish to steal can object to a law to prevent stealing. Another writes me that no one or body of men hav a right to restrain another or others in their liberty. In answer to this I wish to say that law is not intended to hold anyone in check from asserting all his natural freeborn rights, but to stop him when he undertakes to usurp the rights of others. There is no such thing, neither can there be, as justifiable, absolute liberty, for when one carries his liberties beyond certain bounds he is trespassing on the rights and liberties of others. When fire is devouring everything before it, and undertakes to burn up the sea, the briny surf says, "Hold, check your ravenous appetite. Your liberty stops here, and my liberty begins." What is a government but a big family; its members overgrown boys and girls, many of whom are as wild and untaught as in their infancy, and need a parent law as much? What is it that made man, made this earth on which we liv, made the beautiful flowers that decorate our homes? What is it that has spread the carpet of green over the land on which we love to walk? What the sun, the moon, etc., as in wonder we look? Law, nothing but law. Law governs the most minute atom of matter, as well as the whole monster creation. Yet we see even natural laws disobeyed, and the criminal punished. Man daily disobeys nature's law, and is brought to an untimely and premature death. What is a monstrosity but a disobedience of the natural laws?

We say the law of inertia, law of gravity, of attraction, of repulsion, etc., and think nothing of it because they are found or known to exist in nature, but named by man. How do we know there are laws of forces called centripetal and centrifugal—the one to draw the particles of matter toward a center, the other from the center? We can neither see, hear, nor feel any of these laws or forces, and yet we know they exist. How then when we see by these laws how man has been evolved from the mineral and vegetable kingdom to the highest type of the animal kingdom, his mind evolved to intellect, and that intellect improved as the finer tissues and organs of the brain hav improved—to what some of us seem to think noble specimens of nature? Do we ever stop and think how little we actually know, and what pigmies we are both in our natural and cultured natures? How can it be possible, with that great law of government that dictates to forces of electrical and psychologic life, that the animal species is at its best, and stops here? Oh, no, brothers; although we may never look back to know of our present life, yet that great and enduring law still governs all life in all stages of growth. Pardon me for using my personal liberty in speaking what I believe to be true, and although you may differ from me in opinion, that does not restrict me from so expressing myself unless it trespasses on and injures the same liberty of others. Let us first know what good laws are, and then liv up to them. Break no law by force, but legislate better ones as required. A. D. SWAN.

How They Were Saved.

A TRUE STORY.

She stood beside the iron road,
A little child of ten years old;
She heard two meeting thunders rolled
From north and south, that plainly showed Danger too fearful to be told.

Nearer, still nearer, rumbling on,
One train approached with crashing speed;
What could she do? who would giv heed
To her—a child—who stood alone
And voiceless as a roadside weed?

A feeble cry she raised, and stood
Across the track—and then untied
Her little apron from her side,
And waved it swiftly as she could,
If only she might be espied!

If only on the hissing back
Of that huge monster, nearing fast,
The engineer his eye might cast
On her, there on the curving track,
And heed her signal ere he passed!

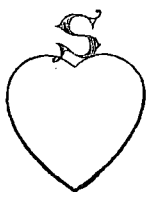
She stands with shout and warning beck;
On comes the train with thundering roar;
The fireman sees—he looks once more—
He sees a little waving speck,
And slackening, slowly moves and slower.

"Hi! little girl, what's all this row?"
"Another train! My ears it stuns!
It rounds the curve like rattling guns!
Back! back!—for I must signal now
The other!" and away she runs.

So by this little maiden's hand
Were hundreds saved from fearful lot;
But when with awe they spoke of what
They had escaped—and made demaud
About the child—they found her not.

For she had vanished through the wood;
None guessed her dwelling-place or name,
Nor by what wondrous chance she came—
While home she ran in blithesome mood,
Nor knew she had done a deed of fame.

But in the olden times they would hav said
It was an angel that stood there—
The hood above her golden hair,
A nimbus glowing round a head
With supernatural radiance fair.



The small white apron that she waved
Across the dangerous iron track,
To warn the rushing engins back,
Might hav been wings, whose flashing saved
Five hundred souls from mortal wrack.

A Single Condition.

A story about eccentric Isaac Barnes, who was once collector of the port at Boston, and a noted wit, is recalled by the Philadelphia Record. His wife was a devoted Baptist. When he went to church, which was seldom, he went with her. But he always went with a mental reservation, upon which his fancy disported itself during service, for there was only one Baptist that he liked, and that was Mrs. Barnes. Now, the Baptists were about to build a chapel, and Mrs. Barnes was interested in procuring subscriptions to that end. She spoke to Mr. Barnes about it, and, as he intimated a willingness to subscribe, she sent a collector to urge him further. The collector said he had understood that Mr. Barnes was willing to subscribe. Mr. Barnes said he was. The collector drew out a subscription book and offered it for Mr. Barnes's signature. "No," said Barnes, "I won't sign that book, because that isn't necessary. My word's just as good as my bond. When I say I'll subscribe I mean it. And I may as well say at once that my subscription will be $5,000." This fairly took the collector's breath away, for it was almost the whole of the amount they were trying to raise. "That's a splendid gift," he managed to say after a while; "we shall be deeply obliged." "Not at all," said Barnes; "but," he added, "there is a condition to the gift." "Oh," said the collector, "I'm sure any condition you might annex would be well received by our people." "I'm not so sure about that," said Barnes, "the condition is that all the people baptized in the new chapel shall be baptized in boiling hot water." "Good morning," said the collector as he put the subscription book in his pocket and walked off.

Only a Dog.

Yes, but what a noble creature! How strong and courageous! How watchful, patient, and affectionate! How docil, obedient, constant, and faithful!—quite different from many other animals.

Nearly all children are fond of dogs, and dogs like children when they do not tease and annoy them.

The word canine, relating to dogs, is from the Latin canis. In the wild state he is classed with the wolf, cayote, jackal, and fox, but fossil remains hav been found that indicate that he belongs to a species different from the above-mentioned animals. The wild dog of Australia is called dingo.

From time immemorial the dog in a tame condition has been the friend of man and children. The dog is a mammal, and you hav learned before what that is. Little puppies are as cunning as you can imagin. They are born blind, their eyes opening to the light when about ten days old. Their mother is always very proud of her children, and fearful for their welfare; she will allow no one to approach them except those in whom she has great confidence, not because she is cross, but because she fears some injury may befall her offspring.

There is a wonderful variety among dogs, and each species has some distinguishing trait—some are more watchful than others; some are good for hunting on land; others will plunge in the water for prey, as the water spaniel. Some, in the cold regions, are employed in drawing heavy loads; others, like the Newfoundland, can swim and dive, and hav frequently saved people, especially children, from drowning. All dogs swim naturally. Then, there are the St. Bernard dogs, or Alpine spaniels, who hav saved the lives of travelers lost in the snow on the mountains. In passing the Alps, strangers sometimes lose the way, and, falling in the clefts benumbed with cold, they fall asleep and die.

The monks of Great St. Bernard convent would send out their dogs to look for lost travelers, and their sense of smell is so keen that they can find a person though buried deep down under the snow. They would run with their noses to the ground till they found the spot where the wanderer lay buried under the snow, and then would scratch, dig, and bark till some one came to help them in their laudable work. One dog of this kind, who saved the lives of twenty-two persons, was decorated with a beautiful medal for his noble services.

Some dogs, notably the terrier, will catch rats, mice, and all kinds of vermin. My own dog, Bonnie, will scent a rat very quickly, and watch for hours, like a cat, until the rat comes from his hole, when he seizes him in an instant.

He only needs to hear the word "rats," when he is on the alert and ready to hunt for them. He also hunts mice, slugs, snails, beetles, and catches moths, millers, and flies. Dogs can be taught many tricks. We once had a dog in our family who would walk on his hind legs, beg, say his prayers, play dead, jump rope, make believe drunk, and sing. He was very cunning, and a great pet.

I hav heard a story of a dog who bought pies. It was in this way (and Buffon in his "Natural History" tells the same story). A man went through the streets of Edinburgh selling penny pies, and ringing a bell as he went. One day he gave this dog a pie. The next time he heard the pieman's bell, what did the dog do but seize the man by the coat-tail and hold him? The pieman showed the animal a penny, and pointed to his master, who was a grocer, and was watching the proceeding in the doorway of his shop. The dog looked and nodded at his master in a beseeching manner, running back and forth between the grocer and the pieman. Finally his master put a penny on the dog's tongue, and he instantly ran and dropped it in the pieman's hand and received his pie. And this practice was carried on every day as long as the pieman came that way.

There are many instances of the sagacity of these animals which make them appear almost human in their knowledge. They learn the very expression of a face, and know the wish of their master without a word being spoken. Their attachment to their friends is remarkable, and there are well authenticated cases of dogs dying of grief at the loss of a friend, sometimes refusing all food and mourning till they die upon the grave of their master. Many anecdotes are told of the wisdom and kindness displayed by these at times misunderstood and abused creatures.

They hav a superior sense that enables them to track the path of their owner, and if left in a strange place can usually find their way back, though never over the road but once.

The dog is quick to understand, and is the most devoted friend and servant of man, never failing to obey his wishes when fully understanding what they are. He is quick to perceive who likes or dislikes him, and he never fawns upon one when it is not meant, that is, he is not deceitful. A dog always meets his master with gladness, and will caress even the hand that has struck him. He is the same friend to man in his darkest days of adversity as in his hours of prosperity, and will follow his footsteps when all others desert and abandon him, share all his toils and dangers, protect him as far as he is able, guard his property, is always affectionate and kind when treated right, and is faithful unto death. He has no vices as man has, is intelligent and tractable, understands language, and some species can all but talk.

Dogs are subject to a disease called rabies, and if a person is bitten by a dog suffering from this malady, the tortures are terrible, and result, unless prompt measures are taken, in a horrible death. M. Pasteur, of Paris, is said to hav discovered a remedy for the bite of a mad dog, and people hav been successfully treated for this disease by him. Intelligent physicians think that the disease is not nearly so common as has been supposed.

Dogs dream and start in their sleep, and moan as people do.

The ancients were fond of the food of dogs. The Polynesians and Chinese, it is said, are fond of dog meat to-day.

Some people dislike these animals, and cannot bear the sight of them; but, as a rule, almost everybody likes a good and amiable dog. The American Indian was always accompanied by his dog, and thought he would hav him for a companion after he died and went to the "happy hunting ground" in which the Indian believed. Byron has sung:

'Tis sweet to hear the watch-dog's honest bark
Bay deep-mouthed welcome as we draw near home;
'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark
Our coming, and look brighter when we come.

We should be kind to these intelligent and affectionate animals, for they are the emblem of fidelity. They look to us for food and shelter, and in return they protect us, are faithful and watchful, and, if occasion demands, will lay down their lives for us without a murmur. They are close in their friendship, and when treated properly never desert an old friend for a new one.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What is the word canine derived from? How is the dog classed in a wild state? What class does he belong to? What about the variety of dogs? Name the classes that you are familiar with. What about the St. Bernard dogs? What kind catches vermin? Relate the anecdote of the dog and the pieman. Do dogs die of grief? How do they track their master's footsteps? How does the dog meet his master? What disease is he subject to? Who has a method of curing rabies? What nations eat dog meat? Do all people like dogs? Can you repeat what Byron wrote of the dog? Why ought we to be kind to the dog?

Paine Vindicated!

—o—

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

—o—

The New York Observer (Presbyterian) having recently reissued its assault upon the memory of Paine, this pamphlet should be circulated everywhere in vindication.

TOGETHER WITH

A ROMAN CATHOLIC CANARD.

A Fabricated Account of a Scene at the Death-bed of Thomas Paine.

BY W. H. BURR.

This pamphlet shows that the account of Paine's dying moments attributed to Bishop Fenwick (upon which the Observer relies to prove its principal charges) is a forgery, it being impossible that Fenwick could hav written the alleged account.

ELEMENTS
OF
UNIVERSAL HISTORY
FOR
HIGHER INSTITUTES IN REPUBLICS AND FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION.

By Prof H. M. Cottinger, A.M.

This book is just what the busy world of to-day needs—a perfect compendium of history from 2,000 years B.C., on up to 1883, all in a nutshell.—Elmina Slenker.

As a text-book in schools, the book would occupy an important place; in the family it would be no less important, as conveying information that all should be acquainted with.—Susan Wixon.

Mr. Cottinger's intentions in writing this book are excellent, and his standpoint admirable; it may be commended as fulfilling its purpose of a concise and interesting historical text-book.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

The Pope He is a Happy Man.

The pope he sat in the Vatican,
In St. Peter's chair sat he;
And he said, "Such a fix as I've got into,
I ne'er in my life did see."
An' aye as he swiftly twirled each thumb,
He sighed to himself, "Me miserum!"

"Here's the Irish priests all a-crying 'Woe!
For the land is desolate;'
But the English bishops they say 'Not so,
Pay no heed to their lying prate.'
Eheu! I can but twirl each thumb,
And helplessly sigh, Me miserum!

"I'll send two prelates over the sea,
And try what Ita'ian finesse
Will do, to make matters more smooth for me,
And help me out of this mess.
At present I can but twirl each thumb,
And sigh to myself, Me miserum!

"The nuncio with Norfolk's duke hobnobs
In honor of jubilee;
But, then, there's these Irish-eviction jobs
Demanding my sympathy—
How to keep both parties under my thumb
Is the bothering problem—Me miserum!

"So unfortunate! just when the swerving mind
Of English society
Is turning to Rome—in fact, going it blind
With fashionable piety—
Cries Ireland. 'Oh, father, why are you dumb
Over these, our wrongs?'—Me miserum!

"If I say to Ireland, 'Submit to wrong,'
Parnell will the Moses be,
Who from bondage will lead them forth e'er long,
But in that case, good-by to me—
They will say I just sat and twirled my thumb,
While poor Ireland wailed, 'Me miserum!'

"If I say to those who believe in me,
Who to faith and to church are true,
'Bon courage, Belle Erin! I bless you, be free!'
Then, England, good-by to you,
To the gold, to the lands, we had planned would come
To Mother Church, Me miserum!

"Eheu! I hav fallen on an evil day,
For the school-master is abroad,
And the demon of thought we no more can lay
In the name of the church or of God.
McGlynn I hav bounced—but he'll make things hum
In the States, I suppose—Me miserum!

"Now, which shall I keep, and which let go?
Poor Erin, or Albion rich?
Could I soft-sawder both, how blest! but, no—
There remains but the question—which?
I dare not think. Go, bid Gounod come;
Be music my solace—Me miserum!

—Toronto Grip.

The Destination of the Heathen and the Heterodox.

Judge Stephen Brewer in the Ithaca Daily Journal.

I quote (the italics being mine) from a book entitled "The Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," published by the Presbyterian board of publication; the same being now the standard of that church in matters of faith and doctrin. After having stated that certain classes of elect persons are saved, the confession goes on to say as follows: "Others not elected, although they may be called by the ministry of the word, and may hav some common operations of the spirit, yet never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved. Much less can men, not professing the Christian religion, be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature, and the law of that religion they do profess; and to assert and maintain that they may is very pernicious and to be detested."

That the italicized part of the foregoing refers to and intentionally includes the heathen is evident; for the heathen all hav "religions they do profess," and, furthermore, as is well known, adhere to with as much piety and devotion as do the devotees of Christianity to their religion. And yet the doctrin above quoted affirms that be they never so devotedly pious or religious in their own way, or conform they their lives never so circumspectly to that morality which the light of nature affords, it all goes for naught. They must accept a Christ and a gospel of which they hav never heard and never had an opportunity of hearing, or be forever lost; consigned they must be to that hell so graphically described by Jesus as the ever-burning lake of fire prepared for the devil and his angels.

Now, that is the doctrin held by the Presbyterian denomination, and, I think, by all of the Calvinistic denominations of this country and other countries as well. Think upon it for a moment, and consider its "true inwardness" carefully, and then say if you think a doctrin so bristling at all points with the invulnerable armor of defense against the caricaturist can be caricatured. So made up is it of the shocking, the unreasonable, the absurd, that there seems to be no stock left for the exaggerating imagination to work with. Evidently caricature is not possible. Just listen! You, my brother man, who by "accident of birth" was made a Buddhist instead of a Christian, be you as pure as a nun, as benevolent as a sister of charity, and punctiliously observant of all God's laws written in universal nature, and yet you are hopelessly and irrevocably doomed to an eternity of indescribable misery unless you accept a Christ and a gospel of which you never had and, in the nature of the case, never could hav had any knowledge! That is the language of "prevalent religious belief," and to assert and maintain to the contrary is, in the language of that same belief, "very pernicious and to be detested." Truly we may repeat, caricature is out of the question; the repulsiv features of the image are so ugly that they cannot be overdrawn.

Russian Religion.

From a Review of A. F. Heard's "Russian Church and Russian Dissent."

The Greek church had been pretty generally secularized in spirit when Peter the Great completed its degradation by abolishing the patriarchate, and committing the government of the church to a synod which was in reality only a bureau of the imperial administration. In his promulgation of this measure the czar declared, with curious frankness, that it seemed dangerous to the country to permit a spiritual ruler to share authority which belonged exclusivly to the autocrat, and to persuade the common people that the spiritual power is that of another and a better realm; in case of any difference between the patriarch and the czar, it might even happen that the people would take the part of the patriarch! Peter's principles once accepted, the present condition of the church followed naturally. The synod has lost what little show of power it once enjoyed, and now meets only to register, without debate, the regulations and decisions prepared by the imperial lay procurator, who is generally a military officer. The debasement of the clergy under such a system is inevitable. The monks, from whom the bishops and other dignitaries are selected, are better educated than the simple priests, but monasticism in Russia has always been a life of sloth and selfishness, quite indifferent to the works of charity, education, and preaching which hav occupied many of the orders in the Latin church. The character of the secular clergy is contemptible when it is not vile. The higher classes do not associate with them, and the peasantry quarrel with them over the price of prayers and sacraments, and hate them as a rapacious horde of government functionaries. Neither branch of the clergy seems to exercise any spiritual influence whatever.

The effect of the unfaithfulness of the church to its sacred mission has been to promote skepticism at one end of the social scale and fanaticism at the other. The upper classes imported unbelief along with other foreign fashions from western Europe, and with them Atheism is at least as common as Christianity. The national church in their eyes is only a branch of the police, and it offers nothing to satisfy the modern spirit of inquiry or to fit the new problems of life. Atheism, however, which is the child of intellectual pride, does not readily obtain a foothold among an ignorant peasantry. The tendency of ignorance is always toward excessiv credulity, and the Russian masses hav a childlike yearning for the mysterious and the supernatural. Hence while they hav little respect for the clergy as moral instructors, they are prone to attribute an almost magical efficacy to rites and ceremonies, and an immense importance to the mechanism of a worship in which the devotional impulse seems to hav little share. The church has a remarkable hold upon them, and yet the most sanguin would hardly reckon it as an influence in the government of life.

But there are millions of the common people for whose emotional demands a fossilized ceremonial religion, even with superstitious additions, makes no provision; and thus it happens that in spite of the conservatism of the lower classes dissenting sects of the most extravagant character prevail in Russia to an enormous extent. The conservativ instinct, in fact, almost always has a considerable influence upon their origin. The sectaries profess to be the "Old Believers," squaring their creed and conduct by the ancient standards, and they include the most reactionary and obstinately unprogressiv of the people; but as the widest license of individual opinion is applied to the determination of what the primtiv belief was, this conservatism does not in the least interfere with the development of monstrous novelties. The principal forms of dissent are known collectivly as the Raskol, or the Schism, and they embrace a great variety of heresies, some of which hav been maintained with more or less secrecy for two centuries. The number of the Raskolniks is not known, as many of them preserve an outward fidelity to the orthodox religion, and practice their real belief in private. Some authorities estimate them at fifteen millions, and Mr. Heard thinks that ten or eleven millions at any rate would not be too high a figure. Opposition to the national church and to all social reforms and foreign innovations has led them into a systematic opposition to the government. They are inclined to Socialism and Communism, and are probably the source or at least the main support of many revolutionary movements. They are loosely grouped in two great classes—the Popovtsi, or "priest-possessing," who hav a hierarchy of their own, largely recruited from the refuse of orthodoxy, and the Bezpopovtsi, or those without priests, who renounce sacerdotalism and all the recognized forms of Christian worship. The varieties of error and flagrant immorality included in this latter group are numberless, and by the usual process of subdivision they are constantly increasing. They reject marriage and domestic obligations; and while some regard the conjugal relation as a sin, and others look upon it as a respectable temporary arrangement, there are between these two extremes a multitude of inflamed fanatics who make of sensuality a religious emotion. They hold that by the apostasy of the national church all the sacraments, except baptism, which is administered by laymen, hav been forever closed; but their desires cannot be satisfied without some substitute for what has been taken away. Some eat the flesh from a living maiden's breast, and the "yawners" sit with open mouth all through their service, waiting for angels to bring them invisible chalices. The Child-killers slew new-born infants to save them from sin. The Stranglers dispatched their ailing friends and relativs, because "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence." The Burners preached redemption by suicide, and whole families threw themselvs into the flames of their burning houses.

Besides the Raskolniks proper, there are numbers of what Mr. Heard calls erratic sects, in which all the vagaries of imposture and credulity seem to be pushed to their last conclusions. It is a melancholy chapter in which our author recounts their creeds and practices, at once grotesque and horrible. They satisfy the craving for religious excitement with frantic exercises, ending in indescribable license. They play upon superstitious ignorance with frequent appearances of Christs and prophets and sibyls, to some of whom they pay divine honors. There is no law of morality to which they do not set themselvs in opposition, and no bulwark of the state to which they are not a danger. Shrouding themselvs in secrecy and professing as much orthodoxy as the police require of them, they honeycombed the national church before their operations were more than suspected; and it is only within our own day that the government has become aware of their alarming numbers. No measures, either of severity or mildness, hav had the least effect in checking them. They are said to be still increasing, and still exhibiting that tendency toward erotic abuses so common in fantastic religions.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Gems of Thought.

IT has been said by his opponents, with some show of plausibility, that Mill was at bottom a religious man. Setting aside special dogmas, and looking only to the cheering influence of religion on its most favorable side—an influence that may be exerted in a variety of ways—we may call his aspirations and hopes for a bright future to the race, a religion of humanity. To hold up an ideal that involves no contradictions to our knowledge to inspire and elate the mind oppressed by the dullness and the hardships of the present life, will be accepted by many as comfort of the spiritual kind, the real analog of religion. And something of this effect is undoubtedly produced by Mill's later writings. With all this, however, the fact remains that, in everything characteristic of the creed of Christendom, he was a thoroughgoing negationist. He admitted neither its truth nor its utility. His estimate of its best side is given in the remark to a friend under domestic sorrow: "To my mind the only permanent value of religion is in lightening the feeling of total separation which is so dreadful in a real grief."
—J. S. Mill, by Dr. A. Bain.

THE elegant pagan pope—Leo X.—cared little about the monk Luther and his doctrins; wished, however, to hav done with the noise of him; in space of some three years, having tried some softer methods, he thought good to end it by fire. Leo dooms the monk's writings to be burnt by the hangman, and his body to be sent bound to Rome—probably for a similar purpose. It was the way they had ended with Huss, with Jerome, the century before. A short argument, fire. Poor Huss! he came to that Constance council, with all imaginable promises and safe-conducts; an earnest, not rebellious kind of man: they laid him in a stone dungeon "three feet wide, six feet high, seven feet long;" burnt the true voice of him out of this world; choked it in smoke and fire. That was not well done.—Carlyle.

PERSONALLY, I care nothing about names. It makes no difference to me what the supposed great men of the past hav said, except as what they hav said contains an argument, and that argument is worth to me the force it naturally has upon my mind. Christians forget that, in the realm of reason, there are no serfs and no monarchs. When you submit to an argument, you do not submit to the man who brings the argument forward. Christianity demands a certain obedience, a certain blind, unreasoning faith, and parades before the eyes of the ignorant, with great pomp and pride, the names of kings, soldiers, and statesmen who hav admitted the truth of the Bible. . . . So far as I am concerned, I think more of reasons than of reputations, more of principles than of persons, more of nature than of names, more of facts than of faiths.—Ingersoll's Tilt With Talmage.

I TAKE possession of man's mind and deed;
I care not what the sects may brawl.
I sit as God, holding no form of creed,
But contemplating all.
—Tennyson's Palace of Art.

HAD the Christian religion done any good in the world, I would not hav exposed it, however fabulous I might hav believed it to be; but the delusiv idea of having a friend at court whom they call a redeemer, who pays all their scores, is an encouragement to wickedness.—Thomas Paine.

THEOLOGICAL hatred has exaggerated the private vices of Paine. It has made mountains out of mole-hills, where it would hav made mole-hills out of mountains, if he had been a defender of the faith. At the worst, Paine was not more intemperate than were many of his clerical contemporaries, who were not less esteemed for their almost miraculous gifts of imbibition. Then, too, had he been orthodox, something would hav been allowed to the terrible condition in which he found himself in France during the Reign of Terror—a prisoner deserted by the young republic at whose birth he had assisted so efficiently, his life in jeopardy for the humanity of his opinions.—J. W. Chadwick.

MATT. XX. 1-16.—No doubt the laborers who had borne the burden and heat of the day had no legal standing-point for their complaint; but the sentiment that prompted it was none the less a just one. Granting the validity of the master's plea that he had honorably fulfilled his bargain, it may be still urged that the bargain itself was not of an equitable character. Plainly, a sum which is adequate pay for an hour, is inadequate for ten or twelve hours; and that which is sufficient for a day is excessiv for an evening. The same argument applies to a future state. If, as is so often urged, it be a compensation for the sufferings of this state, then it ought to bear some proportion to those sufferings. But how can this be effected? Jesus saw the difficulty, and endeavored, but not successfully, to meet it by this parable.—Amberley.

SOME ladies are ready to plume themselvs upon not having been guilty of certain great crimes. Some thieves, I daresay, console themselvs with the reflection that they hav never committed murder.—Geo. Macdonald.

REBEKAH PERSUADETH JACOB TO SWINDLE ESAU.—Gen. xxvii, 6-17.

Odds and Ends.

A TOURIST without money is a tramp. A tramp who has money is a tourist.

A HARLEM girl who has read the Bible through eight times, surprised her mother the other morning by getting down to breakfast in time.

WIFE: "Dear, I wish you would invite young Professor Y. some day. I hear he is dreadfully absent-minded; perhaps he may take our Cecilia."

IT takes three weeks to perform a marriage ceremony among the upper classes in Japan, and it is generally conceded that the clergyman earns his fee.

TEACHER: "Where do the Arabs liv?" Boy: "In the desert." Teacher: "What do they call those pious men who flee to the desert?" Boy: "Deserters."

A DAKOTA man, while on his way to borrow a neighbor's paper, was struck by lightning and killed. We hav no comment to make here. To intelligent people it isn't necessary.

MY four-year-old boy remarked confidentially to the cook the other day that he "would hate to be a chicken." "Why, Rob?" "'Cause I would hav to lay eggs, and I don't know how," was the response.

HARLEM teacher to a boy in a grammar class: "John, correct the following sentence: It are very cold." John, as he wipes the perspiration from his forehead with his shirt-sleeve: "It are thundering hot."

SHE said it was a very bright idea. He said he knew a brighter one; and when she asked him what it was, he answered: "Your eye, dear." There was silence for a moment; then she laid her head upon the rim of his ear and wept.

CALLER (to old Mrs. Bentley): "The new minister is making himself quite popular, is he not, Mrs. Bentley?" Old Mrs. Bentley: "Well, I ain't much sot by him. Fer the last three Sundays he's prayed fer rain, an' there ain't a drop fell yit!"

"THE hairs of your head
Are all numbered," he said
To his nephew, just turned of eleven.
"If all were like you,"
Said the kid, "mighty few Bookkeepers they'd need up in heaven!"

A FAIR WARNING.

"The racing association will giv you one hundred dollars an acre, deacon, for the lot!" "To build a race-track on? No, sir. I don't believe in horse-racing; it's sinful!" "Say, one hundred and fifty!" "Well, I'll take a hundred and fifty; but if they build a race-track it will be against my earnest protest!"

JUSTICE (to prosecuting witness): "Now, state your case as briefly as you can." Prosecuting witness: "I will, your honor. I'm a stationer, and this morning this man came into my house and said: 'Hav you any black ink?' 'Yes,' I replied. 'Jet black?' 'Yes.' 'Will it turn black after awhile, or will it write black at once?' 'Writes black at once.' 'Jet black?' 'Yes.' 'You are a liar,' and with that, your honor, he turned to walk out, and when I put my hand on him gently, intending to ask for an explanation of his curious conduct, he wheeled around and knocked me down." Justice: "This is a rather interesting case. You are a stationer, eh?" Prosecuting witness: "Yes, sir." "And hav you really got any black ink?" "Yes, sir." "Black as soon as you write with it?" "Yes, sir." Justice (after a moment's reflection): "You are a liar. The prisoner is discharged."

HER COOL "NO."

In her muslins light and airy,
Oh, my pet seems always cool;
Even where the sun is glary
No exceptions grace the rule.

Yet I loiter moist and wilted—
Faintly gasping for more air,
Wishing I was Highland kilted—
Or could wander still more bare.

Yes, she's ever quite unruffled,
Ever calm and ever cool,
While I roam in hot air muffled,
Longing for some frigid pool.

Thus it was in desperation
On one fearful, torrid day,
That I turned the conversation
To the theme that dearest lay;

Gasped "Wilt hav me?"—expeditious,
Hotter 'twas than cooking-school—
And I found her "No" delicious—
'Twas so very, very cool.

SOME five or six years ago, when Watertown, Dak., was a new place, the business men raised $500 with which to build a church. A meeting was called to talk over the plans. "You've got the $500, hav you?" said Judge S. J. Conklin, who was at that time mayor of the city. "Got it right here," replied the chairman of the soliciting committee. "It strikes me," continued the mayor, "that it is a good deal of money to put into a church." "Yes, that's so," said another prominent citizen. "I suppose we can do what we please with it?" "That's it exactly," returned Conklin, "and my idea is to put it into something of more permanent value to the city than a church." "That's my opinion, too," said another leading citizen; "how would a school-house do?" "School-house nothing!" said the mayor; "what we want to put that money into is something that will stand as a monument to the liberality and public spirit of the citizens of Watertown, and something, also, which will be useful and of lasting benefit to the place. I move that that $500 be used to lay out a four-mile race track, that shall be the finest west of the Mississippi! If we're boomers, let us boom!" They finally compromised on a mile track, and offered what money was left as purses for the Fourth of July races.

Notes and Clippings.

To suppress the lawless feuds and strife that hav been continually agitating Kentucky, the militia at Morehead hav seized and confiscated the arms of all the desperadoes they could find.

THE Paris municipal council some time ago ordered all religious sentiments and expressions to be removed from the books used in the public schools. The board of education, however, did the work but partially, and a vote of censure upon the board has just been passed by the council.

NINETY-FOUR Paris policemen recently handed to their superior officers silver watches, which each of them had found at his home. These watches bore, in place of the number, the words: "Souvenir of Gen. Boulanger, July 7, 1887," engraved on the case. An inquiry has been instituted as to the origin of these gratuitous gifts to the police. It is taken for granted that Gen. Boulanger had nothing to do with the matter.

PROF. F. BORSARI sends to the National Reformer the account as published in the Roman journals of a deputation from the committee for the erection of the monument to Giordano Bruno, which was received by Signor Crispi, then minister of the interior, and now, in consequence of the death of Signor Depretis, probably prime minister. The deputation asked the support of the government for the obtaining from the Roman municipality the concession of a site for the erection of the Bruno monument. Signor Crispi stated that he had already conferred on the subject with Duke Torlorna, the syndic of Rome supporting the application, and that he believed the municipal council would grant the required site.

CITIZEN TRAIN has been celebrating himself in verse. From his bench of philosophy in Madison Square he sends out the following:

Who ever saw me cough or sneeze?
Hack? Spit? Limp? (show signs of Disease?)
(Or go to church? Pray on my knees?)

With Flag of Health to breeze unfurled
Rainbows around my Life are curled,
The happiest fellow in world.

THEY hav had the jubilee fever very strong in New Zealand. The Herald of that colony contains abundant evidence of the fact. Here is one advertisment: "Wanted—Two jubilee ladies want two jubilee husbands. Apply 25 Queen street." Here is another: "Wanted—Jubilee wives, husbands, housemaids, waitresses, housekeepers, barmaids, and general servants can be had for the asking. A. McLeod, 25 Queen street."

JANESVILLE, Wis., is excited over the elopement of the Rev. D. Seymore, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, and Mrs. Fanny J. Henry, wife of J. A. Henry, editor of the Argus. Both parties are prominent in society and religious matters. Seymore was considered the ablest Methodist preacher ever in Janesville. Mrs. Henry has for years been the organist and a leading member of the church. No one seems to hav been aware that there was undue intimacy between the two parties, but the elopement was premeditated, planned, and arranged by clandestin meetings. Mrs. Henry has heretofore borne an estimable reputation. Besides her husband, she leaves two children, a boy of seven and a girl of four. Seymore leaves a wife and five children entirely destitute. He left with about $250, $130 of which was the proceeds of the sale of a buggy and horse, and the balance was church funds. It is the preacher's third offense, his first victim being a fourteen-year-old girl. His piety has been remarkable for its sincerity. He is a scamp made worse by the grace of God.

AT the meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Holiness held in Pitman Grove, Pa., the other day, Dr. William McDonald said: "I tell you that no one who uses tobacco can be entirely sanctified." "Say! say!" shouted several clergymen, 'that's going a little too far, for some of our best ministers use the article." "What I hav said I hav said," replied Dr. McDonald. "No man can be entirely saved and use tobacco." "You're a liar!" angrily shouted a well-known man in the audience. The man, who is said to be an influential Christian, immediately left the auditorium.

SAYS the Galveston News: "It is a question if another man upon earth possesses the same peculiar oratorical and literary power as Ingersoll. He sways the largest audiences by his wit, eloquence, and pathos as the wind sways the boughs of a tree. His thrusts are sharp and direct, and though turned against what he believes to be a popular fallacy, are never profane or vulgar. He is diplomatic, observant, and generous, and though most bitter in his denunciations of superstition, was never known to refuse to listen to reason or argument from those who held different views from himself. In some respects he is a wonderful man, and like Rienzi or Cicero, has but to move his lips and audiences stand ready to listen.'

CHICAGO has got a new sort of missionary. The Herald of that city describes him and his work: "A tall, gaunt, cadaverous man, wearing a full beard, a time-worn frock-coat, and a shirt front that ought to hav been sent to the laundry before the hot weather set in, stood at the corner of Madison and Clark streets last evening with a bundle of good-sized hand-bills under his arm. 'My friend,' he said to a pale-faced, middle-aged citizen, who wore his hair a trifle long for July, 'you look like a man who has helped many a good cause——' 'Possibly, sir.' 'I hav some figures that utterly expose the Anarchists, Spiritualists, and Atheists—prove the divinity of Christ—you've got to believe it,' and then he poured forth a jumble of words from his printed document. 'I've already distributed free of charge fifteen hundred of these, and would to God I could giv away these—they're all I hav left. Anything you choose to giv——' 'Intemperance is the greatest curse we hav,' interrupted the middle-aged man as he got to the windward of the whisky-scented breath. 'Exactly, sir,' was the tract-pedler's candid reply; 'if a man wants to look like the devil, act like the devil, and be a devil, let him fool with alcohol—even lager-beer.' Abruptly changing the subject, he continued· 'Yes, the Bible's all right, but these figures are my own; they make it clear, plain. Atheists won't accept the Bible; they've got to take my figures. If you care to help the cause along, even five cents will be——' 'Oh, you can't get Chicago whisky for a nickel,' and before the 'figgers' man could finish his appeal, the saucy, long-haired man was around the corner and lost in the crowd.'

Mr. George, Father Huntingdon, and Dr. McGlynn.

I am a subscriber to Mr. George's paper called the Standard. I hav read, with deep interest, every number from the first. I believe most sincerely in his doctrin concerning the land, that it belongs to the human family in common, like the atmosphere and the sunlight; and that the cheapest, fairest, and shortest way of raising taxes for the support of the government is by levying them upon land values alone. As the whole includes, and is composed of, all its parts, I believe this land reform movement includes all others of the kind; and that, when it succeeds, it will bring in, consequently, a tide of blessings that will astonish mankind, and prove that, when time and circumstances hav prepared the way for the birth into the world of a great truth, it does not come singly and alone, but is accompanied by other truths which are allied with, and subordinate to, it. I mean that the farmers, who are numerous enough, perhaps, without the aid of the mechanical classes, to achieve the success of this movement, are so ignorant of Mr. George's theory that they regard him as their enemy instead of their friend. The newspapers they read are generally published in the interest of monopoly, and especially, that mean and thievish form of it called a protectiv tariff; and from reading such one-sided papers, they hav the idea that the land reformer aims to saddle all the taxes upon them, and let the millionaires and bond-holders go free. It will require a long time to pry open the eyes of the farmers so that they can see their own interests; for, as a class, they are the pagani of the country, the most ignorant and narrow-minded of its population, and the most easily imposed upon.

In the Standard of July 23d was published Father Huntingdon's Sunday evening speech, at the Anti-Poverty Society meeting, followed by a short one from Mr. George. These gentlemen, with Dr. McGlynn, wish to make the land reform a religious movement. They hav adopted as the war-cry the phrase, "The fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man." This sounds well. The latter half of it I believe in with all my heart. But the first part of the motto, is it true? If God be a father, and regards with equal eye all the children of his family, as an earthly parent does, how comes it to pass that the larger part of them are in such suffering circumstances, treated as disinherited bastards, instead of legitimate children and heirs? If he is infinit in power and benevolence, and as such undertakes to control and manage the world he created, why does he not abolish the causes which hav laid waste, for so many ages, the happiness of his children? and why did he not prevent the existence of these causes in the first instance, when, being omniscient, he must hav foreseen how pregnant they were with curses to his children? Mr. George, Father Huntingdon, and Dr. McGlynn are only men, but they are so benevolent in their nature, and know so well how to adopt means to ends, that, if they had half the power which God has, over human volitions, and material things, they would not require two thousand years—the time that God, by the gospel, has been trying to do it—to drive the deadly evils of oppression, poverty, and wretchedness of man and brute, out of the world. Nay, these gentlemen, if they had set to work at the beginning to make a world out of nothing, would hav so arranged the conditions that sin, and misery its consequence, would hav no place in it. God is not a father if he hav a hell of eternal fire in which to consume the happiness of the larger part of his family. Even if we accept nature as the synonym for God, she is cruel. True, she givs us sunlight and rains, and the order of the seasons for the earth to grow and mature her food for man and beast. But she starves to death multitudes of her children by drouth and famin, ravages whole nations by fatal diseases, engulfs thousands in one moment by earthquakes and cyclones, and has ordained that the strong shall prey upon the weak, in the air, on the earth, and in the sea.

Father Huntingdon, whose speeech I hav read over and over again, on account of its beautiful and forcible simplicity, has contemplated the woes of New York society, growing out of poverty and oppression, till his heart aches; and he has brought himself to believe and teach, that "the free will of man, defeating the purposes of God," is to blame for it all. Secretly, and logically, a man of his ability must see and feel, that, if God is all-powerful, and all-merciful, and does nothing to put out of existence the evils that hav converted the earth into a hell, he is responsible for the present state of things. But as it would be blank Infidelity, if not blasphemy, to say so openly, he relieves God of this mountainous load of responsibility, and puts it on the free will of man! Let the young father speak for himself: "There is plenty of land, there is plenty of power to labor. Put the two together, and the result will be what God intended. But that result can be hindered in one of two ways. God has made us beings with free will and power of choice, to settle in some measure our own destinies in this world. If we choose to defeat his purpose, and thwart his goodness, we can do so, and reap the harvest we hav sown; if we choose to do his will, we can be free, and strong, and holy." Now, what an imbecil kind of a God he has pictured! With all the resources of the universe at his command; with infinit pity and benevolence in his heart to prompt the exercising of his infinit power, he stands aloof, and sees his own children by the million, age after age, ground to fine powder between the upper and nether mill stones of human avarice and ambition, and never lifts a finger to put a stop to it! He would like to interpose; it is his purpose to do so, but the free will of man is stronger than he, and will not let him! Father Huntingdon is so careful of the character of God, that, to protect him against the obvious charge which the minds of intelligent beings would bring against him, of allowing sin and misery to run riot through the world when he could abolish it, he takes the ground that the free will of man, a worm of the dust, is able to, and actually does, override and defeat the benevolent purposes of Almighty God! Into such depths of folly does Father Huntingdon's theology plunge him.

Mr. George ought to quit attempting to make land reform a religious movement. Let him make it a moral movement. The antislavery men, fifty years ago, thought, when they began, that they could make the abolition of slavery a religious movement. But the church, appealing to the Bible, Old Testament and New, silenced them in argument. The brotherhood of man, which was their motto, based upon the salvability of all men, Jew and gentile, bond and free, male and female, was, inferentially a New Testament doctrin. But it was taught and understood, at least in theory, long before Christianity appeared in the world. In the antislavery controversy, however, the positiv teachings of Moses and Paul crushed out of sight the moral philosophy of the gospel, and almost the entire Christian church, Catholic and Protestant, were in favor of slavery, taught that it was a divine institution, and pronounced the Abolitionists to be Infidels. The Abolitionists, therefore, went forth among their countrymen demanding the immediate emancipation of the slaves as a requirement of natural and eternal justice, and as the only policy which could save the republic from ruin. It took thirty years of effort on the stump, on the rostrum, and in the press to educate the people and enlighten their conscience, and bring them to understand and feel that either slavery or the republic must be destroyed. During all these years not only the slave-holders but the religion of the Bible, and of the entire church, were dead against them. But such was the potency of truth, and so strong the sentiment of justice in the human heart when the conscience was enlightened, that the people backed up President Lincoln when, in 1863, he issued his proclamation of freedom to the slaves, and made sure the permanency of the Union.

"Our heavenly father," in the laws he dictated to his chosen people, laid down some wholesome principles and regulations concerning the land, which Mr. George is wisely taking advantage of in his great contention. But I must remind Mr. George that it was the same heavenly father who allowed one branch of his family, the Jews, to make merchandise of the other branch, called "the heathen round about." It was he who not only authorized, but enjoined, the Hebrews to rob the Canaanites of their land, and put them to death for resisting. He it was also who ordered the Israelites that "anything that dieth of itself should be given to the stranger that is within thy gates, that he may eat of it; or, thou mayest sell it unto an alien." Wherever, therefore, the land reformers, seemingly to curry favor with the church, use the phrase, "The fatherhood of God," they at once call to mind such facts as I hav mentioned, and dampen the zeal of many intelligent persons who would like to coöperate with them in their laudable work. "The brotherhood of man" is a rallying cry that covers the whole case, and rouses the enthusiasm of humanity. The prefix, "Fatherhood of God," immediately injects doubt and confusion into the mind, and hinders hearty coöperation.

Dr. McGlynn, at a late Anti-Poverty meeting, bitterly denounced the Italian pope and propaganda as a mere machine, governed by a lust for money and power; and said that it was the knowledge of this fact that had ruined many Catholic countries, and plunged them into Infidelity and Atheism. This language seems to imply that communities, when they see the wickedness and hypocrisy of the church, are so disgusted with it, that they rush into Infidelity, as a herd of panic-stricken buffaloes rush over a precipice into destruction. There is a good deal of this kind of apologetic tone among reformers of various kinds toward the class called Infidels, when they see how utterly heartless and indifferent the church as a body now is, always has been, and, I may say, always will be, concerning those who begin any work of radical moral reform. They seem to think that the Secularists would all be good Christians if the church would lead in all practical efforts for the welfare of mankind during their stay in this world. But this is a mistake. The corruptions of the church may, and often do, set men to thinking. But what we call Infidelity is the result, or verdict, which the human intellect arrives at after the evidence for religion, pro and con, has been argued in the Supreme Court of the Human Understanding, where reason alone is the judge. In this court the human heart has nothing to do with the questions discussed and decided, because the heart cannot reason, but only feel. The Infidel, therefore, rejects Christianity, and the church which claims to be its embodiment, for the same reason that he rejects Mohammedanism and Mormonism, because its claims to be a supernatural religion are all consumed in the crucible of investigation. If the church, instead of turning its cold shoulder, as it does, to "the cross of the New Crusade," would fall in with that great movement, and giv it speedy success, the argument of the Infidel against the church and her religion would not be invalidated in the least. The key-stone of the arch which supports the claims of the church to be a divine, soul-saving machine, is the doctrin of the Fall of Man in the Garden of Eden, making necessary the whole scheme of salvation, whereby the race, or a small part of it, can be restored to its original condition and character. But modern science has knocked this key-stone out, and logically, the whole superstructure tumbles into ruin; and that we may not be discouraged in our efforts to improve, we are consoled with the well-grounded hope that, whereas the law of progress has gradually brought the race to its present stage of improvement, the same law will continue in force during the illimitable future.

The Gospel Racket.

Go preach the gospel to every creature.

"There is luck in odd numbers," but the above command, composed of seven words, has been fraught with more mischief to human kind than most people are willing to allow.

The minds of men hav been so much occupied with this command that they hav lost sight of nearly every earthly good. And thousands hav been murdered and cruelly tortured and persecuted because it has been thought that they stood in the way of the spread of the gospel.

I suppose the word "creature" in the above command was designed to mean human "creature."

It is evident that the one who gave the command had no just conception of the number of human "creatures" in existence when the command was given. It is further evident that the command did not come from an all-wise God, for the good reason that an all-wise God would not command a thing to be done which it was impossible to do. The idea of a dozen men starting out on foot to "preach the gospel to every creature" is preposterous.

In that generation there must hav been millions of "creatures" scattered over the face of the earth which the twelve could not reach. And millions hav died every generation since who never heard a blast from the gospel trumpet. And probably the time will never come when the gospel will be preached to every "creature."

The command to "preach the gospel to every creature" shows the ignorance of those who gave the command, whether they were Gods or men. I say Gods because there is a ghost God, and a son God, and an old father God, which make three. Now, if these three Gods, by some gospel sleight-of-hand hav been metamorphosed into one God, it is the business of the Christian and not mine.

If the salvation of men was made to depend upon being reached by the gospel-bangers, the Gods must hav known that they were bringing millions into existence every generation only to be damned.

If salvation does not depend upon preaching the gospel, then the Gods or men who gave the command made fools of themselvs, and those who are contributing millions each year to send the gospel to the heathens are bigger fools still.

What the number of inhabitants was nineteen hundred years ago I hav no means of knowing. A great part of the earth's surface had not been explored at that time, and there could hav been no definit idea of the number of "creatures" to be preached to. Even to-day, with all the appliances of steam and electricity, and with the help of the printing-press, millions die each generation who never heard of the gospel. If the command came from an infallible God, then he, like all the infallible popes, has made some egregious blunders. Probably the time never will come when the gospel will be "preached to every creature."

For nearly two thousand years the Christian has been engaged in a vain attempt to benefit the world and the inhabitants thereof by plowing in the skies; and he is constantly trying to persuade the people that some time in the dim future he will make it a success.

Two thousand years can scarcely be considered time enough for the Christian to get a fair start. But if the Infidels and scientists will only stand back and giv him a fair chance, in eight or ten thousand years he will be able to show some grand results.

But suppose the time should come when the gospel should be preached to every creature, the question is whether it would prove a blessing to the world. Has the Christian religion rendered the rich less grasping, bettered the condition of the poor, made the people more intelligent or more honest?

In the first place, if preaching of the gospel is calculated to elevate the human race, those who preach it of all men ought to be the most honest, intelligent, and humane. What are the facts? They hav a greater number of representativs in the prisons in this country in proportion to their numbers than any other class of people.

What is more, there is no class of people in this country whose crimes are more kept out of sight, and who are punished less according to the crimes they commit, than those who are commissioned to "preach the gospel to every creature."

In the second place, this is allowed to be one of the most thoroughly Christianized countries in the world, and ought to be taken as a fair test of the humanizing influence of Christianity.

One of the most important commands of this gospel, which is to be preached to every creature, is that the rich must sell what they hav and giv to the poor. And it is made as impossible for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven as it is for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle.

Yet, in this country, one-half of the entire wealth of the country is in the hands of two and a half per cent of the people. Millionaires occupy nearly every seat in the senate, and twenty to seventy-five thousand dollars are current prices for seats in the lower house. Indeed, seats in Congress might about as well be put up at auction and sold to the highest bidder, without the least regard to the eternal fitness of things.

In all the great churches are capitalists whose fortunes hav been built up by the unpaid toil and sweat of the poor. "One thing thou lackest: sell what thou hast and giv to the poor."

Tracts of land, containing thousands of acres, are bought by Christian speculators, and held to the exclusion of the homeless. When these lands are rendered valuable, not by anything which the owner has done, but by the labor of those who settle around them, they will be put into market and sold for quadruple what they cost. Verily, "The son of man hath not where to lay his head."

Even churches in their corporate capacity possess millions of wealth, and hold thousands of acres of the most valuable lands in the country. All going to show to show that the teaching of those whose business it is to preach the gospel to every creature has no more to do with their own acts than the outside garments they wear.

Christian speculators frequently buy up the provisions of the country and hold them until starvation forces the people to buy them at any price they may ask. Thus thousands of children are sent to bed supperless because a Christian hog wants to make money. Will not all the "ends of the earth" be blest when this glorious gospel is "preached to every creature?" "Blow ye the trumpet; blow the gladly solemn sound."

Hear this sad story from the Hartford Examiner: "In the severity of winter young girls hav tramped from place to place in search of work; hav begged shelter and food; slept in outhouses and barns, and are to-day the victims of hunger and exposure. Wholly defenseless, they are thrown into temptation and the lowest kind of vagrancy. The males tramp farther inland, and become desperate and vicious, while the old people and infants remain in the villages starving by inches. Common necessities of life are unknown to hundreds of fathers and mothers and children." Could a worse picture be truthfully drawn of any heathen land—even of any savage tribe?

The biting sarcasm of the above extract on the Christian religion can only be realized when it is considered that the Christian pretends that "peace on earth and good will to men" follow in the wake of the gospel.

We hav some of the richest churches in the world, and Christian millionaires by the score. Hundreds of ministers are receiving princely salaries; there is an abundance in the country; graineries overflowing and storehouses literally bursting with stores of provisions. The poor do not suffer on account of a scarcity of anything in the country. Do these suffering ones fare any better because the gospel is preached to them? Do those who are commissioned to "preach the gospel to every creature" propose any remedy? They never cease boasting of the elevating and humanizing influence of the Christian religion, and yet they hav the effrontery to tell these suffering ones that it is all for the best; that they are in the hands of a just and merciful God; that "he doeth all things well;" that they must be patient and suffer on; that "seeming afflictions are unseen mercies;" that their suffering here will be rewarded with bright crowns hereafter.

To attribute their suffering to a banana or some other kind of fruit that a woman ate six thousand years ago is to insult the common sense of the age. Yes, while starving girls are sleeping in barns and alleys, Christian shylocks are drawing from two to four per cent per month; but it is all for the best—God is directing the affairs of men. I take another quotation from a Western newspaper to show how the love of justice follows the preaching of the gospel: "The busy world consists of employer and employee, and all that is produced in the present constitution of society belongs to the employer, and nothing to the employee. With his daily wages he must purchase of the former all that he needs. When there is an over-production the workmen are forced to idleness. Wages cease, and they no longer hav the power to purchase for the most part what they hav produced. Starvation and want, or the meager resources of charity await them. It is not so with the owners of the excessiv products of industry. If they cannot sell, they can, at least, exchange among themselvs and be happy."

This statement shows that, notwithstanding the preaching of the gospel, systematized robbing is the rule in this country. Yet the rich Christian can be happy, while those who hav produced his wealth by their labor are starving. Everything for the wealthy, nothing for the producers of wealth, and yet they pretend to follow the example of Christ and his apostles, who held "all things in common."

Millions for foreign missions, but no plan for the starving mothers and children at home. While the storehouses in Chicago were full of grain, and thousands of cattle and hogs were being butchered every day, thirty-five thousand men, women, and children in that city were in a starving condition.

Chicago has some Christian millionaires, many gorgeous churches, rich Christian merchants, a lot of boodlers, and much squalid poverty. What is true of Chicago holds true in every Christian city in the country.

"Go preach the gospel to every creature." Has not the gospel been sufficiently preached in this country? Yet in Christian cities where church spires bristle like spines on a thistle, women hav made overalls at sixty cents per dozen, and passed the whole winter without fire. Men who hav been under the influence of gospel teaching from early childhood turn mothers with helpless children into the street when they hav no place to go because they are unable to pay their rent.

In parts of any Christian city, if a man were unattended, he would be murdered if it were known that he had a hundred dollars in his pocket. Pious Christians get away with thousands of the people's money, sometimes made up from the scanty savings of poor widows and sewing girls. Yet they occupy front seats in fashionable churches, while a poor, starving girl is sent to the lock-up for stealing a loaf of bread. "Blow the gospel trumpet."

If there are any grand results from this gospel preaching, they certainly ought to be manifested in the churches? But what are the facts? Are they not clannish? Is not individualism nearly wiped out? Is there one who dare take a bold and independent course, regardless of the old bell-wether of the flock? Has the preaching of the gospel developed pioneer investigation? Are not Christians always giving battle to the scientists, who hav proved themselvs to be the best friends of man?

"Beware of science when it contradicts the Bible." So says a popular Christian paper. There you hav it—science gaged by the Bible. This has been the position of the church for hundreds of years. She stands like a dried mummy with an old book in her hands, and claims that it is of more importance to the world than all the discoveries of science. To the church the ignorance and brutality of two or three thousand years ago is of more importance to the world than the intelligence, civilization, and scientific attainments of the nineteenth century. Without opposition, the church would soon force us back to the science and philosophy of the book of Genesis.

The church turns out her quotum of criminals, and more than her proportion of lunatics; and the world's best thinkers are certainly not found in the churches. If the people in the churches are not as parsimonious as those outside, then the churches hav been belied by all history.

If the good result of gospel preaching is neither to be found among preachers nor in the churches, would it seem like sound policy to giv a great deal of money to send these preachers far away from home to enlighten those who are more moral and honest than themselvs?

Salvation armies, Christian revivals, dance-halls, theological seminaries, ministerial conventions, horse-races, bribers and boodlers, Sabbath-schools and cock-fights, Christian associations and prize-fights, missionaries and gamblers, swill-shops and churches, Christian executions, murders, suicides, seductions, infanticide, elopements, divorces, shootings, and stabbings are the order of the day, and strangely mixed in this highly Christianized country.

"Go preach the gospel to every creature." "Blow the gospel trumpet." Let the Christian find "no rest for the sole of his foot" until these blessings are carried "to the ends of the earth." Selah.

Yes, "Blow the gospel trumpet." Go to all the islands of the sea, and among all the native tribes, and as fast as converts are made send them on to Boonton. Let the two Sams rejoice and Comstock be glorified. Let every scientist and philosopher review his work and make it square with Genesis. Blow the gospel trumpet around Snowville. Aunt Elmina must be reconstructed. She has been letting her light shine in the dark corners without permission from the trumpet-blowers. She must be cast into hell (a prison hell) because she does not join in the gospel racket.

If the trumpet-blowers succeed in getting her into prison, there will be cannonading in heaven all day and a great display of fireworks at night.

It will serve her just right. She must learn to pay less attention to human suffering and more attention to the trumpet-blowers. Let her go to jail. Let Anthony hav a day of rejoicing, and the trumpet-blowers hav a day of jubilee. The trumpet-blowers appreciate her motivs about as much as the people of Thurso did the labors of Robert Dick, the Scotch geologist.

Some of them found him, with hammer and chisels, engaged on a rock literally made up of fossils. "What are ye doin' there, mon?" they inquired. "I am inspecting an ancient graveyard," said Dick. "Hoot, mon, there's nobody burriet there," said they. The people of Thurso said Dick was crazy, and, worse than all, was not "soond on the Bible."

When the core of the whole matter is reached, it will be found that Elmina is not "soond on the Bible," and the trumpet-blowers are wroth. A snatch from the "Song of the Geologist," written by Dick, comes in here with a good deal of force:

> Hoorah for the hammers sae braw!
> The lower we go the more we shall know
> Of ancient an' present an' a'.
> Here's freedom to dig and to learn,
> Here's freedom to think and to speak;
> But none ever sought to strangle a thought
> But creatures baith vulgar an' weak.

Go preach the gospel to every creature. Blow the gospel trumpet, until every word uttered by a Liberal is "disgusting," and everything written on sex and sex relations is "obscene." Then Judge Benedict, and Colgate, and Mad Anthony

> Will bathe their weary souls
> In seas of heavenly rest,
> And not a wave of trouble roll
> Across their peaceful breasts, and Boonton will become the Mecca of this Christian country.

> How long, dear savior, oh, how long
> Shall this bright hour delay?
> Fly swift around, ye wheels of time,
> And bring the welcome day!

Blow the gospel trumpet. Hurry up the cakes—let Colgate soap the track. Keep Talmage and Sam Jones and the Salvation Army constantly in the gospel harness until the will of God shall be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Let Anthony swing his smut-bag in the name of the Lord, and soon will be ushered in an age of purity and godliness equaled only by that of the Dark Ages. One author recounts the number of thousands of women in Europe made dissolute by the priesthood. But that was done by God's regularly constituted agents, and, of course, could neither be "disgusting" nor "obscure," and did not affect Christian morals like the writings of Aunt Elmina. Let Boonton begin to buy crape early, for she may be called to divide honors with Snowville, and then not only crape but sackcloth and ashes will be brought in requisition.

Blow the gospel trumpet until such heathens as Elmina, and Socrates, and Solon, and Plato, and Cicero are brought up to the Christian level of Talmage, and Sam Jones, and Benedict, and Comstock.

In some parts of the Eastern world known as heathen, it is customary for dealers to place their commodities in the public places and leave them. The purchaser takes what he wants and leaves the money according to the price marked upon the article. Preach the gospel until such heathens are brought to "know the Lord from the least to the greatest," and through the grace of our lord and savior, Jesus Christ, are taught to know and practice Christian honesty.

It is related that a Christian merchant took a cargo of goods to an Eastern market, and after the goods were unloaded, the men who had been engaged began to retire. "Are not those goods to be taken in?" inquired the merchant. He was told that there was no danger from rain, and the goods would get no damage. "But may they not be stolen?" asked the merchant. "Not the least danger in the world," said they, "there is not a Christian within a hundred miles of here." But heathen honesty will never satisfy Christians; they want the real, "true-blue," blood-bought Boonton kind.

Blow the gospel trumpet. This year the Methodists are to raise a million dollars to send missionaries to these people to teach them Christian civilization and Christian honesty.

No matter about monstrous births, idiots, and lunatics; no matter about cripples and deformities; no matter about hereditary taints and diseases. Elmina must learn that this kind of education is not in fashion with Christians, that Christ and him crucified is all that is necessary to constitute a Christian education.

Keep up the gospel racket until good hard sense becomes as rare as white crows, and the church and Mrs. Grundy rule the world. Blow the gospel trumpet. JOHN PECK.

News and Notes.

Friday evening, July 29th, I strike Snohomish, a lively place in an out-of-the-way corner of the world, up the Snohomish river about twelve miles, and in the midst of the mighty forests that it will take one hundred years to demolish, and in the mean time supply all the markets of the country. The land is exceedingly fertil when cleared, and forty acres are about as good for production as double that quantity elsewhere—but it takes from fifty to seventy-five dollars an acre to prepare for cultivation.

I gave five lectures in Snohomish, one on Saturday evening, three on Sunday, and one on Monday evening; and organized a Secular Union with over fifty names—and the prospects are that this will be one of the most flourishing Liberal organizations in the territory. The representativ business men of the city are Liberals, and not afraid to express their views, and take an open stand in favor of Freethought. The ministers hav a pretty hard time of it here. There are two churches, and the average audience is seven for Sunday—one for each day in the week. I had full houses every evening, although the "Drummer Boy of the Rappahannock" was in town with his silver drum, and the Free Methodists had pitched their tent and were singing and praying with volcanic fervor; but the stream of Freethought pursued the even tenor of its way and made hope and cheer amid the pleasant sunlight. I enjoyed myself in this far corner of the world, where the immense solitudes stretch for hundreds of miles away, and the snowy peaks are seen, and Mount Ranier through the rugged valley presents itself, a resplendent picture, at the top of the spacious scene.

Snohomish has had quite a remarkable history in the development of advance thought. Years ago, Dr. Folsom, a graduate of Harvard College, and a man of rare scientific attainments, located here, and, assisted by Eldridge Morse and others, started the Free Religious Association and Atheneum of Snohomish, and for several years this was the main institution of the place, and had a museum building, and property to the amount of several thousand dollars, and there was promis of a Liberal university amid these Western wilds nearly a quarter of a century ago. But the ups and downs of territorial life and business reverses destroyed the fair prospect, and the property changed hands and the original purpose was abandoned. Still, the fruit of this bold pioneer effort is noted in the Radical spirit that pervades this remote frontier town.

Eldridge Morse is one of the quaint geniuses of this part of the country. He was one of the leading spirits in the early Freethought movement, and started the Northern Star, which was for many years the most popular newspaper on Puget sound, and had a large circulation. It was an outspoken advocate of Liberalism, and published articles from the foremost writers of the day on scientific and religious topics. But the Northern Star, I expect, was too good to last long, and so it disappeared, for Morse, like all Westerners, had magnificent plans and a lot of them, and one day there came a crash. But Morse is irrepressible. He immediately went to "tramping," and he has gone over every foot of western Washington—up and down every river, over every mountain, and through every forest. The Indians hav come to look upon him as one of their old-time divinities reincarnated, and so they treat him as they would a wandering god. He has gathered together a mass of ancient Indian legends which are of absorbing interest. He is one of the most brilliant contributors to Bancroft's "History of the Pacific States," and has written a most valuable essay on the tide marshes of Puget sound for the Agricultural department of the United States. He is a typical Western man. He knows how to rough it, and at the same time possesses an extraordinary faculty for knowledge, and he has something to say on almost every point that is of interest to humanity.

The first one to greet me, and the main lever in my work here, is I. S. Martin, who is always doing something to keep things a-going, and he has materially increased the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so made my lectures more successful in their result. He is an old miner, and has made and lost a dozen fortunes in this uncertain land. One day he took out a nugget of gold worth eight thousand dollars. He has about made up his mind to stick to Snohomish. He has comfortable bachelor quarters, and I know he cannot do any better than to keep our flag a-flying in this quarter of the world, after his thousand leagues of travel and years of adventure. Like myself, he is a dreamer of the "good time coming," and all the trial of life does not quench the hope of progress or the spirit that still delights in "morning's outspread radiancy."

I had a pleasant sojourn on top of the hill with my good friends, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Eddy. I was flanked on either side by the ministers, who lived in the adjacent houses. But I was not haunted a bit. I don't know how it was with the ministers, whether they saw horns and hoofs or not, and whether their appetites grew less. Mr. and Mrs. Eddy are constant readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so I was in congenial society.

C. H. Packard, editor of the county paper, the Eye, is one of those rare editors who speaks his mind and lets the world know where he stands on the Freethought question. He has one of the brightest papers in the territory. He has "an eye" on everything, and he has a facil pen with which to report the news in a spicy fashion. He is secretary of the Secular Union.

George Brackett, John H. Sweet, E. C. Ferguson, who presided at my meetings; G. B. Deering, Chas. Lowery, H. C. Comegys, who acted as president of the temporary organization; J. V. Bowen, the Blackman brothers, A. N. Morgan, one of the first settlers of the country and a thorough Liberal; H. D. Morgan, Fred. Fass, the Bateman brothers, Oliver McLean, G. H. Pennington, C. H. Anderson, Martin Kitzmiller, Mr. Yeaton, H. A. Ray, Chester Thornton, and others, are our allies here, and a splendid company they make of earnest Freethinkers, and I expect, on my return, that the membership of the Union will be counted by hundreds. I leave Snohomish with bright hopes, for I hav met with noble friends, and my campaign has been one of delight and advantage.

In the bright early morning of Tuesday, August 2d, I float down the river to the shining sound. A merry company is on board, for about twenty Snohomishites are going to camp out and hunt and fish for a week or two. I would hav liked to linger along the sunny beach and try my luck with the line and shot, but I must hurry forward to the Naples of the coast, Seattle, glittering like a queen upon the hills in the golden sunset. I lectured Wednesday evening, and the Secular Union was permanently organized, and, I guess, if the platform of the Nine Demands is adhered to, that our Seattle friends will come to the front with a powerful array. Like the National Union, the Liberal society here has drifted upon side issues, and the cause has been weakened. However important other great reforms are, they must hav their special instrumentalities; while the Freethought organization must be devoted to its own work, which creates the fundamental conditions of political progress.

From Seattle I come to Port Townsend, another bright and lively city, with beautiful views of the sound, the islands, and the snowy ranges. The halo of promis is also over this city, and there is no knowing what its future magnificence may be, when five hundred ships come sailing into the Puget waters from Ormus and from Ind. No one knows as yet where the golden wand will drop.

I was met by our bright, adventurous comrade D. W. Smith, mayor of Port Townsend, the busiest of its citizens, a soldier and officer in the war, and one of the most prominent citizens in the territory, and who has won his position by pure grit. He has never been afraid to hang the pictures of Thomas Paine, Ingersoll, and Bennett on the walls of his law office. In all his struggling days he never flinched in the expression of his Freethought convictions, and his success has come simply by strenuous ability.

Thursday, on the little boat Derpath, Captain Seymour, I am off for Port Angeles, thirty miles away toward the sea, where the Puget Sound Coöperativ Colony flings its banner to the breeze for its model commonwealth. I am fortunate to be accompanied by entertaining and Liberal friends, Mr. Thos. D. Merrill, of Saginaw, Mich., and Miss A. W. Bright. This sound is called the Mediterranean of the New World, and it is indeed a delightful expanse of sparkling waters, and as we go sailing over its blue bosom we might easily imagin that we were amid the olden lands and historic scenes. The fluctuating outline of the distant shores melts like jewels in the quivering horizon, and at times the sea is almost like glass, so softly do the winds steal over it. It was an enchanting summer's voyage. The little steamer took it quite easy, and didn't hurry a bit, and we were nearly all day long going the thirty miles. Half-way we stop at Dungeness, a little city of one store, three hotels, and no church, tucked behind what they call a "spit," and it took about an hour to reach it from the open sound; and we had to creep slowly back again, in order to avoid stranding. About sunset we arrived at Port Angeles. Behind it towers the Olympic range, with its beautiful snowy peaks, glistening in the golden light. The colony could not hav selected a lovelier spot whereby to giv the world a glimpse of the paradise of the future. Mr. Charles Peters and others are ready with fraternal greetings, and so I feel at home. I like this coöperativ colony so far. It is an experiment, of course, and its theory of formation seems to be right, but the final success depends upon the material, that is, the kind of folks that come in to carry out the plan. The trouble with these coöperativ associations is the imperfection of human nature. Wisdom does not always prevail, nor generous councils. The Puget Colony seems, up to this time, to hav been successful, and, with careful management, will pass the shoals and rocks to a favorable sea of fortune. It is composed mainly, I should judge, of men and women of earnest convictions and intelligence. Its president, Geo. Venable Smith, has made a thorough study of coöperativ principles, and has wisely conducted affairs. The situation of Port Angeles is excellent, the ocean views are gorgeous, the climate is delightful. It is the first harbor on the sound from the sea. The "spit" is four miles long, and forms an ample breakwater. The harbor has eight square miles of anchorage, and can afford shelter for hundreds of vessels. There is a lighthouse here, and this was formerly a port of entry, but is not now. There is, however a bill pending in Congress to make it such. The number of colonists is three hundred and thirty, and the population of the precinct is five hundred. One can be happy and contented here and dream of the good time coming. Much has already been accomplished. Trees hav been cut down. A big saw-mill has been built, and will soon be in operation. Houses hav been constructed of rough lumber, but they are comfortable. Some of the people liv in tents. I took dinner at the colony table. It reminded me of old soldier times—but the rations were good. I hav thus given the facts, but I hope no one will jump to any conclusion, but make proper inquiries before venturing to this far-off experiment. One must hav some money, and some faith, and a thorough conviction of the necessity of work, and a determination to stand by through thick and thin. This is a most important undertaking—a beautiful dream—which may some time giv sweeter and better hope to all human progress. To labor harmoniously together is the glory of civilization.

The Model Commonwealth, edited by Mrs. Laura Hall, is a successful journal. It has now a subscription list of eighteen hundred, extending all over the United States. Mrs. Hall is the daughter of D. M. Crane, and is a most enthusiastic and able exponent of the principles of the commonwealth.

I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Williams, formerly of Portland, who hav come here to help fulfil the glorious dream of their Spiritual philosophy.

I had the pleasure of meeting Norman Smith, whom I formerly met in Colorado. His father was the original owner of the lands about here, and was collector of the port. Mr. Smith is a thorough believer in the colony, and by his generous coöperation this site has been secured for the enterprise.

Francis Hinckley, formerly president of the Chicago League, is here, and he makes a good Liberal bishop. Dr. W. J. Taylor used to be boy and chum with E. A. Stevens, and through the TRUTH SEEKER columns they can shake hands with greetings from Puget sound to Lake Michigan.

Albert E. Saunderson, Mr. and Mrs. Galbraith, Mr. and Mrs. J. V. Taylor, W. N. Shearer, Mr. Grant, E. D. Kenley, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Beck, W. H. Green, Frank Chambers, Thos. Malony, A. Kummer, Kendall Church, D. W. Morse, Wm. Bell, Jos. Pierson, C. A. Morse, W. B. Dodge, J. B. Croake, E. B. Mastick, Jr., etc., colonists and residents of the place, are among the friends at this point, and I anticipate pleasure in coming again to this possible Garden of Eden in the New Age.

From Port Angeles I go Eastward. I hav traveled thousands of miles from New York city, and yet I hav not reached the central point of Uncle Sam's dominions. I must go a hundred miles west yet. This central point is about nineteen miles west of Cape Flattery rocks, say two hundred miles west and seven hundred miles north of San Francisco. This may appear a Puget sound yarn, but if anyone will consult the map of the world this statement will be found correct.

I left Port Angeles last Friday evening, but here I am this morning Saturday stranded off Dungeness, with the prospect of lying here for twelve hours until the high tide. The boat is now at an angle of forty-five degrees, and I can neither sit up straight nor lie down straight, and I hav to write these lines with both feet braced to keep some kind of a perpendicular. There is a gentle insinuation that the boat may tip over at any time, in which case I shall hav a salt sea bath and a wade and swim for about a mile, and the anticipation is not a very entertaining one. In that case, what would become of my Freethought literature and these "News and Notes?" I sincerely hope that Jonah's whale may come along and swallow all this Infidelity until the boat is right side up with care. I am afraid that otherwise the fishes will find a tumult in their caves below. I don't know when these "Notes" will come to hand, but if delayed, friends will know the reason why—that I am drifting on the sandbars of Puget sound, at an angle of forty five degrees, with a still greater inclination that I might hav a pair of angel-wings and skip.

If I don't hav to wade from here to Port Townsend, I shall be at Colfax, W. T., Aug. 14th; at Pendleton, I expect, Aug. 21st; at Union, Aug. 23d, 24th, and 25th; at Baker City, Aug. 26th, 27th, and 28th; at Prairie City, from Aug. 29th to Sept. 5th; at Emmett's and Boise City, Idaho, from Sept. 6th to Sept. 18th; at Salt Lake, for convention of Utah Liberals, Sept. 24th and 25th, and then Eastward by way of Canon City, Denver, Nebraska, Iowa, to Chicago. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Mr. Reynolds in Ohio.

Metamora, O.—I gladly accepted the urgent invitation of friend D. A. Kahle to deliver two lectures on Sunday, July 31st, at Metamora, hoping the trip via the lake would tend to the restoration of my health. On arrival at Sylvania (Metamora is some twelve miles off the railroad) I was met at the depot by friend J. M. Hopkins, a veteran Liberal, who, with his good wife, render valuable service to the cause of Infidelity—in every relation in life they reflect credit on the cause they espouse. I highly appreciated my most hospitable reception at their cosy, happy home, and much enjoyed the needed rest and the perusal of the last TRUTH SEEKER.

On Sunday morning, with Squire Hopkins, I enjoyed a pleasant drive to Metamora, and repaired to the house of Mr. D. A. Kahle, who has been for nigh fifteen years a sufferer from lung trouble, and is now in the last stage of consumption.

Mr. Kahle two years ago buried his wife, the loved and loving helpmate whose gentle ministrations so blessed his life and made his sufferings endurable. I found him living without the presence of any relativ, keeping house alone with his man John, who ably acts as cook and housekeeper. Friend Kahle, with very large love of life, fully realizes that the dread fiat has gone forth; it is impossible he can long survive, yet he contemplates death with serenity, bowing to the inevitable, comforted with the glad assurance he has not lived in vain. Despite his outspoken Infidelity, he is beloved and respected by the entire community for his sterling worth, kind, generous nature, and earnest desire at all times to promote others' welfare.

At 3 P.M. a large and intelligent audience listened to "Why I Left the Pulpit." In the evening at 8, although it was generally supposed the attendance would be very slim, there was a very large audience, fully twice as many as at the afternoon lecture. I spoke on "The Bible: Whence It Really Came and What It Really Teaches." I gave away a number of sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and sold quite a number of books, Miss Helen H. Gardener's great masterpiece, "Men, Women, and Gods," and Dr. E. B. Foote's "Plain Home Talk" taking the lead.

I hope to respond to the many kind invitations to lecture at Sylvania, Lyons, and adjacent villages on the commencement of my Western trip early in September. C. B. REYNOLDS.

"Partisan Warfare."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: You admit (July 30th) that you are a partisan, and you add that I am one too, and "a narrow and intolerant Anarchist." Will you kindly introduce me to my party, Anarchist or otherwise? I would be grateful for the knowledge of any band of men more or less organized with whom I could own even intellectual fellowship. You may not hav intended to misstate me. A few years ago, I myself supposed that my views accorded with those announced by Liberty of Boston; but the Anarchism I espoused had not become "conscienceless," had not enthroned Ego in place of the absent Jehovah. I repudiate this Tak-kakeric and Tuckeric despotism, no less than Mrs. Majority Grundy's, nor are Lucifer's flirtations with Hymen a whit more attractiv to me. Seymour's London phase of Anarchy is as crazy as Chicago's. He endeavors to resuscitate the effete twaddle of that gutter-rat, Marat. William Morris, the poet labor tribune, is indeed a party leader attractiv by his personal character and spirit, but infected with the craze of land nationalization, which knocks his denial of state Socialism farther than I can see it.

That there exist scattered over the world characters just and kind enough to associate without laws or government is probable, but ignorant of each other they cannot form a party. But perhaps it shows a narrow partisan spirit to oppose the concession of clerical privilege of prohibition and of compulsory taxation to the vox dei of the ballot-box.

I do not oppose the electoral system unconditionally. Some autonomic tyrannies are fatal under existing prejudices, as at Valley Falls. This fatality would be limited, however, not universal, but for the general government which you pretend is necessary, and which, strictly allied with the churches and with capitalism, baffles every free thought, word, and act.

Ten thousand independent autonomies, allied as they might be to resist foreign invasion, would, in respect to social and religious affairs, present a great range of choice favorable to personal liberty. What an object lesson is the Edmunds court of the despotism inherent to all general governments!

Now, let us examin the partisanship that you confess. In its opposition to clerical authority, I fully sympathize, but not in your reckless insults to traditional sentiments, or gratuitous vilification of the old worthies about whom you know next to nothing; from Abraham, the pastoral chieftain, to Jesus, the iconoclast, the Theodore Parker of Nazareth. Writers like Oswald confound, in a promiscuous malignity, men who in their far-away time and place withstood the abuses of arrogant power, and those who in other times and places abused power in their names. I do not disparage the usefulness of Mr. Oswald's pen in defense of natural hygiene against monachism or other ascetic prejudices, yet even here, with wilful blindness, he pretends to ignore chemical and physiological distinctions, and injures the cause of temperance by confounding the most wholesome with the most pernicious drinks. What an absurdity this fanaticism leads him into here, viz.: "The avarice of a cruel master may hav forced his slaves to quench their thirst with fermented must or hydromel, till habit begot a baleful second nature, and the at first reluctant victims of intoxication learned to prefer spoiled to fresh grape juice!" ! ! ! Yet such stuff comes right in the midst of very forcible good sense. As if water were not cheaper than wine!

Sir Walter Scott and other creditable medievalists show up the jolly carousals of monks living as parasites on the fat of the land, but it was reserved for a more original genius to discover in wine-bibbing a complement of fasts and penances, enforced on the monk by his abbot.

What wonder that so reckless a pen should charge Jesus, the wine-maker and friend of publicans, with monkish asceticism, and repeat the same of Buddha, who, says Arnold, experimented such nonsense and repudiated it? See his poem which the king of Siam crowns as orthodox. This is a fair sample of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S crude and promiscuous way of handling Christianity, which may please those already disillusioned, but repels serious Christians. The truly formidable foes of superstition, like Renan, carry conscience into criticism, and conciliate by fairness. M. E. LAZARUS.

The Woman in the Moon.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It was not I who discovered the woman in the moon, as Mr. G. E. Macdonald supposes, but Dr. James M. Thompson, to whom I gave the credit in my letter to the New York Sun; and he is also named as the discoverer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 6th. Mr. Macdonald now says it is not a new discovery, and quotes Longfellow to prove that the infant Hiawatha observed it, and was told that an angry warrior once threw his grandmother against the moon, and it was her body that the child saw there.

But it is not the body of an old woman that Dr. Thompson discovered; it is only the head and neck of a very good looking young or middle-aged woman in profile. Furthermore, it requires a spy-glass, or an opera-glass, to see the profile, and no one will pretend that the infant Hiawatha looked through an optical instrument to see old granny Lo in the moon. So I guess that Longfellow was drawing a long bow when he told that story, and I doubt whether he or any other fellow ever saw that old squaw in the moon.

More than a year ago I sent a communication to the New York Sun about this new astronomical discovery, accompanying it with a drawing that I hoped to see reproduced. But my letter did not appear, and I afterward learned that my drawing would not answer the purpose in a paper like the Sun. I then undertook to make a drawing that would answer, and hoped to hav it appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER. But I neglected to finish it, until at last the fact of the discovery became known to many persons, and one "J. K. L." announced it in the Sun of June 30th. Then I wrote to the editor claiming for my friend Thompson, a modest, upright, and genial bachelor of seventy-two, a retired physician whose sands of life seem unlikely soon to run out, the credit of the astronomical discovery.

The man in the moon is one of the myths of the Middle Ages. A writer in the twelfth century, named Necham, alludes to the vulgar belief embodied in four lines of Latin verse, which are thus translated by Baring-Gould:

> See the rustic in the moon,
> How his bundle weighs him down;
> Thus his sticks the truth reveal,
> It never profits man to steal.

"Moonshine," in "Midsummer Night's Dream," comes in with a bush of thorns, a lantern, and a dog. Twice he begins his speech, but is unable to finish it, on account of interruptions. At last he says:

> All that I hav to say is to tell you that the lantern is the moon, I the man in the moon, this thornbush my thornbush, and this dog my dog.

Mr. Baring-Gould says that an old Devonshire crone once pointed out to him the dog in the moon. But I confess that I was never able to see in the moon either a man or a dog. I hav, however, from early childhood, in common, I presume, with the most of mankind, seen a face in the moon, that is, spots answering for eyes, nose, and mouth. But after seeing through an opera-glass the profile and neck of a robust woman on the west half of the moon, I can with the naked eye almost trace the outline of the same.

In July, 1886, when Dr. Thompson came to my house and showed us through his little telescope the woman in the moon, he said he was disappointed in not being able to make the star-gazers at the National observatory see it; they could only see crags and craters. Just so it was in Galileo's time—no savant could see the horns of Venus through his telescope—that is to say, they shut their eyes or wouldn't look.

With a little effort of the imagination you can see also the face of a man in the moon, partially eclipsed by the woman's profile. He has plenty of hair and beard, and appears to be whispering in her ear, or, possibly, about to kiss her. Her profile can be seen when the moon is only half full. W. H. BURR.

Will Debate with Braden or the Devil.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Let us be thankful that Liberalism admits of wide difference in opinions. I differ from THE TRUTH SEEKER when it says, "Self-respecting Freethought lecturers decline to debate with the Rev. Clark Braden." I am a Freethought lecturer. I believe I am self-respecting. I do not decline to debate with Clark Braden. I may hav no higher opinion of him as a man and an opponent than you hav; but when any Christian community puts forward Clark Braden as the representativ of Christianity, and the Liberals invite me to meet him in debate, I propose to meet him every time. I will never pull down my flag of Liberalism in the face of any Christian craft. It is my business to maintain and defend Liberalism against the attacks of all foes, reputable or disreputable. It is not my business to choose my antagonist. According to my understanding of the principles of free debate, I am under obligation, as a Liberal and a man, to face Christianity in open debate with the man of its choice. It is not my place to dictate to it who its champion should be. It has a right, and I fully recognize its right, to choose its own mouth piece. I hav no right to make debate a personal matter. This is the mistake which the Christian church has been making for ages.

Again and again hav I heard clergymen offer as an excuse for their Christian cowardice, in refusing to debate with Infidel lecturers, that it would be incompatible with a clergyman's holy calling, and a sacrifice of self-respect, to debate with irresponsible Infidel itinerants; blatant blasphemers, whose chief stock in trade consists in ridiculing the doctrins of Christianity and berating the ministry.

By the accepted rules of debate, among polemists, Hedge's "Rules of Logic," for instance, a debater has nothing to do with the personal character of his opponent, if that opponent is indorsed by his co-believers. We hav been trying for years to get the Christians to see that debate is not a personal warfare; but, rather, one of the best methods for ascertaining truth. Are we going to surrender in the face of the enemy, by making debate, after all, a personal affair?

Monte Vista, Col. W. F. JAMIESON.

MRS. H. S. LAKE speaks at Cassadaga camp-meeting, August 17th, 19th, 21st, and 23d; at Philadelphia, Pa., the Sundays of September; at Norwich, Conn., the Sundays of October; at Boston, the Sundays of December. Societies desiring her services will address her, 123 West Concord street, Boston, Mass.

THE Progressiv Age of the 6th inst. says: "The largest audience which has assembled to listen to any Liberal lecture in this city since that delivered by Colonel Ingersoll, gathered at Powers's Opera House last Sunday evening to enjoy the intellectual treat prepared for them by Dr. York, the famous Freethought orator from the Pacific coast. After calling attention to the various Liberal papers, making special mention of the Progressiv Age, the speaker proceeded to lay down the planks of the platform upon which he stood as a bold and fearless champion of the oppressed, who suffer from ecclesiastical or any other form of tyranny, an out-and-out Liberal favoring equal rights to all irrespectiv of sex, color, creed. A grand platform truly, without a rotten plank in it. Dr. York's style is humorous, pleasing at times, eloquent, and entirely adapted to the tastes of the American public; his voice is rich, powerful, and melodious, and in gesture he naturally follows the advice of Hamlet in his instructions to players: 'Suit the action to the word, the word to the action.' The Telegram Herald, in commenting on the lecture, says: 'His denunciation of Christianity, and its teachings and effects, was much more intense than that of Dr. Watts, the "English Ingersoll." He made his points with telling effect, and was frequently applauded.' The general sentiment of the Freethinking portion of the audience was one of unqualified approval, while a compliment no less pointed was paid him by the Christian representativs who deemed it proper to get mad about it; there is an old saying that 'it is only the truth which makes us angry.' The daily papers hav styled Dr. York the 'Ingersoll of the West.' We pay a higher tribute—he is the 'York of the West,' and of the world. He is an individual; and as there is but one Watts, one Ingersoll, so there is but one York. The Age wishes him 'God-speed' in his journey through the East, and voices the desire of the Freethought element in Grand Rapids, when it hopes to hear him again upon his return in the fall." Dr. York has spent about six weeks in Michigan with relativs at Ionia, during which time he has lectured at Ionia, Beldin, and other points, to large and appreciativ audiences. He now takes up his line of march for Boston via Alliance, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and New York to fill his appointments as per TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

CHAPTER IV.—TEMPERANCE.

A.—Lessons of Instinct.

Instinct is hereditary experience. The lessons derived from the repetition of pleasant or painful impressions have been transmitted from an infinite number of generations, till impending dangers have come to proclaim themselves by instinctive dread, opportune benefits by instinctive desire. The shudder that warns us to recede from the brink of a steep cliff is felt even by persons who have never personally experienced the peril of falling from the rocks of a precipice. Mountain breezes are more attractive than swamp odors; the fumes of a foul dungeon warn off a child who has had as yet no opportunity to ascertain the danger of breathing contaminated air. A few years ago I bought a pet fox, with a litter of cubs, who were soon after orphaned by the escape of their mother. They had to he fed by hand; and, among other proceeds of a forage, my neighbor's boy once brought them a bundle of lizards, and a dead rattlesnake. For the possession of those lizards there was at once an animated fight, but at sight of the serpent the little gluttons turned tail and retreated to the farther end of their kennel. They were not a month old when I bought them, and could not possibly have seen a rattlesnake before or known the effects of its bite from personal experience; but instinct at once informed them that an encounter with a reptile of that sort had brought some of their forefathers to grief.

The vegetable kingdom, that provides food for nine-tenths of all living creatures, abounds with an endless variety of edible fruits, seeds, and herbs, but also with injurious and even deadly products, often closely resembling the favorite food-plants of animals; which in a state of Nature are nevertheless sure to avoid mistake, and select their food by a faculty of recognizing differences that might escape the attention even of a trained botanist. The chief medium of that faculty is the sense of smell in the lower, and the sense of taste in the higher animals. In monkeys, for instance, the olfactory organs are rather imperfectly developed, and I have often seen them peel an unknown fruit with their fingers and then cautiously raise it to their lips and rub it to and fro before venturing to bring their teeth into play. The preliminary test, however, always sufficed to decide the question in a couple of seconds. The Abyssinian mountaineers who catch baboons by fuddling them with plum brandy have to disguise the taste of the liquor with a large admixture of syrup before they can deceive the warning instincts of their victims. Where copper mines discharge their drainage into a water-course, deer and other wild animals have been known to go in quest of distant springs rather than quench their thirst with the polluted water.

That protective instincts of that sort are shared even by the lowest animals is proved by the experiment of the philosopher Ehrenberg, who put a drop of alcohol into a bottle of pond water, and under the lens of his microscope saw a swarm of infusoria precipitate themselves to the bottom of the vessel.

Animals in a state of Nature rarely or never eat to an injurious excess; the apparent surfeits of wolves, serpents, vultures, etc., alternate with long fasts, and are digested as easily as a hunter, after missing his breakfast and dinner, would be able to digest an abundant supper. Instinct indicates even the most propitious time for indulging in repletion. The noon heat of a midsummer day seems to suspend the promptings of appetite; cows can be seen resting drowsily at the foot of a shade-tree; deer doze in mountain glens and come out to browse in moonlight; panthers cannot afford to miss an opportunity to slay their game at noon, but are very apt to hide the carcass and come back to devour it in the cool of the evening.

The products of fermentation are so repulsive to the higher animals that only the distress of actual starvation would tempt a monkey to touch a rotten apple or quench his thirst with acidulated grape-juice. Poppy fields need no fence; tobacco leaves are in no danger of being nibbled by browsing cattle. Nature seems to have had no occasion for providing instinctive safeguards against such out-of-the-way things as certain mineral poisons; yet the taste of arsenic, though not violently repulsive (like that of the more common, and therefore more dangerous, vegetable poisons), is certainly not attractive, but rather insipid, and a short experience seems to supplement the defects of instinct in that respect. Trappers know that poisoned baits after a while lose their seductiveness, and old rats have been seen driving their young from a dish of arsenic-poisoned gruel.

Certainly no animal would feel any natural inclination to seek arsenic or alcohol for its own sake, and there is no reason to suppose that man, in that respect, differs from every known species of his fellow-creatures. Our clerical temperance lecturers rant about "the lusts of the unregenerate heart," the "weakness of the flesh," the "danger of yielding to the promptings of appetite," as if Nature herself would tempt us to our ruin, and the path of safety could be learned only from preternatural revelation. But the truth is that to the palate of a child, even the child of a habitual drunkard, the taste of alcohol is as repulsive as that of turpentine or bitterwood. Tobacco fumes and the stench of burning opium still nauseate the children of the habitual smoker as they would have nauseated the children of the patriarchs. The first cigar demonstrates the virulence of nicotine by vertigo and sick headaches; the first glass of beer is rejected by the revolt of the stomach; the fauces contract and writhe against the first dram of brandy. Nature records her protest in the most unmistakable language of instinct, and only the repeated and continued disregard of that protest at last begets the abnormal craving of that poison-thirst which clerical blasphemers ascribe to the promptings of our natural appetites. They might as well make us believe in a natural passion for dungeon air, because the prisoners of the Holy Inquisition at last lost their love of liberty and came to prefer the stench of their subterranean black-holes to the breezes of the free mountains.

The craving for hot spices, for strong meats, and such abominations as fetid cheese and fermented cabbage have all to be artificially acquired; and in regard to the selection of our proper food the instincts of our young children could teach us more than a whole library of ascetic twaddle. Not for the sake of "mortifying the flesh," but on the plain recommendation of the natural senses that prefer palatable to disgusting food, the progeny of Adam could be guided in the path of reform and learn to avoid forbidden fruit by the symptoms of its forbidding taste.

B.—REWARDS OF CONFORMITY.

There is a tradition that the ancient Thessalians made it a rule that the guests of their banquets must get drunk on pain of expulsion. To let anyone remain sober, they argued, would not be just to the befuddled majority, of whose condition he might be tempted to take all sorts of advantage. If the evils of drunkenness were undeserved afflictions, it would certainly be true that sobriety would give an individual an almost unfair advantage over the rest of his fellow-men. He would be an archer trying his skill against hoodwinked rivals, a runner challenging the speed of shackled competitors. There is not a mechanical or industrial avocation in which sobriety does not give a man the advantage which health and freedom confer over crippling disease. For the baneful effects of intemperance are by no means limited to the moments of actual intoxication, but react on the half-lucid intervals, and even on the after years of the reformed toper. Temperance, in the widest sense, of abstinence from unfit food and drink, would be the best gift which the fairies could bestow on a favorite child, for the blessing of frugal habits includes almost all other blessings whatever. Spontaneous gayety, the sunshine of the unclouded soul, is dimmed by the influence of the first poison-habit, and the regretful retrospects to the "lost paradise of childhood" are founded chiefly on the contrast of poison-engendered distempers with the moral and physical health of earlier years. Temperance prolongs that sunshine to the evening of life. By temperance alone the demon of life-weariness can be kept at bay in times of fiercest tribulation. Undimmed eyes can more easily recognize the gleam of sunshine behind the clouds. The prisoners of the outlawed Circassian insurgents admitted that, in spite of hunger, hardships, and constant danger, their captors contrived to enjoy life better than their enemies in the brandy-reeking abundance of their headquarters. The myth of the Lotos-eaters described a nation of vegetarians who passed life so pleasantly that visitors refused to leave them, and renounced their native lands. The religion of Mohammed makes abstinence from intoxicating drinks a chief duty of a true believer, and that law alone has prevented the physical degeneration of his followers. With all their mental sloth and the enervating influence of their harem life, the Turks are still the finest representatives of physical manhood. At the horse fairs of Bucharest I saw specimens of their broad-shouldered, proud-eyed rustics, whose appearance contrasted strangely with that of the sluggish boors and furtive traffickers of the neighboring natives. After twelve hundred years of exhaustive wars, alternating with periods of luxury and tempting wealth, the descendants of the Arabian conquerors are still a hardy, long-lived race, physically far superior to the rum-drinking foreigners of their coast towns. For more than six hundred years the temperate Moriscos held their own in war and peace against all nations of Christendom. Their Semitic descent gave them no natural advantage over their Caucasian rivals; but they entered the arena of life with clear eyes and unpalsied hearts, and in an age of universal superstition made their country a garden of science and industry. Their cities offered a refuge to the scholars and philosophers of three continents, and in hundreds of pitched battles their indomitable valor prevailed against the wine-inspired heroism of their adversaries.

Frugality has cured diseases which defied all other remedies. For thousands of reformed gluttons it has made life worth living, after the shadows of misery already threatened to darken into the gloom of approaching night. Luigi Cornaro, a Venetian nobleman of the sixteenth century, had impaired his health by gastronomic excesses till his physicians despaired of his life, when, as a last resort, he resolved to try a complete change of diet. His father, his uncles, and two of his brothers had all died before the attainment of their fiftieth year; but Luigi determined to try conclusions with the demon of unnaturalism, and at once reduced his daily allowance of meat to one-tenth of the usual quantity, and his wine to a stint barely sufficient to flavor a cup of Venetian cistern-water. After a month of his new regimen he regained his appetite. After ten weeks he found himself able to take long walks without fatigue, and could sleep without being awakened by nightmare horrors. At the end of a year all the symptoms of chronic indigestion had left him, and he resolved to make the plan of his cure the rule of his life. That life was prolonged to a century—forty years of racking disease followed by sixty years of unbroken health, undimmed clearness of mind, unclouded content. Habitual abstinence from unnatural food and drink saves the trials of constant self-control and the alternative pangs of repentance. "Blessed are the pure, for they can follow their inclinations with impunity."

C.—PERVERSION.

The poison-habit, as we might call the craving for the stimulus of unnatural diet, is the oldest vice, and in some of its forms has been practiced by almost every nation known to history or tradition. Thousands of years before Lot got drunk on home-made wine, the ancestors of the Brahmans fuddled with soma-juice; Zoroaster enacts laws against habitual intoxication; the art of turning grape-juice from a blessing into a curse seems to have been known to the nations of Iran, to the Parsees, and to the first agricultural colonists of the lower Nile. Nunus, the Arabian Noah, is said to have planted vineyards on the banks of the Orontes; the worship of Bacchus was introduced into Asia Minor several centuries before the birth of Homer. The origin of the opium habit antedates the earliest records of Chinese history; for immemorial ages the Tartars have been addicted to the use of Koumis (fermented mare's milk), the Germanic nations to beer, the natives of Siam to tea and sago-wine. Intoxication and the excessive use of animal food were prevalent vices, especially in the larger cities, of pagan Greece and Rome.

Yet the ancients sinned with their eyes half open. Their recognition of dietetic abuses was expressed in the word frugality, which literally meant subsistence on tree fruits—or, at least, vegetable products—in distinction from the habitual use of flesh-food. The advantages of temperate habits were never directly denied; the law of Pythagoras enjoins total abstinence from wine and flesh, and the name of a "Pythagorean" became almost a synonym of "philosopher." In all but the most depraved centuries of Imperial Rome, wine was forbidden to children and women. The festival of the Bona Dea commemorated the fate of a Roman matron who had yielded to the temptation of intoxicating drink, and was slain by the hand of her stern husband. Lycurgus recommends the plan of letting the pupils of the military training-schools witness the bestial conduct of a drunken Helot, in order to inspire them with an abhorrence of intoxication. The bias of public opinion always respected the emulation of patriarchal frugality and frowned upon the excesses of licentious patricians.

But the triumph of an anti-physical religion removed those safeguards. Mistrust in the competence of our natural instincts formed the keystone of the Galilean dogma. The importance of physical welfare was systematically depreciated. The health-laws of the Mosaic code were abrogated. The messiah of Antinaturalism sanctioned the use of alcoholic drinks by his personal example—nay, by the association of that practice with the rites of a religious sacrament. The habit of purchasing mental exaltation—even of a fever-dream—at the expense of the body, agreed perfectly with the tendencies of a Nature-despising fanaticism, and during the long night of the Middle Ages monks and priests vied in an unprecedented excess of alcoholic riots. Nearly every one of the thick-sown convents from Greece to Portugal had a vineyard and a wine-cellar of its own. The monastery of Weltenburg on the upper Danube operated the largest brewery of the German empire. For centuries spiritual tyranny and spirituous license went hand in hand, and as the church increased in wealth, gluttony was added to the unnatural habits of the priesthood, and only the abject poverty of the lower classes prevented intemperance from becoming a universal vice. As it was, the followers of the Nature-despising messiah lost no opportunity to drown their better instincts in alcohol. They could plead the precedence of their moral exemplars, and vied in sowing the seeds of bodily diseases which their system of ethics welcomed as conducive to the welfare of a world-renouncing soul.

Among the slaves of the Scotch kirk-tyrants the long-continued suppression of all healthier pastimes contributed its share to the increase of intemperance. On the day when the laboring classes found their only chance of leisure, outdoor sports were strictly prohibited. Dancing was considered a heinous, and on the Sabbath almost an unpardonable, sin. The tennis-halls were closed from Saturday night to Monday morning. Bathing was sinful. Mountain excursions, strolls along the beach, or in the open fields, were not permitted on the day of the Lord. Dietetic excesses, however, escaped control, and thus became the general outlet for the cruelly suppressed craving for a diversion from the deadly monotony of drudgery and church-penance. For "Nature will have her revenge, and when the most ordinary and harmless recreations are forbidden as sinful, is apt to seek compensation in indulgences which no moralist would be willing to condone, . . . and the strictest observance of all those minute and oppressive Sabbatarian regulations was found compatible with consecrating the day of rest to a quiet but unlimited assimilation of the liquid which inebriates but does not cheer" (Saturday Review, July 19, 1879). "Everyone," says Lecky, "who considers the world as it really exists, must have convinced himself that in great towns public amusements of an exciting order are absolutely necessary, and that to suppress them is simply to plunge an immense portion of the population into the lowest depths of vice."

Clerical despotism is still a potent ally of intemperance. In hundreds of British and North American cities the dearth of better pastimes drives our workingmen to the pot-house. They drink to get drunk, as the only available means of escaping tedium and the consciousness of their misery. Nature craves recreation, and the suppression of that instinct has avenged itself by its perversion.

D.—PENALTIES OF NEGLECT.

Dietetic abuses have contributed more to the progress of human degeneration than all other causes taken together. Our infants are sickened with drastic drugs. The growth of young children is stunted with narcotic beverages; the suppression of healthier pastimes drives our young men to the rum-shop; intemperance has become the Lethe in which the victims of social abuses seek to drown their misery. The curse of the poison-habit haunts us from the cradle to the grave, and for millions of our fellow-men has made the burdens of life to outweigh its blessings. There is a doubt if the "years" of Genesis should be understood in the present meaning of the word; but historians and biologists agree that the average longevity of our race has been enormously reduced within the last twenty centuries, and intemperance is the chief cause of that decrease. Our average stature has been reduced even below that of the ancient natives of an enervating climate, like that of the lower Nile, as proved by D'Arnaud's measurements of the Egyptian mummy-skeletons. On our own continent, outdoor life in the struggle with the perils of the wilderness has somewhat redeemed our loss of physical manhood; but what are the men of modern Europe compared with their iron-fisted ancestors, the athletic Greeks, the world-conquering Romans, the Scandinavian giants, the heroic Visigoths? Like a building collapsing under the progress of a devouring fire, the structure of the human body has shrunk under the influence of the poison-habit; and there is no doubt that the moral vigor of our race has undergone a corresponding impairment—appreciable in spite of the recent revival of intellectual activity and the constant increase of general information.

The tide is turning; the victims of anti-physical dogmas are awakening to the significance of their delusion; the power of public opinion has forced the dupes of the alcohol-brewing Galilean to join the crusade of the temperance movement; diet-reform has become a chief problem of civilization; but the upas-tree of the poison-habit is too deeply rooted to be eradicated in a single generation, and the task of redemption will be the work of centuries. As yet the probing of the wound has only revealed the appalling extent of the canker-sore. The statistics of the liquor traffic have established the fact that the value of the resources wasted on the gratification of the poison-vice far exceeds the aggregate amount of the yearly expenditure for educational, charitable, and sanitary purposes—nay, that the abolition of that traffic would save a sum sufficient for all reforms needed to turn earth into a physical and social paradise. And yet that waste expresses only the indirect and smaller part of the damage caused by the curse of the poison habit. The loss in health and happiness cannot be estimated in coin; but if the sum thus expended in the purchase of disease were devoted to the promotion of arson and robbery, the utmost possible extent of the consequent mischief would probably fall short of the present result. The stimulant habit in all its forms clouds the sunshine of life like an all-pervading poison-vapor. Alcohol undermines the stamina of manhood; narcotic drinks foster a complication of nervous diseases; opium and tobacco impair the vigor of the cerebral functions. The excessive use of animal food, too, avenges itself in all sorts of moral and physical disorders. It inflames passions which no prayer can quench. "Alas! what avails all theology against a diet of bull-beef?" Father Smeth wrote from the Sioux missions; and the almost exclusive use of flesh food has, indeed, afflicted our Indians with the truculence of carnivorous beasts. The same cause has produced the same effects in western Europe. The carnivorous saints of medieval Spain delighted in matanzas and heretic-hunts, as their carnivorous ancestors in the butcher sports of the circus, and their British contemporaries in bear-baits and Tyburn spectacles.

E.—REFORM.

The consequences of intemperance have at all times provoked protests against the more ruinous forms of the poison-habit, but the advance from special to general principles is often amazingly slow; and even now the cause of temperance is hampered by the shortsightedness of reformers who hope to eradicate the Upas-tree by clipping and hacking its more prominent branches. They would limit prohibition to the more deadly stimulants, not dreaming that the fatal habit is sure to reproduce its fruit from the smallest germs; that the poison-vice, in fact, is infallibly progressive, ever tending to goad the morbid craving of the toper to stronger and stronger poisons or to a constant increase in the quantity of the wonted stimulant: from cider to brandy, from laudanum to morphine, from tonic bitters to rum, from a glass of wine to a dozen bottles, from beer and tobacco to the vilest tipples of the dram-shop. "Principiis obsta" (Resist the beginnings) was a Latin maxim of deep significance. The cumulative tendency of the stimulant vice may be resisted, but only by constant vigilance, constant self-denial, constant struggles with the revivals of a morbid appetency, all of which might be saved by the total renunciation of all abnormal stimulants whatever, for only in that sense is it true that "abstinence is easier than temperance."

We must accustom our boys to avoid the poison-vice as a loathsome disease, rather than as a forbidden luxury which could ever be indulged without paying the penalty of Nature in a distressing reaction, far outweighing the pleasures of the morbid and momentary exaltation. We must teach them that the artifice by which the toper hopes to cheat Nature out of an access of abnormal enjoyment is under all circumstances a losing game, which at last fails to produce, even for the moment of the fever-stimulus, a glimpse of happiness at all comparable to the unclouded sunshine of temperance.

But before we can hope to redeem the victims of the poison-vender, we must learn to make virtue more attractive than vice. We must counteract the attractions of the rum-shop by inviting reforming topers, not to the whining conventicles of a Sabbath-school, but to temperance gardens, resounding with music (dance music, if "sacred concerts" should pall) and the jubilee of romping children, and shortening summer days with free museums, picture galleries, swings, ball grounds, and foot-race tracks. The gods of the future will contrive to outbid the devil.

It would be unfair, though, to depreciate the services of the Christian ministers who in a choice between dogma and reform have bravely sided with Nature, and, defying the wrath both of spiritual and spirituous poison-mongers, of rum-sellers and heretic-hunters, are trying their utmost to undo the mischief of their antinatural creed, by frankly admitting that a man can be defiled by "things that enter his mouth," and that the sacrament of eucharistic alcohol should be abandoned to the rites of devil-worshipers.

But the religion which pretends to inculcate a peace-making spirit of meekness has been strangely remiss in opposing the excessive use of a diet which is clearly incompatible with the promotion of that virtue. In Christians, as in Turks, Tartars, and North American Redskins, a chiefly carnivorous diet engenders the instincts of carnivorous beasts, and a Peace Congress celebrating its banquets with sixteen courses of flesh food might as well treat a vigilance committee to sixteen courses of opium. "Frugality" should again be promoted in the ancient sense of the word; in a community of reformants temperance and vegetarianism should go hand in hand. Or rather, the word "temperance" should be used in the extended sense that would make it a synonym of Abstinence from all kinds of unnatural food and drink; and Dr. Schrodt's rule should become the canon of every dietetic reform league, "Avoid," he says, "all drinks and stimulants repulsive to the palate of an unseduced child, but also all comestibles that need artificial preparation to make them palatable." The first part of that rule would exclude opium, tobacco, alcoholic beverages, tea, coffee, absinthe, fetid cheese, and caustic spices. The second would abolish many kinds of animal food, but sanction milk, butter, eggs, honey, and other "semi-animal" substances, condemned by the extreme school of vegetarians. "From the egg to the apple," is an old Latin phrase which proves that the frugality of the ancient Romans never went to such extremes. Milk, eggs, and vegetable fats, in their combination with farinaceous dishes, might amply replace the flesh food of the northern nations, and, considering the infinite variety of fruits and vegetables known to modern horticulture, there seems no reason why a vegetarian diet should necessarily be a monotonous one. The Religion of Nature will require the renunciation of several deep-rooted prejudices, but its path of salvation will in no sense be a path of thorns.

Christian Indifference.

Another instance of the "rarity of Christian charity" has just been exemplified at the cost of a human life in the neighboring city of Joliet. Jacob Gloyer, a young, well-educated German, teacher of the Turners' free school, died between Sunday night and Monday morning under most distressing circumstances.

By the efforts of Carl Plum, a business man of this city, but a resident of Joliet, and one of the leading Turners in this district, a Freethought school was founded to counteract the insidious Catholic influence which so permeates the German schools of Joliet. Young Gloyer was invited to assume charge, and the school thrived for a time. But when the children were withdrawn, either to take part in the struggle for existence or by removal, few were found to take their place, and the school gradually waned and the power of the priests became paramount. The young pedagog found it necessary to either cease holding his school or limit its sessions to certain hours, and decided on the latter course, so that he was enabled to find employment as a waiter in a restaurant. The proprietor was a bigoted Catholic, so that young Gloyer, who lodged with him, invariably preferred the seclusion of his room to the society of the family.

Sunday afternoon he was out with Freethought friends, but early retired to his own apartment. Shortly after, moans and groans were heard, even by passers-by, apparently emanating from the room of the young teacher. Those pitiful moans increased in intensity until nearly daylight, when they ceased altogether. His cries of distress were plainly heard by people in the neighborhood, who presumed that people in the house were attending to his wants, so that not a solitary individual volunteered to go to his assistance or even notify his friends. Toward morning some one asked a milkman to look in his room, stating what he had heard, and remarking, "He's quiet now." There on the bed, with muscles contracted by cramps, "drawn up like a ball," as they expressed it, young Gloyer was not yet quite cold in death. An acute attack of cholera-morbus, which a simple remedy or the slightest assistance might hav relieved, was the cause of his death. The following day the daughters of Carl Plum, robed in white, sprinkled flowers in the grave of the talented young German, and one of them took occasion to giv the Christians a little lesson on moral philosophy and practical Christianity. E. A. STEVENS.

As mankind improve, the number of doctrins which are no longer disputed or doubted will be constantly on the increase, and the well-being of mankind may almost be measured by the number and gravity of the truths which hav reached the point of being uncontested. The cessation on one question after another of serious controversy is one of the necessary incidents of the consolidation of opinion—a consolidation as salutary in the case of true opinions as it is dangerous and noxious when the opinions are erroneous.—J. S. Mill.

The Inwardness of the Mormon Confiscation.

From the Sequachee Sun.

Would it not be a good thing for the United States to take charge of all the church property in the country, and appropriate it strictly for the benefit of public schools?

The government has as much right to confiscate the property of the Methodist or Baptist churches as it has the Mormons. We do not believe there is any church right except the Christian (vulgarly called Campbellite) church. It is the only true church of Christ. And all others are teaching doctrins contrary to the best interests of the people; we favor wiping them out.

None (except the Campbellites) hav half the Bible indorsement the Mormons hav. We think the Mormons are a little off, yet they are nearer in accord with the Bible than many so-called orthodox churches. Wipe out Mormons and all, and establish the Christian church, which is the only true church of Christ. It is best to wipe out one at a time, as it will be easier to take them in detail.

Wipe out the Mormons first; then pitch into the Baptists, and the Mormons will aid in their downfall out of revenge. When the Mormons and Baptists are no more, pick up some of the rest.

It will be just as constitutional as what is now being done with the Mormons. Wiping out Mormonism is a good precedent for future legislation. The ice had to be broken somewhere in order to take away personal liberty and enslave the people.

The liberties of a people are never taken all at once. Legislation of this kind begins on some weak body, and gradually uses one faction against another until all are made slaves.

The Constitution.

September 17, 1787, the convention called to formulate a Constitution for the United States finished its work and submitted it to the people. The convention was presided over by Washington, and met in Philadelphia. We are favored with two circulars calling attention to this, and outlining the monster celebration of that convention's centennial to be held in Philadelphia, September 17th. The president of the United States will be there, a score or more of governors hav accepted invitations, and innumerable editors, senators, representativs, doctors, ecclesiastics, poets, orators, judges, inventors, historians, army and navy officers, and lawyers are expected to join in. If the hopes of the Constitutional Centennial commission be realized, it will be a big day for Philadelphia.

To arouse the people upon the subject and fill them with enthusiasm sufficient to induce an overcrowding of Philadelphia, the commission has issued an address "to the people of the United States." The address is appealingly tender, touchingly pathetic, bravely heroic, and hypocritically patriotic. We hav room, however, for but one paragraph. Of September 17, 1787, and its results, the address says:

"The labors of that dav preserved for all time the precious fruits of freedom and self-government. Unique in origin; without a prototype in design; of enduring strength, and of phenomenal success, in the history of political philosophy the Constitution stands alone. Tested by danger and adversity, as well as by peace and prosperity, endeared to us by tradition and hallowed by experience, it has become the object of our reverential and affectionate regard. To it no American mind can be too attentiv, and no American heart too devoted, and it is believed that the people will gather, as they never yet hav gathered, to commemorate by appropriate exercises the great work which was accomplished in Philadelphia by the statesmen of the Revolution, and to return in a devout and heartfelt manner their thanks to divine providence for the blessings which they hav enjoyed during a century of federal constitutional government."

We sincerely wish this were all true about the "reverential and affectionate regard" the people hav for the great "charter of our liberties," and if it were, none would more heartily celebrate this centennial. But it is not. It is simply political buncombe and fireworks rhetoric of the ancient Fourth of July style. The Constitution, with its amendments, is, perhaps, the wisest political document that men hav drawn. It is simple, direct, broad, comprehensiv, and, best of all, prohibits governmental tyranny. That is its spirit. But has this spirit given life? Is the Constitution reverenced and its provisions regarded? If we revere an authority, we are apt to obey its commands, for sincere regard is best shown by works and not by lip service. The Constitution of the United States is held up for an idol, framed for show, pictured as "divine"—and then, like many another precious thing, put away in memory's attic and forgotten. There is not a politician in the country—and the politicians are unfortunately our law-makers—who cares a straw for the Constitution. He never thinks of it; our executiv officers forget its existence, and our judges twist it into unmeaning shape when some rash litigant appeals to its provisions. The Constitution is violated at every session of Congress, broken by every state legislature in the country, by almost every municipality and town government.

Our statute books contain thousands of laws controverting the Constitution in spirit and letter. The Christian church is, perhaps, its most deadly foe. For the benefit of our pious citizens hundreds of laws hav been enacted, every one of which is unconstitutional. Chaplains in the army; chaplains in the navy; Indians given over body and soul to sects; money appropriated for religious purposes; persecutions inaugurated at the instance of the church; religious rites on all public occasions—these, and dozens of other violations, occur annually, done by Congress, of all powers the one that should be the most jealous of our Great Charter. In the states, matters are worse. Every one of the Demands of Liberalism is a demand for the restoration of Constitutional government, departed from at the solicitation of some begging religious sect. Secular corporations, too, smash the Constitution into verbal splinters, and the courts help them by learned decisions of great length and ingenuity. If one of the framers of the Constitution could return to the United States to-day, the first question he would ask is, "When was the Constitution thrown overboard?" Blasphemy prosecutions occurring under a charter guaranteeing free speech; heretics deprived of civil rights in a land where all men are said to be equal; the state treasury robbed in the name of religion, though the Constitution forbids the establishment of religion; churches controling in politics, though church and state are supposed to be separate institutions—all these would surprise the resurrected framer of a Constitution which forbids them, and indicate that the document which he considered impregnable had gone to ruin and decay. It certainly cannot be said to be reverenced with a very affectionate regard, though it has been and is undoubtedly "tested by danger and adversity."

When the cohorts and the hosts meet in Philadelphia next month, they will probably carry out the program of turning their eyes to the skies and saying to the air that they are thankful for the blessings which his "Divine Providence" has so kindly vouchsafed. This, also, will be a work of national hypocrisy. There never was so much suffering in this country as now, and if his "Divine Providence" is really conducting the affairs of this planet, his efforts are not exactly blessings. Men are dying of want, and women doing worse, because of poverty; children by hundreds are giving up their little lives ere they are well begun. Heartless oppression is slowly murdering thousands of laborers in mines and factories, and "society" is afraid of a French Revolution on American soil. Injustice is about as common as justice, and a man who livs honestly, deals righteously, and helps his fellows, is pointed out as a phenomenon. This does not look as though "Divine Providence" is distributing blessings with any too lavish hand.

The Constitutional Centennial commission would do infinitly more good if it should address itself to the revival of a regard for the spirit and letter of our great charter instead of conducting an extravagant pageant in which the orators will be robed and ermined hypocrits, and the audience self-satisfied patriots tickled to be told how great they hav become. There is, of course, a good deal of personal liberty yet left in this country, but it is mostly the liberty to starve "in the sphere in which God has placed you."

A Failure.

"It is not always necessary to answer an Infidel. If one will answer him, it is not always necessary to use courtesy." These are the words of a Christian journal in beginning a commendation of Henry M. Field's "Open Letter to Robert G. Ingersoll" in the North American Review. And this Christian paper cites as precedents for its position the examples of Jesus Christ and Martin Luther. "Col. Robert G. Ingersoll," goes on the Independent, "has generally had scant courtesy from Christian apologists; and he has not deserved much."

These are truly Christian sentiments, and they reveal the ugliness of the Christian religion. If Christianity were, as a matter of fact, as true as it really is false, the effect it has upon its believers would be a sufficient reason for its rejection by decent and humane people.

The only remarkable thing about Mr. Field's "reply" to Colonel Ingersoll is the absence therefrom of scurrility and abuse. As it shows that there is at least one gentleman in the Christian ministry, we are grateful for this open letter. That Mr. Field is, however, alone in his elevation, the only one of his kind in the Pandora's box of superstition, is as clearly shown by the comments of the religious press. And even Mr. Field, with all his strained and labored courtesy, could not sink the minister completely, but insinuates that Mr. Ingersoll is insincere and has not convinced himself by his own arguments. Acknowledging that the Colonel is an Atheist, and giving as best he can Mr. Ingersoll's reasons therefor, Mr. Field asks of Mr. Ingersoll: "Does your argument convince yourself? With all your tendency to skepticism, do you really believe that there is no moral government of the world—no power behind nature 'making for righteousness?'"

We do not imagin the time will ever come when a theologian will be thoroughly honest and fair toward an Infidel. Mr. Field's effort in that direction is commendable, and we advise him to try again. When these good qualities come to him with less striving, he can pay more attention to his argument. As in the present instance he was compelled to expend nearly all his energy in trying to be polite, his article suffers greatly in other directions.

Religious Agents.

Ever since the legislature passed the law allowing police magistrates to commit juvenil delinquents to religious institutions, these corporations hav maintained agents at all the police courts, whose business it is to influence magistrates to send them prisoners. In many courts these agents are as plenty as hotel runners in a depot. The reason for this solicitude is found in the fact that the state pays for the keeping of these unfortunates, and the institution that gets them gets also hard cash to pay its priests, and some credit for "doing good work."

These agents are a most unscrupulous lot of fellows, as professional philanthropists are apt to be, and they resort to almost any trick to get business for their pious jails. One of the worst of these cases came to light last week. Miss Mary O'Hara is a modest and industrious cigar-maker, employed by Hall, Blair & Co., Brooklyn. Friday she went to a picnic in the outskirts of the city, and at night failed to return. One of her employers went to the police headquarters and reported her disappearance. He was surprised when informed by a detectiv that the girl had been arrested on the night of the picnic while asleep on a bench in the depot of the Prospect Park and Coney Island Railroad, in Twentieth street, and the following day, when arraigned before Justice Massey for intoxication, had been sent to the House of the Good Shepherd.

The "House of the Good Shepherd" is an institution which makes a specialty of taking in abandoned women, and the employer indignantly wanted to know why the justice had sent a good girl to such a place. Justice Massey told him that the agent of the house had represented that Miss O'Hara had been corrupted by her surroundings in the cigar factory, that her employer was an immoral man, and that she had become abandoned. The employer informed the judge that the agent was a liar, that Miss O'Hara was a good and virtuous girl, and that she had been arrested by a fool officer, simply because she fell asleep in the depot while waiting for a car, that she never was drunk in her life, and only drank two glasses of beer that day. The judge at once ordered the discharge of the girl, and calling the agent before him, said to him: "I am very much surprised that you should hav made such a statement to me as you did, reflecting on the honor of Mr. Blair. I hav had this matter most thoroughly investigated, and find your statements regarding Miss O'Hara to be utterly without foundation in fact. You hav maligned an innocent man, and wronged the girl as well. In future you will hav to be very careful in your statements to me about people."

The judge need not hav been surprised. Every one who knows these religious institutions knows that the harpies they keep in courts are not at all scrupulous as to how they obtain their victims, the main object being to get them, and then get the state's money. Giving cash to religious corporations is putting a premium on religious knavery.

"The Truth of History."

The Workingmen's Advocate, published in New Haven, Conn., prints the following paragraph, giving as its authority the London Justice:

"Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, the much-lauded Infidel M.P., stood cheek by jowl with the Christian bourgeois statesmen and voted against the weekly payment bill in Parliament. Capitalists hav a stronger bond between them than so-called religion. Mammon is worshiped by both Infidel and 'Christian' British lawmakers."

In the National Reformer of July 31, 1887, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh himself tells how he stands. He says:

"The Truck Bill is now out of my hands, and in a few days I shall know what the Lords—who hav formally read it a first time—will do with it; but as I hope and believe that it will pass into law this session with but little alteration, I venture—especially in view of the reckless misrepresentation of my conduct—to explain to my readers the substantial and, as I think, great advantages this bill will confer on the working classes. The old Truck Bill of 1st and 2d William IV., cap. 37, did not extend to Ireland, and was limited to the particular trades mentioned in the 19th section of that act. The new bill—on the suggestion of Mr. Sexton, gladly adopted by myself, and readily accepted by the late attorney-general for Ireland—extends to Ireland. By a clause proposed by Mr. Sexton and accepted by me, weekly wage is made compulsory in Ireland, where the employment is by time. A further clause, proposed by Dr. G. B. Clark, prohibits longer pay than fortnightly in Scotch quarries, where the employment is by time. This I also accepted. The government wished to make weekly pay compulsory everywhere, but the opposition was too strong for us. The new bill extends to every person defined as a workman by the Employers and Workmen act, 1875."

It appears from this that Mr. Bradlaugh gladly extended the bill so as to include Ireland; that he instantly accepted the amendment making weekly payments compulsory in Ireland, and prohibiting in Scotland longer intervals of payment than two weeks; and further that the government—which in this case supported Mr. Bradlaugh—desired to make weekly payments compulsory everywhere, and would hav done so had not the opposition "been too strong for us." And when we add that Mr. Bradlaugh was the originator and introducer of this bill; that with the help of the Conservativs he has, night after night, kept Parliament in session until 3.30 o'clock in the morning that the bill might become a law; that he has received deputations without number, and patiently considered all amendments suggested; that he has exhausted his powers of persuasion in trying to reconcile the conflicting interests involved in the bill; that he has watched and defended the bill on twenty-seven parliamentary nights—it will occur to honest folk that London Justice is a very ignorant or knavish paper, and that the Workingmen's Advocate is a little hasty in its condemnation.

Infidel and Christian Scientists.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science which met in this city last week and this numbered some five or six hundred. The congress lasted over one Sunday, on which day about seventy-five of the visiting scientists got together and held a prayer-meeting at Columbia College. A lot of ministers were called in to do the praying, but many of the scientists delivered impromptu little sermons of an orthodox character. A subject of prayer alluded to by all the ministers and some of the members of the association was the ungodly character of the majority of their associates, who are Infidels, and who at that moment were enjoying themselvs by the seaside, bathing, eating fish dinners, and having as good a time generally as they knew how.

Monday, the Infidels got back to town and read in the morning papers that they had been made the object of pious solicitude. They did not like it. They regard prayer as a useless waste of energy, and while they do not consider that in itself it will work them harm, they do consider the conduct of their associates as impudent, in assuming that the pious ones are better than the heretics. Making them the objects of prayers implies moral guardianship, and this they resent.

The association embraces all creeds, but a majority are Freethinkers, though many of the latter do not care to emphasize their views upon religion. Prof. Edward S. Morse, the retiring president, has frequently publicly expressed very liberal views, and in his address the other night he scored Christianity for having opposed every advance made by science, and for having combated the scientists' deductions. One of the scientists told a World reporter that at last year's convention in Buffalo, Professor Morse made an address that was so full of Infidelity that the Catholic diocesan authorities there forbade the clergy from attending the meetings. He added that the action of the prayer-meeting was decidedly out of place, and has been commented on with something approaching severity. There are Atheists and Infidels in the association in abundance.

The action of the pietists, however, is in keeping with the arrogant claims made for their religion, according to which no man is good unless he believes certain things. What the world therefore regards as a piece of impudence, the Christians call a humble duty. The fault is not so much with the men as with their religion. If the Infidel scientists do not want to be humiliated in this way in the future, let them drop their kid-gloved indifferentism and stand up and tell the truth about Christianity.

Clark Braden.

As some of our readers do not know who Clark Braden is or why our lecturers refuse to debate with him, we present a few "testimonials" to his character which are calculated to enlighten them.

Some years ago the Campbellite or Disciple church at Perry, Ill., of which Mr. Braden was a member, issued an address to the Disciples of the country, repudiating him. The address contained the following:

"We claim, therefore, that he imposed upon our ignorance in this matter when he sought and obtained our confidence and fellowship; and that consequently he is not, and never was, rightfully a member of this congregation. . . . . Until Clark Braden sets himself right before the congregation for his conduct here, we must hold him an enemy of the church and to the cause which we plead, and as wholly unworthy of a place among us either as a member of the body or a preacher of the blessed gospel."

The Apostolic Times, a Campbellite paper, referring to one of Braden's pamphlets (they are all of the same character), said:

"We do not hesitate to declare that the author of such a tract deserves to be not only censured, but excommunicated by the congregation to which he belongs, and repudiated by the entire brotherhood, unless he gives evidence of sincere repentance."

The Christian Review, another Campbellite paper, gave him the following notice:

"In addition to the slanderous documents hurled like a fire-brand before the public, Clark Braden's conduct has been such for some time past that the church has discarded him and disavowed any fellowship with him."

When he made his infamous attack on Colonel Ingersoll, the Christian Standard, the leading paper of his denomination, published a defense of Ingersoll and refused to admit Braden's articles into its columns.

The Falls City (Neb.) Journal, from which Braden solicited a complimentary notice, gave him the following:

"We personally know Clark Braden to be an unscrupulous liar. Braden is a liar by nature, and a charlatan by profession. He exhausted his resources for knavery in this state, and is no longer recognized by his own church in the East."

The Table Rock (Neb.) Argus testifies as follows:

"From what we can learn of Mr. Braden, he is a scoundrel and a villain of the blackest dye. Christianity needs no such defenders as Clark Braden."

The Winfield (Kan.) Nonconformist says:

"It is yet to be reported that Clark Braden was ever received in a community the second time except in company of the officers with jewelry on his wrists."

The Rev. L. L. Luse, of Nebraska, says:

"I hav had business transactions with a large number of men in a great many different states—men of all characters and professions—but for pure meanness, unlimited trickery, uncalled for and foolish lying, the like of Clark Braden I hav never known."

Clark Braden is an unfit man for any gentleman to associate with. He is a moral polecat.

And It Served Him Right.

The Osage City, Kan., Free Press brings this very interesting item of news:

"Thomas J. Beets, living two miles northwest of Melvern, was brought before C. S. Martin, J. P., Monday last, and charged by George H. Dale with violation of the Sunday law, by working on that day. The defendant asked for a jury trial, which was given, and the jury brought in a verdict of 'not guilty, and that said cause of action was without probable cause.' The costs, $39.60, were taxed to the complaining witness."

If every persecutor among the Christians could be made to pay about forty dollars a persecute, the heretics of the country would be left alone. Though the average Christian loves his God devotedly, and has a monumental reverence for "God's holy Sabbath," that Christian is rarely found who will go into his pocket to back up his love and reverence.

Editorial Notes.

HERE is an important question asked by a subscriber of the Christian Advocate: "Is it necessary for a Christian to kneel by his bedside to offer his daily prayer before retiring, if the room is very cold? Will not God hear prayer if a man prays in bed under such circumstances?" The editor replies: "Persons who cease to kneel, and undertake to pray in bed, we hav reason to believe soon giv up praying. At this point temptation frequently begins." Kneeling in prayer, therefore, is an evidence of grace, while praying in bed is the first step on the road to Infidelity. It is a momentous subject, looked at in this light.

A DISPATCH to a Paris newspaper, the Republique Française, and printed here on the 4th inst., says: "The pope has decided to take part in the political elections, and has appointed a commission to canvass the clericals. He hopes to secure a strong party in the Chamber of Deputies, and to force the Quirinal to make concessions." That is to say, the pope will use his spiritual power over his superstitious followers to force them to vote for the men he selects, in order that he may compel Italy to giv to the church a small principality. Leo XIII. seems to be the most unscrupulously aggressiv pontiff that the Italians ever elected. By the way, who excommunicates a pope for doing those things which he excommunicates a priest for doing?

LAST year J. E. Remsburg delivered a lecture on the Sunday question in Baltimore. Lengthy reports of the lecture appeared in the Sun, American, and other papers, which set in motion a spirited controversy and agitation of the subject. In the American Law Review for July and August, James T. Ringgold, an able lawyer of Baltimore, comes forward with an exhaustiv paper entitled, "Sunday Idleness," in which he demonstrates the unconstitutionality and utter absurdity of our Sunday laws. "Alone among American penal statutes," he says, "the Sunday law is directed, not against a 'crime,' or an act injurious to civil society, but against a 'sin.'" He justly contends that "an established Sunday really means nothing more or less than an established church."

THE American Association for the Advancement of Science met in convention at Columbia College, this city, last week. In his address, Prof. E. W. Morse, of Salem, Mass., the retiring president, paid this tribute to the Christian church: "The widespread public interest in Darwinism arose from the fact that every theory and every fact advanced in proof of the derivativ origin of species applied with equal force to the origin of man as one of the species. The public interest has been continually excited by the consistent energy with which the church, Catholic and Protestant alike, has inveighed against the dangerous teachings of Darwin. Judging by centuries of experience, as attested by unimpeachable historical records, it is safe enough for an intelligent man, even if he knows nothing about the facts, to promptly accept as truth any generalization of science which the church delares to be false, and, conversely, to repudiate with equal promptness, as false, any interpretation of the behavior of the universe which the church adjudges to be true. In proof of this sweeping statement, one has only to read the imposing collection of facts brought together by Dr. White, the distinguished president of Cornell University, which are embodied in his work, entitled 'The Warfare of Science,' as well as two additional chapters on the same subject which hav lately appeared in the Popular Science Monthly."

THE Prohibition campaign was earnestly conducted in Texas. The Prohibition women were in dead earnest, and worked like experienced politicians At Denison, relates the Sunday Gazetteer, near every polling-place refreshment stands were erected, from which sandwiches, coffee, lemonade, and melons were given out. Above the stands were the words, painted on long pieces of white cloth: "For God, and Home, and Nativ Land, Free Lunch." Some of the electioneering of the women provoked funny results. Approaching a meek-looking darkey, one of the most prominent of the Temperance Union ladies said to him: "You are going to vote this ticket, are you not? You wouldn't sell your vote for a cigar and a drink of whisky?" and received a lesson in the science of dividing tweedle-dee from tweedle-dum, when the darkey replied: "Well, missus, I don't speck I will; but I jes's leave sell it for a cigar an' a drink ob whisky as fo' a biscuit an' a piece ob fat meat." At another polling-place a sanctimonious-looking negro was besieged by a zealous member of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and importuned to vote the way of the total abstainers. He silenced her with the following piece of religious philosophy: "It wah Ebe dat tempted Adam to commit de fust sin, but I'm not er gwine to be tooken in like Adam, an' yo' can't indoose me to poll er wrong vote on dis occashun." But, perhaps, the most cruel rebuff received by any of the fair politicians was administered to one by a young man who looked as though he might belong to the Young Men's Christian Association, but who turned out to be a wolf in sheep's clothing. "You will vote for us," cried the lady, rushing up to him as he stood one side watching the crowd at the polls. "I am not old enough to vote," was the reply. "Yes, you are; I know you are old enough to vote." "Well, if I'm old enough to vote, I am certainly old enough to know how to vote." The young lady said he was a mean thing, and didn't speak to him again all day.

Letters from Friends.

DANSVILLE, Aug. 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Peter Wilklow is dead. In the death of Mr. Wilklow Dansville has lost an earnest Liberal and one of its most upright citizens. J. KENNEY.

STERLING, ILL., Aug. 2, 1887.

THE TRUTH SEEKER Co., Gentlemen: You are sending copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER to my father's address, Martin Baer, Sterling, Ill. Now, every respectable sheet stops when subscriptions expire. Please keep them. Father's subscription expired in June. Father died in May, and we hav no use for them. For the dollar you would send souls to hell. Mind, there is a day of reckoning, for you hav made the life of my mother miserable, who is a Christian lady without reproach. You put me in mind of the dog who runs around licking sores, filling your infamous sheet with what ministers do, and secure followers for their labor. If you are such saints why don't you send your lectures free and not stand at the front door and claim so much for hearing nothing? What would you not do for gold?

J. H. BAER.

LEXINGTON, Mo., Aug. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Colman tells of eight hundred vermin-ridden, starving little niggers in the hands of their Yankee deliverers—a sight that never was paralleled in all the days of slavery. She seems to wonder why the Federal government didn't hang Jefferson Davis, "the arch-traitor." Yes, why didn't they, when no arm could save him, and he was helpless in their power? I wish to tell her why. Because he was not an arch nor any other kind of a traitor. Because the chief-justice of the Supreme Court held similar views to those of Mr. Davis on the right of a state to secede. Because when the states broke up the old confederation which had been declared "perpetual" they formed the present Union with that word out.

When we and our passions are dead the historian of the future will read that it took 2,800,000 men for years to conquer Jefferson Davis and his 700,000 men, and he will write—"Greater than Cæsar."

The moral is that if Rationalists intend to carry on a war against superstition, they would better let things alone on which they don't agree. GEORGE WILSON.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., July 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You say you do not see what good Mrs. Slenker could expect to do by the story of "The Girl and the Dog." I do. A sound morality must be based on knowledge. The very first step toward it is to get out of the way the hypocritical morality of organized consecrated ignorance. Nothing can be more effectual to this end than to expose the enormous wickedness festering under the very thin veil of social sham. But, besides this, it seems that Mrs. Slenker's interest in "The Girl and the Dog" was mainly of a physiological nature, and that the story was not published, in the ordinary sense, by her, at least, but only circulated among a few persons who were professed investigators of a scientific question. Thus, the prosecution, should it be successful, marks a new and alarming step forward to the movement in favor of ignorance. It becomes every Liberal to defeat this conspiracy against knowledge and liberty if he can; and I think I see several points which Mrs. Slenker's legal friends can make good use of.

One is that the alleged obscene matter was all contained in sealed envelopes, and marked private. I think this clearly removes it from the scope of the Comstock law, atrociously tyrannical as that is. In a demurrer on this point, United States Judge Deady ruled that a private letter, though most obscene, and sent with intent to annoy, was not within the statute.

Another fatal flaw in the indictment is that it does not specify the obscenity complained of, but says the whole matter is too lewd, obscene, and lascivious to be placed upon the records of the court. This paltry device for trying the prisoner on an indefinit charge has been held unlawful in the following typical cases: The case of New York against Victoria C. Woodhull, the prosecution having refused to specify the obscenity, was declared out of court. In the case of the United States against Ezra H. Heywood, tried before Judge Clark, the latter required all the obscenity to be specified. In the case of the United States against Ezra H. Heywood, tried before Judge Nelson, the prosecution, attempting to evade specification on the plea that the obscene matter was too bad to go on the record, was overruled. In the English case of the Queen against Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant, the defendants, being convicted, appealed on this point, and the higher court thereon reversed the finding of the lower.

The alleged obscenity, also, hardly falls within Jeffreys Benedict's definition of the term. The dog story is adapted to excite not lascivious thoughts and emotions, but rather disgust, horror, and repugnance. It was doubtless to cover just such cases that the "disgusting" clause was added to the New York statute. But that is not yet United States law. C. L. JAMES.

GREAT VALLEY, Aug. 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER has been a weekly visitor to me since the 15th of April unpaid for, yet always constant, and welcomed by me, always laden with the choicest viands and the most wholesome mental food. Hence it stands me in hand to pay up and in advance, that I may assimilate its wholesome extracts and vital principles to the building up of the physical and spiritual man—feeling at the same time that the doctor, nurse, and undertaker were paid and that my friends would only be to the small expense of erecting a cheap and simple tombstone should they wish to cherish for a little time the memory of so fragil and fleeting a worm as I. Hence you will find inclosed $6—$5 for the paper and $1 for Elmina's Defense Fund. And now I will inform the many patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER and yourself, as well as the many friends of the orthodox faith, that on the morning of the Fourth of July last, our eldest daughter, Mary, aged twenty-six years, passed away. She had been a victim for many years to that insidious, lingering, and dreaded disease, epilepsy. Our good orthodox friends no doubt would say God in his great mercy saw fit to take her to himself; at last she is at rest, and all is well. I hope so, dear friends. But the great query with me is why God couldn't hav taken her on the occasion of her first hundred fits, and not hav waited to inflict her with one thousand. But, friends, it's a relief to father and mother to feel she is out of her trouble, and yet sad to know that she is absent. A. F. ALBRIGHT.

TULARE, CAL., July 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There is one very important reason why Mrs. Slenker should be sustained and defended with all the energy, means, and force that Liberals can contribute. The trials of Heywood, Bennett, and a long list of others may hav resulted in a general way in defeat, but when strengthening the cause of mental liberty is considered, it is a victory to us by thousands added to our side. Heretofore it has been hard to raise funds for defense, and those who hav stood to the front, already poor, hav been reduced to destitution. The great increase in numbers already renders the burden of defense light, when so many are seen to respond promptly to the defense fund of Aunt Elmina. With the increased circulation of Liberal journals, and their ability and determination to battle for the leaders, I see nothing on our part to be discouraged about. If Comstockism sees anything cheering in such victories as it has won, it must be because it is blind to the reverse side of the issue. Nothing rejoices a good Christian like Comstock so much as to reduce his victim to poverty. A liberal contribution of funds for defense, cheerfully given, will take much from the satisfaction of his prosecutions. I see no reason why, if Mrs. Slenker's case is fully and fairly presented, she shall not be acquitted. One such victory to us would be worth ten times the cost.

Every exposure through the public press of the means by which Comstock decoys victims for prosecution arouses the indignation of all right-minded people, and after each prosecution several influential journals and most of their readers take up the defense of free speech and free mails. We hav nothing to lose in this fight, and Mrs. Slenker's courage givs us a cheer for victory before the battle. E. M. DEWEY.

BEARDSTOWN, ILL., July 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I lecture on Freethought at Centre next Sunday. I hav a regular appointment about eight miles from here in this county, and the good, liberal, and unbigoted Christians hav threatened to rotten-egg me; not for "blasphemy," but because, since I began to go there, the young people hav forsaken the church to attend my lectures. The old ones hav said, if I would only come at night, they would hav ready some suitable eggs. I simply told them that if they would kindly put up $10, I would be pleased to come prepared with rubber boots, coat, and cap—an egg-proof coat of mail. As yet they hav not accepted my proposition. Five years since I was ousted from the pulpit of the Congregational church for preaching the second probation, which a respectable portion of this sect has since adopted as a shibboleth. I hav got still further out of the theological wilderness, and hav since been hammering away till now this same church and community are literally honeycombed with Infidelity. They find it "sweeter than the honey in the honeycomb." This church has seriously considered the proposition to throw overboard the musty old Puritan creed which I refused to preach. But many of the members are in the dark womb of the church, waiting an era to be born into a world of better light. It is their gestation period now, and they will, I am quite sure, come to the brighter birthright and light of Liberalism. I giv you this bit of personal expeience as corroboration of the general principle so uniquely told in "Tales Out of School." In my experience of over twenty years, I could relate very many similar incidents, all "true as gospel."

R. FLETCHER GRAY, M.D. ("ZOA TOPSIS").

LEON, IA., Aug. 2, 287.

MR. EDITOR: The Leon Secular Society has held four meetings during the summer, which hav been quite well attended, and a great deal of interest was manifested in the work.

The society secured Miss Katie Kehm, of Ottumwa, Iowa, to deliver a lecture at each of the last two meetings, which were held July 10th and 17th.

In her first lecture, "The Religion of Humanity," she contrasted the teachings of Christianity with those of Liberalism, and dwelt at length on the blackened character of the defenders of the church. She spoke of many of the needed reforms of the times, of the aim and methods of Liberalism, and the glorious achievements accomplished by Infidelity.

Her second lecture, "The Influence of Christianity Upon the Minds of the Rising Generation," is full of good and practical thoughts, showing the lecturer has an activ mind well stored with information. She shows the necessity of parents teaching their children the principles of Liberalism, and not allowing their minds to become clouded with superstition, as early impressions are difficult to erase. She animates her hearers with the love of liberty and home.

Miss Kehm is a cultivated woman, a humanitarian in the true sense of the word, and a brave and outspoken worker in the Liberal ranks, and for the cause of humanity. She is an earnest and forcible speaker, with a clear and distinct voice, and graceful in her delivery. We hope to hav her lecture again before the society, and would cheerfully recommend her to other societies.

At our next meeting, Aug. 21st, the president of the society, Mr. A. E. Hall, will lecture on "World Making." Our afternoon exercises are varied with music, recitations, short speeches, and occasionally a paper.

MRS. J. W. LONG,
Sec. Leon Secular Society.

ALCOVE, NEB., July 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There are many Infidels here, and if I can succeed in getting them to take your paper, we can hire a lecturer and hav a boom, as they are having in Coos county, Oregon. If we were organized, I am certain we could hav a Jamieson, Remsburg, or Bell almost every month in the year. I would write to Mr. Bell now, while he is making the rounds of Nebraska, but all the Infidels here seem to know nothing about our lecturers, and of course all the stir to arouse a community cannot be made by one person. But if you see fit you may say to the subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that if they will send me their names I will find a timber culture, homestead, or a preëmption that is contestable for them for a locator's fee, said fee to be put in the hands of some Infidel for the purpose of hiring the services of a lecturer in this part of the country. We hav a nice country. I will also answer any question they may see fit to ask in reference to the country or the government land laws. I will try only to find abandoned claims, so there will be no difficulty in the contest's being a successful one. I know of one claim at present, worth $800, open to contest, within about four miles of a thriving railroad town of about six hundred inhabitants. Locators charge $10 to $20 for locating; contest fees will be from $10 to $40; filing fee, from $2 on a preëmption to $14 on a homestead, and the same ($14) on a timber culture. I will say right here that it is not necessary to liv on a timber culture. If other pursuits are wanted, I will be pleased to hand names to the different boards of trade in the vicinity.

I would like to stir up the Infidels here. The reverends are always ready, if anyone has the least to say about an Infidel, to say, "You can expect nothing better from a follower of Bob Ingersoll."

Allow me to congratulate you on your answer to American Institute of Civics, entitled, "Firstly and Secondly," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 9th. HENRY W. MATTLEY.

LEXINGTON, KY., Aug. 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Let us not forget that shortly after the death of Constantine power was given to the Christian priesthood to lessen and modify that of the sovereign, but Justinian made Rome the center of religious power. We know the result. He ought to hav known better, but he had not the wisdom of Jefferson or Thomas Paine. Common sense ought to revolt at the idea of being ruled by a ghostly power, and chasing phantoms for a living. I know of a young man who was turned out of doors by a maiden aunt because he denied the divinity of Christ. He remarked that ten old maids could not make a fool of him; he would rather liv on a crust and be independent. But to discover the depth of infamy, talk to a clergyman's son. One admitted that his father did not believe what he preached. He declared that "pardon blotted out sin." But I know hearts that no lawyer could soften—no God. Think of a man suddenly bounding into heaven and becoming an angel! There is no culture without experience. A dog might bound into a library without understanding the books he finds there. But to return to the minister's son. His plans for the future were actually fiendish. His denial of well-known facts was criminal in the extreme; his language would be called scurrilous, for he insulted me repeatedly. In the hight of my blasphemy I quoted Shaftesbury: "Reason is a sea to the weak; faith clings to every twig."

One good Baptist brother here says, "Christ never made a mistake." I think he made several—monstrous, shameful, unreasonable, and unnatural. His life is a record of an impostor, artful and inconsistent; his language a tissue of bold effrontery, cruel and immoral suggestions, requests, and commands. His prophecies were the greatest mistakes of all. They were not fulfilled. Call him a reformer! Well, he was about like John Wesley, who took the part of the English king against the colonists. How they both dwindle down before such men as Wilberforce, Ingersoll, Lincoln, and, perhaps, Henry George and McGlynn! Such men will drown monopolists in a deluge of love till the human race will turn from them with loathing and horror, till homes for industrious poor will rise like fairy palaces. Men will imitate their purity and goodness until sin and poverty and misery, bloated guilt, malice, sensuality, avarice, and injustice will be only regarded as horrible and grotesque dreams of the past. ALHAZA.

CORRY, PA., Aug. 1, 1887.

SECRET BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES COMPARED WITH CHURCHES. WHICH MOST USEFUL.

Recently a convention from nearly all denominations of Protestant clergymen met in Chicago and denounced all secret societies. The Catholics are doing the same thing. A great teacher said the standard of whether a thing was good or bad was its fruits.

The question is, Which is the most useful, the church or these societies? What are their fruits and relativ cost and benefits? There lately resided in Corry a physician who paid to the Methodist church regularly a considerable sum, aggregating thousands. A few years before his death he paid a less sum to a benevolent secret society. After his decease his widow was called on for money to help pay a debt the church had incurred while he was a member, and she actually paid $5 from her scanty widow's mite, and the stock in the church that cost them over $5,000 is not worth a penny.

The benevolent society, to which they had paid far less than to the church, paid the widow over $2,000.

Four heads of families hav passed away in this city within a few months, whose families hav been saved from dependence by secret benevolent societies.

In no case hav I heard of any church doing such a thing. The churches of our time are for the poor in the sense in which sheep-shears are for the sheep.

However much the clergy may recommend the sheep to pay into and trust the church, they don't, not a penny.

Nearly all of the more astute preachers are insured in these secret benevolent societies that they denounce. Whoever else is fleeced by paying into a church, they are not; they know each other too well.

What does the church return for the immense sums paid, chiefly to support ministers? In no part of the country can a church-member be distinguished from a non-church-member. No one thinks of asking what a man's faith is before trusting him. There are good men and women in all churches who are so in spite of, not on account of, church membership, and there are just as good, and some better, non-church-members.

The church of our age has produced no men equal to Stephen Girard, Peter Cooper, Abraham Lincoln, or Horace Greeley, all of whom obtained their nobility outside of churches.

It used to be thought that the way to heaven was through the church. Intelligent persons hav discovered the way to heaven is open to everyone alike; that the priests hav no corner on the way, or any knowledge about it whatever, except what all of us hav. They don't pretend to hav any witnesses from heaven. In this respect they are not as logical as the Spiritualists, who bring their witnesses into full, plain view. The divine father of all has stamped in our souls the love of justice. Churches are only machinery. They are not religion any more than plows or hoes are agriculture. They no more make the love of religion than bakers or meat-dealers make the love of bread and meat, or the sheep-shearers make wool. Their dogmas may hav been useful in the childhood of the race. The beliefs of the Dark Ages, when the most of our orthodox theology came into being, is for this reason not adapted to our age any more than a child's spelling-book is adapted to a Newton, or the clothes of a babe are adapted to manhood. Religion is eternal. Never was it so common. Never had it so much care for the unfortunate. The secret benevolent societies are protecting the weak and helping the helpless. The best men and women in the churches will help.

MR. EDITOR: If interesting to your readers, I will in a future communication giv the history of a few church banking and savings schemes, whereby over six millions has been filched from the faithful, and more than twenty suicides resulted. G. F. LEWIS.

COLUMBUS, O., Aug. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The state Saengerfast held at this place the 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st was a signal success, and one after which it would be well for many more cities to copy.

First, the decoration far exceeded that of many other occasions, scarcely excepting the Fourth of July, and was in many respects far superior to that of the Fourth. It was much quieter, more civil, much more intelligently carried on, and in every respect a glorious occasion. Parades took place each day, headed by some of the best bands in the state, from Cleveland, Cincinnati, Akron, Canton, and many other cities.

All was lovely, and all thought the goose hanging high till there escaped a breath of the fact that the Sunday parade was to excel all others and be the grandest jubilee of all, when Washington Gladden, the gentleman who paid a tribute of respect to Mr. Beecher, arose in his sepulcher and blasphemed the event as one most execrable, and solicited to hav the intentions changed. This was seconded by Rev. Hutsinpillar, the little Irish pilot of the Third avenue M. E. church. However, the Sunday arrangements were carried out, and the parade formed at the corner of Main and High streets; mounted horsemen in uniform leading the procession; then the different companies on foot, with their respectiv brass bands from different portions of the state; carriages of officials; then the city fire department to the extent of some eight or ten chemical engins, hosecarts, and hook and ladder companies; infantry, and, last but not least, the Columbus police procession, buggies and carriages, etc.

It was an immense treat for the populace, who are not able to get off on a week day to witness such spectacles, and they enjoyed it. The streets along which the procession marched was lined with thousands of spectators all anxious to see over the heads of their fellow-creatures, and ready on the slightest occasion to "whoop."

Everybody that went out was out for a good time, and, with the exception of, perhaps, a few, had it, notwithstanding the unusually hot, sultry atmosphere. One drum-major, so unfortunate as to drive too much in the sun, was sun-struck, and in a dangerous condition when last heard from, but it did not frighten folks from the park in which it occurred. One hundred and fifty kegs of beer were donated by the enormously large brewing companies of the city to the different delegations visiting the place from other cities, to assist in defraying their expenses, and no one knows just how many more were furnished at a reasonable figure. Now, this was all on Sunday. Its being a Sunday picnic was the grindstone that angered the Christian and drove him to think thoughts of the assassination of American liberty; and he thought them. Not a few. It did not, though, prevent the picnic.

The Freethinkers had to rejoice that, when intoxicating drink is taken and the example set by Christians themselvs, they could not hinder the dissipation taking place in such a magnificent manner on his, the Christian's, own dear Sabbath. As to my own opinions, one American liberty should be destroyed, and that is the manufacture of intoxicating drinks. I am what may be called il-Liberal in this respect. Still, with my bitter hatred of liquor generally, I think that when Christians drink it in their most holy churches, others should drink it in defiance of Christianity on their righteous one only holy day.

Our mayor's being a Freethinker and every inch a gentleman, also of German extraction, was the cause of the fire department and the police, infantry, etc., participating in the event. He also delivered an excellent opening address, and welcomed the guests to the city with all the hospitality that could be conjured. It may be considered most truly a victory scored for Freethought. MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER, as all persons should, grows better as it grows older. The cartoons are doing, I think, an excellent work in destroying old theological dogmas. Your ideas expressed in reference to the Chicago Anarchists accord with my sentiments very well. Aunt Elmina is having trouble with the Comstock tribe. I pity her, for this is all of life to her with her Materialistic belief. I hope she will come out conquerer at the end of the law-suit, for if this is all of life it should certainly be made enjoyable.

KENT, O., Aug. 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your valuable paper but two years, but in that time hav learned to appreciate the many good sayings contained therein. While I see in it many articles setting forth ideas that I consider erroneous, I think it my duty well to consider, both pro and con, all ideas advanced by others (for how else could we grow in knowledge?) before condemning them, even the most radical views on all topics. I try to learn the true path in which I would best travel. I know it impossible for all men to think alike on all subjects, as no two are born and reared under the same influences, but I want to think all men naturally honest, and feel it my duty to respect everyone's opinions, if honestly expressed.

When I take into consideration that the people of the United States are a mixed people, a people from nearly every nation and climate in the world, bringing with them the ideas, customs, habits, and education of many lands, those who hav been downtrodden by church and state in their mother countries, and who hav emigrated to the "land of the free" with dreams and expectations so exalted that, even if America was a paradise, their ideal fancy could not be supplied satisfactorily, I think it the duty of each to be liberal one toward another. I am not surprised to see orthodox bigots in our land, as they are bigots both by heredity and education, being taught that it is a sin to listen to reason, or to think differently from the way in which their forefathers thought two thousand years ago. I am surprised to see so many bigots in our Freethought ranks; to see those who advocate the growth of the mind say, This is so and that is not so, when the facts are that neither can be actually proved either true or false. Brethren (I mean all mankind), do you ever stop to think that what we actually know is but little as compared with what we guess at?

Skepticism and unbelief are the stepping-stones to the temple of knowledge, and were it not that our minds are in continual doubt, we would be yesterday, to-day, and forever the same. But we never can arrive at that point of immutability until perfection can perch upon our banners of understanding. What we think true to-day may plainly manifest itself not true to-morrow. Could I but persuade the world to combine to seek for the truth; then if I could but persuade mankind to do what they know to be true, I would rest at ease. While my mind is forced to liv within the tissues of this material, and until that great principle that we know not of has evolved me by its laws from my present place among the created to a higher stage of more mature life, where the tissues and functions of my mental house shall be better adapted to permit my mind to advance upward toward the pinnacle of understanding, then, and only then, can we know the truth. Then—hav I said then? no, not as long as our minds are immature, and not until that great law of mental growth has lost its vital force. Do not ask me when that will be, for I hav never seen the end of infinity. How few there are among us who stop to inquire what is really right and what wrong, even if they know which of these two they should choose? How few there are who will say No to their physical wants and desires that they know they should not gratify! How natural it is for a man who has learned to love rum or tobacco to say, "It doesn't hurt me; it may be wrong to use them, but I am not going to deprive myself of what I want to please some one else!" Thou slave; thou who considerest thyself one of the higher order of mammalia, and one who boastest of thy superiority, and classed as man; one who is calculated to be tender and affectionate; one who is looked upon as a protector of the weak; who would shed his blood for the sake of his country, his child, his home; thou who art looked upon to set beacon lights to mark the way for the young and less learned that they stray not—is it such a one that has fallen a slave to appetite? Is it such a one whose physical enslaves his mental person? O thou weak-minded! thou who shouldst be strong and a governor are now weak and governed, a slave bound with chains that cannot be broken! All I hav said about the use of rum and tobacco can be said of all the known evils that beset man—envy, jealousy, revenge, and many natural and acquired habits and passions of the flesh. Will we subdue them? Will we break the chains and gain our liberty?

A highly respected attorney at Independence, Kan., although a hard drinker all his life, signed the Murphy pledge, but his appetite for strong drink had so fastened its fangs into his flesh that he could not, so he thought, leave off the "damning cup," and he broke his pledge several times, but confessed and was shown mercy by his friends, until at last he said he could not keep from drinking, and with tears in his eyes would entreat the young men, "For God's sake, young man, quit drinking while you can see me, an old broken-down bloat, a slave to rum!" Has not this same thing, in substance, been repeated on the gallows by those who had fallen and become murderers by the passion of jealousy, revenge, etc.?

Yesterday I chanced to sit on a seat in a railroad car opposit a young man who is to be hung November 16th in Columbus, O., for the killing of a young lady a Youngstown, O.—jealousy, I think, the cause. My prayer and greatest desire is that education and freedom of thought be given unstinted to our people, seasoned with a spirit of love for each other, love for the truth, love for justice, love for the welfare of all, love to set none but the best examples before the young. Many believe in no hereafter, and if this belief is true, how can we do better than to enter heaven while here? Yet we must remember that we hav many—to us—disgusting sights in our daily walks that we must not allow to annoy us, but make the best of them we can under the circumstances, and we will be much more happy than otherwise. We must encounter the Anarchist, the Nihilist, the Socialist, also the Deist, Atheist, the Catholic, and Protestant, etc., none of whom hav the same political or spiritual views, and we can only liv happy by granting to others all we ask for ourselvs—the right to think as our reason teaches. All we can do is to educate the mind as fast as possible until reason can obtain evidence from all the available sources of actual knowledge. Until such time let us hav charity for each other and combine in one government for the best mutual interests of the whole. A. D. SWAN.

CLEVELAND, O., Aug. 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I will say a word, if you please, on the language question. A language cannot be made to order, it must grow. Language has its biology, its physiology, its pathology, and its therapeutics, the same as do persons, of whom language is an attribute. The sounds which one hears and speaks are determined by the generic conditions and repeated actions or habits of the organs of hearing and speaking, and by the fineness and refinement of the controling nerves and brain. This will account for dialects, and until there is a uniformity in people's throats, mouths, ears, and brains, there can be no universal language, and no entire uniformity in the use of any one language.

As a good illustration of the attempts to invent a patent language I append an article from the Chicago Herald, supposed to be written at a date some centuries hence:

ADVOCATING THE SALAD LANGUAGE.

Central Opera House was crowded last evening with the wealth, beauty, and fashion of Chicago to hear a lecture on the universal language by the celebrated Prof. Cæsar Pompeius, D.D., LL.D., of the university of Leopoldville, Congo. Professor Pompeius has delivered this lecture in all the principal cities of the world, and has gained an immense army of converts to his theory. He is the most learned man in the world, and is a full-blooded Congonese, though it is said his ancestors were Americo-Africans, as his name might indicate. He commenced by saying that the idea of a common form of speech for all the nations of the world was not new. It had been entertained by great men in almost every age of the world since the confusion of tongues at Babel. The learned Dr. Slaukenbergious, whose memoirs appear in the writings of Tristram Shandy, was a strong advocate of it. So was Leibnitz. So was Lord Monboddo.

A society of learned men commenced a movement in that direction in the year 1900. But the efforts had heretofore been to invent a new language and compel mankind to accept it, an obvious impossibility. The idea of smelting all existing languages into one, by mere heat and attrition, had not seemed to hav occurred to the learned Thebans, who had heretofore undertaken the mission. Professor Pompeius said that thought had come to him when he was engaged in the great work of establishing infant schools for young gorillas throughout Africa. The education of the gorilla has been the triumph of the twentieth century, and it was accomplished by means of the universal, or "'salad language,' as I prefer to call it," said the professor, "for it is a mixture of everything. It is extremely simple, and yet it has the commercial power of the English, the courtliness of the French, the philosophical adaptation of the German, the pompous euphony of the Spanish, and the sweetness of the Italian. We take from each language those words or phrases that are the simplest and the most easily retained in the memory, for the use of language is but an effort of memory. If an animal could only memorize the words, it would soon learn to speak them. That was the very first point in our gorilla schools, and when we accomplished that the work was done. I yet expect to see a gorilla president of the great state of Congo.

"Choosing the simplest words and eliminating the hard ones and the bad constructions, we obtain a language which every person, I might say every creature, ought to speak and write with fluency. Take this rule, the traditional rule of all grammars: La grammar e l'arte of sprichablar y scribir conectement. Who can fail to understand that? Take our system of conjugations: Ich bin, tu es, he is siamo, este, sono—the very simplicity of it startles one into accepting it at once. Would any young lady fail to understand a gentleman who should say to her, 'Volete, permit me offrir mia corazon and ma main?' She would refer him to her mother without delay." This forcible illustration on the part of the professor had an immediate effect on the audience.

The professor continued his illustrations and his argument for nearly an hour, holding the rapt attention of his hearers the whole time. Bringing the lecture to a close, he said: "The salad language is the language of diplomacy the language of business, the language of love, the language of poetry. It is the natural language, and exists in the constitution of man. Even the wonderful Shakspere is improved and adorned by it, as I will show you in my closing illustration:

"All le monde ist scena
Und alle the men et femmes only spielers;
Tous ont their exits y gehen wieder ab,
Et chacun in su temps spiels molte parts,
Che drame being seven actos. Primero l'enfant.
Mewling y sprudelt in le nourrice arms;
Puis el whining babe. Con sa bundel
Y shining morgantlicht rampe comme caracol
Contre-cœur zu school. Con esto l'amoroso,
Soupirant como furnace, mit triste canzone
Made auf su liebsters' eyebrows."

The professor continued the quotation to the end, and the lecture closed amid great applause. He held a reception at the Grand Atlantic afterward. It is understood that the trustees of the University of Chicago will at once endow a chair for a professorship of the salad language, and it is thought that Professor Pompeius will not be able to refuse the usual Chicago inducements.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Potter.

In youth I read this story of a potter:
He wrought with careful fingers day by day,
Until a vase of lovely form was molded
And shapened delicately in the clay.

Then he beheld a higher type of beauty,
And broke the vessel he had finished there,
To fashion with untiring zeal and labor
Another form more graceful and more fair.

So year by year, at early dawn beginning,
He labored till the night made labor vain,
And always broke each form of dainty molding,
The pure ideal of his dream to gain.

At last he shaped an urn of rarest beauty,
With cypress drooping and a half-veiled rose,
And, flushed with joy, looked up to heaven in triumph,
When, lo! a sudden glory on him glows.

One hand he lifted to the radiant vision,
And with the other swept the urn aside,
And suddenly, without a warning,
The urn was broken and the potter died.

"Fool!" was the name the story-writer gave him
Who of a long life left no record here,
Yet bore he witness of a heavenly vision
With the pure passion of an ancient seer.

Naught that he fashioned to his soul seemed worthy
Of the diviner beauty he had known;
He left no record of a life of failure
Upon whose face the parting glory shone.

So I, sweet friends! I will not leave behind me
A thing of dust to show my toil and pain,
But in the rapture of the higher vision
Sweep back my songs, and true to that remain.

A Letter from the Editor.

ONSET BAY, MASS., August 10, 1887.

MY DEAR FRIENDS: You hav been in my mind many times since arriving at this popular and lovely summer resort, and to-night I feel "impressed," as the mediums say, to write you a letter. Our little family is charmingly domiciled in a wee birds'-nest of a cottage on a street just a little way off from the "plank walk," or, to speak more pretentiously, the South Boulevard. On the right is a good view of the blue waters of the bay, backed by a grove of fine young oaks. On the left, and adjoining our cottage, is another grove of young pines and oaks intermingled, under the branches of which swing two stout hammocks. West Central avenue runs past the grove, and on either side, like pretty martin boxes, are cunning little summer homes, peopled by good-hearted men and women, little children, cats, and dogs, and squirrels in the trees outside. They all enjoy life immensely, or appear to, especially the squirrels. I guess they do, without any make-believe. Certainly, the hours slip by very quickly and delightfully, and night comes altogether too soon.

Of course, you know this place is, besides being a summer watering-place, a Spiritualistic camp-ground, and "Spiritual" meetings are held here nearly every day. Then, too, there are many people here who are known as mediums, and profess to hold personal conversations with those whom we call dead, who not only declare they see such, but show them to others in bodily form. While enjoying the natural beauties so lavishly displayed on all sides, you would naturally suppose I would try and find out all that is possible in regard to the various phenomena of this philosophy of Spiritualism. So I do; but, although seeing and hearing a great deal, and some things that I do not really understand, as yet I am not positivly convinced that when one is dead he livs again. We all wish to believe it if it is true, but we do not like to believe a falsehood is a fact. At least, I do not. This is apparent—that there are those who simulate, who pretend they are ghosts, when they are simply flesh-and-blood people like you and others. It is a dreadfully wicked thing to do, but it is done, and I know it. They who do these things are tricksters, frauds, jugglers, who impose upon the credulous for the sake of getting money without earning it.

You say such persons ought to be hanged. Well, I don't know about that, but I would be glad to see them banished from civilization, and as soon as possible. It is not for me to say that these fraudulent operators do not indicate something genuin somewhere, and it is that which I am seeking. When I find it, I will let you know. But it will hav to come in perfect accord with reason and every-day common sense, so that I may be sure that there is no humbug about it.

The children of Onset are among its most pleasant features. Out of school they run romp, dance, and sing, play hide-and-seek with birds and butterflies, gather wild flowers on land, shells on the strand, and frolic with the little fishes in the water. I miss some sweet faces that I met here in other seasons. Little Flossie Cassell is in California, and some other in different places. But Dora Butts is here, and Bessie Chase, too. Oscar C. runs about in his sailor suit, and Eliza Alexander still sells cakes and jelly rolls, that her mamma knows so well how to make.

The other afternoon some children had a concert in the kitchen of a cottage just across the way. Maude and Georgie Gardner and Hattie Minzie were the principal performers, while Allie Minzie acted as manager. They had a table covered with a blanket for a platform, and the girls, in long dresses, queer hats, and funny sashes, sang and recited very prettily. The audience was not large, but very enthusiastic. The price of admission to this concert was two cents, and all felt that they had received their money's worth. I am sure I did for one.

An hour later. The night is a gem of loveliness. The lights twinkle all about amid the trees, in cosy summer homes, the sky is thickly studded with stars of wonderful brightness, and the air is just cool enough to be comfortable. I hav been sitting on the piazza listening to cornet music from some one in a boat out on the bay, and hav just come inside to say that I wish you were all here to enjoy this favored spot with me, so I could whisper good-night to you all and pleasant dreams. Your sincere friend,

S. H. W.

Memory Gems.

From the Works of Thomas Paine. To be learned and recited by the children.

Titles are but nicknames, and every nickname is a title.

Persecution is not an original feature in any religion; but it is always the strongly-marked feature of all law-religions, or religions established by law.

Such is the irresistible nature of truth, that all it asks, and all it wants, is the liberty of appearing.

The more perfect civilization is, the less occasion has it for government, because the more does it regulate its own affairs, and govern itself.

All the great laws of society are laws of nature.

All hereditary government is in its nature tyranny.

Experience in all ages, and in all countries, has demonstrated that it is impossible to control nature in her distribution of mental powers.

The representativ system takes society and civilization for its basis; nature, reason, and experience for its guide.

Nations can hav no secrets; and the secrets of courts, like those of individuals, are always their defects.

When, in countries that are civilized we see age going to the workhouse, and youth to the gallows, something must be wrong in the system of government.

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman.

What we obtain too cheap we esteem too lightly.

I love the man that can smile in trouble, that can gather strength from distress, and grow brave by reflection.

'Tis the business of little minds to shrink; but he whose heart is firm, and whose conscience approves his conduct, will pursue his principles unto death.

A traitor is the foulest fiend on earth.

Correspondence.

CAMPTOWN, Aug. 8, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I think the Children's Corner is very nice. My grandpa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER; he livs next house below us. I was ten last July. I hav two brothers older than I, John and Fred. Fred has "Apples of Gold." We liv in the hotel. Mamma has five birds. I think the pictures are very nice in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours truly, GEORGE M. REED.

Liberal Lesson Leaves.

PHYSICAL SERIES.—NO. 7. FORCE AND MOTION (CONTINUED).

48. Newton's Laws of Motion.—Newton's three laws of motion are the following:

I. "Every body continues in its state of rest or of uniform motion in a straight line, except in so far as it may be compelled by impressed forces to change that state."

II. "Change of motion is proportional to the impressed force, and takes place in the direction of the straight line in which the force acts."

III. "To every motion there is always an equal and contrary reaction; or, the mutual actions of any two bodies are equal and oppositly directed in the same straight line."

The first of these laws is owing to the property of inertia (11). The second enables us to measure forces, and also shows that the effect of a force is the same, whether it acts on a large or small body, and whether the body be in motion or at rest. The third we will consider later.

49. Remarks. — Force produces or alters momentum. Any force acting on any body at rest, but free to move, will set the body in motion, and impart to it a momentum which depends upon the force and the time it acts.

The momentum imparted by a given force in a given time is the same, no matter what size the body it acts upon may be. In some cases a force may be applied to a body without moving it; the reason is that the force is opposed by another force equal to the first, which is therefore neutralized. Thus, when we try to lift a body which is too heavy, we fail to move it because the body is attracted to the earth by the force of gravitation, but if the lifting force be increased so that it exceeds the force of gravity, then the body will be lifted. We may pull on a string without breaking it, because the force which tends to break the string is opposed by another force which tends to hold it together; but if the first force be increased so that it exceeds the other, then the string will break.

50. Measure of Forces.—Forces are measured by the momentum they are capable of producing in a unit of time. If the body be of unit mass, the force is measured by the velocity produced, for the momentum is equal to the velocity since the mass is one.

51. Units of Force.—The dyne is the C. G. S. unit of force. It a force which acting on one gram of matter for one second will impart to it a velocity of one centimeter per second; in other words, a dyne is a force which produces one C. G. S. unit of momentum in one second.

Another class of units are called gravity units; they will serve for ordinary purposes, but are not perfectly definit, for the force of gravity varies slightly at different places. On this system we speak of a force of a gram, kilogram, ounce, pound, etc.; we mean a force equal to that of gravity on the quantity of matter named. The force of gravity on a milligram is a little less than a dyne.

52. Action and Reaction.—When one body acts upon another, the second acts upon the first; this action of the second body is called reaction. Action and reaction are equal and contrary.

If you hit a stone with your hand, the reaction of the stone makes you feel the blow; it is the same as if the stone struck your hand. Throw a piece of glass on the ground and the reaction of the ground will break the glass.

Experiments.—Drop a rubber ball on the floor, and the reaction of the floor will cause the ball to bounce up again. This experiment also illustrates the reflection of motion (46). Children who play marbles are familiar with the collision of bodies; they know how, sometimes, when they strike one glass ball with another, nearly all the motion of the first is given to the second, the first coming to rest; and at other times both marbles move on, but not so fast as the first was moving before the collision.

Collision balls are balls hung upon strings, so that when one is pulled aside and then released it will strike another ball. If the balls be made of ivory or some other elastic substance, the first ball will come to rest when it strikes the second, and the second will move on; but if they be made of some inelastic material, such as clay, both balls will move after the collision, but with reduced velocity.

53. Formula.—The following formula may be used to solve problems. Remember that the letters stand for the value of forces, velocities, etc., and that when two or more letters are written together the numbers they stand for are to be multiplied; and when they are written in the form of fractions, the upper part is to be divided by the lower. Let the mass be represented by m, the velocity by v, the force by f, and the time by t:

$$M=\frac{ft}{v};\ v=\frac{ft}{m};\ f=\frac{mv}{t};\ t=\frac{mv}{f}.$$

GEO. G. GROWER.

QUESTIONS:

NOTE.—The best example of a constant force is that of gravity. We will assume that gravity will impart to any falling body a velocity of 980 cm. or of 32 ft. for each second, which is about the correct value.

1. What will be the velocity of a body after falling 3 seconds? A. 2,940 cm. or 96 ft. per sec.

2 What is the force of gravity on 1 gram? A. 980 dynes.

3. On 1.000 grams? A. 980,000 degrees.

4. The force of gravity on a certain body was 1.960 dynes. In three seconds the body was falling with a velocity 2.940 cm. per sec.; what was the mass of the body? A. By the formula $m\ \frac{ft}{v}=\frac{1960\times3}{2940}=2$ grams.

5. Force is 9,800, time 5 seconds, mass 10 grams; required the velocity. A. $v=\frac{ft}{m}=\frac{9800\times5}{10}=4.900$ cm.

6. Mass was 10 kg; after falling 4 seconds velocity was 39.2 m. What was the force of gravity? A. $f=\frac{mv}{t}=\frac{10000\times3920}{4}=9{,}800{,}000$ dynes.

7. The force of gravity on 2 grams is 1.960 dynes, the velocity acquired in falling was 7.840 cm. per sec. How long was the body in falling? A. $t=\frac{mv}{f}=\frac{2\times7840}{1960}=8$ seconds.

8. Suppose a force of 200 dynes acts for 3 seconds on a mass of 10 grams: What would be the velocity? A. 60 cm. per second.

Wise Words.

He who forgivs is victor in the dispute.

Most men know what they hate, few what they love.

Habits are soon assumed; but when we strive to strip them off, 'tis being flayed alive.

Man must work. He may work grudgingly or gracefully. He may work as a man or a machine.

The infinitly greatest confessed good is neglected to satisfy the successiv uneasiness of our desires pursuing trifles.

True glory takes root and even spreads; all false pretense, like flowers, fall to the ground; nor can any counterfeit last long.

The love of reading enables a man to exchange the wearisome hours of life, which come to everyone, for hours of delight.

We seldom condemn mankind till they hav injured us, and when they hav, we seldom do anything but detest them for the injury.

It may serve as a comfort to us all in our calamities and affliction, that he that loses anything and gets wisdom by it is a gainer by the loss.

There are two sides to all memories, a bright side and a dark side; and the gain or loss from a memory depends on the side of it which we hav in our minds as it is recalled by us.

He who is sympathetic has his entrance into all hearts, and is the solver of all human problems. To him is given dominion where he thinks to serve; and the love which he gives without stint, as without calculation, he receives back without measure, as without condition.

Playing Fool.

An industrious young shoemaker fell into the habit of spending much time in a saloon near by. One by one his customers began to desert him. When his wife remonstrated with him for so neglecting his work for the saloon, he would carelessly reply: "Oh! I've just been down a little while playing pool." His little two-year-old caught the refrain, and would often ask: "Is you goin' down to play fool, papa?" This made a deep impression on the shoemaker, as he realized that the question was being answered in the falling off of his customers and the growing wants of the household. He resolved again and again to quit the pool-table, but weakly allowed the passion of play to hold him a time. Finally he found himself out of work, out of money, and out of flour. Sitting on his bench one afternoon, idle and despondent, he was heard to exclaim, "No work again to-day; what I'm to do I don't know." "Why, papa," prattled the baby, "can't you run down and play fool some more?" "Oh! hush, you poor boy," groaned his father, shame-stricken. "That's just the trouble. Papa has played fool too much already." But he never played it again, and to-day his home is comfortable and happy once more.—Temperance Banner.

A Cruise on the Gil Blas.

An Editor of my acquaintance, in partnership with a young bank clerk named Smith, sails a yacht, habitually, in the waters of the East river and Long Island sound. The name of the yacht is the Gil Blas—pronounced Hiel Blas, and called Gilly for short. On a recent Saturday the Editor invited me to go sailing with him. The yacht lay in Echo bay at New Rochelle, seventeen miles from New York, and the Editor promised to meet me at the Grand Central Depot so we could go out together. It was a muggy day when I took the horse-cars at Eighth street, and before I reached the depot a car-horse dropped, overcome by the humidity. I got there a little too late to see my train go out, but in good season for the next one. The Editor hadn't waited for me, and I went to New Rochelle alone. It is a historic town, and contains the old Paine farm and the Paine monument, but the cars don't go within a mile of Echo bay, and that distance I footed. From a bluff in Hudson Park I saw the Gil Blas rocking at anchor, looking something like a white duck in a mill-pond. A small yawl, painted to match the yacht, floated alongside at the end of a boom. A yellow signal with a red crescent in the middle waved from the masthead; a little brass cannon glinted across the starboard rail; a sailorfied chap in a seaman's cap (rhyme not intentional) sat forward on the roof of the cabin; and, resting his arms on the main boom and gazing shoreward through a binocular glass, I recognized the Editor himself. After striking several attractiv attitudes, waving my hat, wiping the perspiration from my brow, and adding such other gestures as I thought would probably lead to my identification, I was pleased to see the Editor get into the yawl and commence making demonstrations toward the shore. He took me on board the yawl and thence to the Gil Blas.

The Gilly is a keel sloop twenty-five or thirty feet in length and nine in width, with four sails—mainsail, topsail, staysail, and jib. She needs five feet of good water to sail in, and has some thirty inches of freeboard, as they call that part of a vessel's side which is above water. In the center is a cabin ten feet long and six wide, with a snug forecastle or galley or kitchen forward, and lockers along both sides and aft. On both sides are cushioned seats, dubbed transoms, to sit or sleep on, between which is a short table that stands on two legs screwed into the floor, and shuts up like a lemon-squeezer. The chap sitting on the roof was Ollick, a Finnish sailor. He is the crew of the Gil Blas. He has sailed in deep water on square-riggers and fore-and-afters, and knows all about working a vessel, but the occupation he dotes on seems to be rubbing up the brasswork, scouring the lamps, polishing the little cannon, and cleaning the paint and varnish. In conversation he is profane beyond the bounds of necessity. It grieved me to hear him do so much swearing when there was apparently no occasion for it; it looked as if he was wasting italics that would be needed in a emergency.

The Editor dressed me in a flannel shirt, a slouch hat, and soft slippers that wouldn't scratch the deck, and gave me some refreshment. Then we sat down and waited for Partner Smith, who came later. Smith, and the Editor, and the crew are three quite dissimilar persons. The Editor is inclined to be fat, and follows his inclination in that regard. Smith's tendency to be lean is gratified; while the crew is small, and short, and lithe. They also hav different methods of making their several ways about the boat. Smith scrambles there, the editor rolls and slides there, and the crew squirms his way about. I introduced a new method by making a sprawl in the general direction, and then gathering myself up. This system affords great facilities for holding on.

At 5 o'clock we made sail. It was understood that, so far as I was concerned, this was to be a pleasure excursion, and myself a mere passenger, but I consented to help hoist the anchor. I pulled at the cable with much energy, and sat down with the regulation thud when the anchor finally consented to let go the bottom. If it had been a cork it couldn't hav bobbed to the surface any quicker that it did when it had once made up its mind to rise. Just as I struck the deck Smith yanked the cannon lanyard and let off the gun with a bang; Ollick hoisted the staysail, and the editor hauled the main boom close aboard. The wind came from the side, and the boat suddenly careened half over. With the noise of the gun and the tipping of the boat I concluded that my sudden sitting down had started every timber in the craft, but as the others showed no excitement I concealed my surprise and got to a safe place by the sprawling method I hav mentioned. The Editor was holding the tiller and looking aloft with a professional and critical eye, and Ollick and Smith were calmly coiling down ropes. I afterward learned that the gun was fired as a parting salute to Echo bay, and I found out before the cruise was over that the Gilly never sailed on an even keel. In order to do herself justice she must hav her lee rail about six inches under water.

We headed for Oyster bay, an arm of the sound that indents the north shore of Long Island twenty miles from New Rochelle. The sail was without incident, but not without interest, especially to the passenger. The loose ends of ropes had a way of tying themselvs up into bowlines and lassoing his feet, and the boom lay in wait for his head and gave it a good thump whenever it got a chance. The greater part of the time the deck sloped to leeward at about the pitch of an ordinary shingled roof, but lacked its stability, having a compound motion impossible to follow. A seat beside the rudder post offered the best advantages as to permanence, but those advantages were somewhat lessened by the slack of the sheet coiling itself about the passenger's legs, the tiller striking him in the stomach, and the boom getting a crack at his head whenever the boat went off on a fresh tack.

About dark the Gilly was off the bluff that guards the entrance to Oyster bay. It was known that there were in the vicinity certain buoys to be rounded and certain shoals and reefs to be avoided, but exactly where they were located nobody aboard was prepared to say. Smith, therefore, went below, and proceeded to overhaul the chart, the result of his endeavors going to prove that while those hydrographic objects were readily located on parchment, it was quite another thing to pick them up in a waste of water whose surface had a monotonous and uninteresting sameness as far as the eye could reach. In anticipation of having to sail by chart, the binnacle, containing the compass, was rowsed out by Ollick, and placed where the Editor, who was steering, could keep his eye on it; but it is worthy of note that no buoys were sighted, and that if there were shoals in the way of the Gilly, she sailed over them without touching.

We dropped anchor in Oyster bay at 10 o'clock that night, and the deck came once more to a level. Ollick inserted himself into various lockers and boxes, and brought forth potatoes and meat, and bread and butter and coffee, put an iron chimney on the stove in the forecastle, started a fire, and directly set forth a toothsome meal on the table in the cabin. The passenger, who had hitherto been inactiv, now displayed a renewed interest in the proceedings, and his achievements at that little table were entered on the log of the Gil Blas. A previous entry showed that somebody named S. P. Putnam had been similarly honored.

Before going to bed the passenger mounted to the roof of the cabin, and took a confident header into Oyster bay, as a preliminary to a contemplated swim. Owing to the shallowness of the water, he was enabled to make the valuable scientific discovery that the bottom there was formed chiefly of aluminal deposits and other ingredients which go to make up an unusually hard kind of clay. These mineralogical specimens were afterward removed from his hair by means of a comb, and examined at leisure.

The passenger slept that night on one end of the port transom, the Editor occupying the other end. As the transom is nine feet long and the combined length of the occupants something over eleven, there was a tangled-up mass of feet in the center. However, the sleep of the passenger must hav been uncommonly deep and satisfying, as he got enough of it by 4 o'clock the next morning and at that hour went on deck. The water looked cool and inviting, so, slipping off his night clothes, he dropped over the side. After swimming about for a while, and satisfying himself that his natatorial powers were still retained, he concluded to go back on board. Then he made the discovery that it was somewhat easier to get into the water from the Gil Blas than to get onto the Gil Blas from the water. Her rail was above his reach, and after jumping for it and catching it just as he had exhausted the strength which he had need of to pull himself aboard, he hung on the side of the boat like the fender of a tug, and called vociferously to the Editor to come and pull him abroad. The literary man was aroused at length, but not until the occupants of the neighboring yachts, some of whom were females, had come on deck and leveled their glasses at the victim. Observing this, the man overboard swam around to the other side, where the Editor reached down a friendly hand and took him in. Smith protruded his head through the cabin hatch long enough to inquire why the passenger hadn't climbed up the bobstay, as he might easily hav done, and then went back to sleep. The passenger then got a field glass, and sitting down in the cockpit, proceeded very collectedly to familiarize himself with his audience on the other yachts, observing which the ladies retired.

After a breakfast as hearty as the supper had been, we got out of Oyster bay, and started for New York, with a fair wind and sun right behind us. Perhaps it wasn't hot and perhaps the passenger didn't get his hands and his face burnt, and his neck girdled, but appearances were otherwise. There was shade on one side, but there was spray there also, and the water squirted through the scuppers in a moist, disagreeable way. Ollick, dressed in simply undershirt and trousers, was everywhere with bucket and sponge, sloshing and swabbing right and left. Then followed a scouring process that left every piece of brass on the boat so bright that it shot back the rays of the sun in dazzling little streaks; and, the angle of reflection being equal to the angle of incidence, as Mr. Grower has explained, one of these streaks met the passenger in the eye, no matter which way he looked. When Ollick had driven everyone three or four times around the yacht with his scrubbing things he disappeared in the forecastle, and when he again emerged he was very gorgeous in a white shirt with navy blue collar, cuffs, and bosom, duck trousers, white as snow, and sailor cap. He took a seat forward, and was for some time an object of deep admiration to the passenger.

Smith brought a copy of the Christian at Work aboard to counteract what he calls the Atheism of his shipmate. It is a peculiarity of both Smith and the Editor that each regards the other as a Jonah. Smith attributes all bad luck to the baneful influence of unbelief, and the Editor thinks that superstition is at the bottom of it. Smith is something of a vocalist. He has a strong bass voice that issues from his elongated larynx with the vibrating effect of a whistling buoy and shakes him like a reed whenever he exercises it. He got himself in the proper frame of mind by a close perusal, at frequent intervals, of the religious journal above mentioned, and then, grasping the mast to steady himself, he beguiled the tedium of the day by singing the appended cheerful verses:

Sixteen men on a dead man's chest!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!
The devil and drink did for the rest!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!

For they drank and drank, and got so drunk,
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!
Each from the dead man bit a chunk!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!

The bottle burst and the men accurst—
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!
Sucked his blood to quench their thirst!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!

They sucked his blood and crunched his bones!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!
When suddenly up came Davy Jones!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!

"My men," says he, "you must come with me!"
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!
And he grinned with a horrible kind of glee!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!

Davy Jones had a big black key!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!
It was for the locker beneath the sea!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!

He winked and blinked like an owl in a tree!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!
And he sunk 'em all to the bottom of the sea!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!

Now all take warning by this 'ere song!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!
Never drink whisky so devilish strong!
Yo! ho, ho! and a bottle of rum!

Having rounded the bluff and pointed toward home, we had the wind and tide dead against us, and all day long we cut the waters of Long Island sound into saw-teeth beating down toward that estuary called the East river. A lubberly schooner tried to accompany us, the captain of which was the most diabolically mean man I ever saw. He blanketed us with his patched and slovenly sails whenever he had a chance, and he would heave to and wait for us in order that the chance might occur often. Finally we left him astern, and he went on his evil and malicious way. Later on a big-sailed catboat came down toward us with the breeze and rounded up to windward of us, where he lay back stiff for a race. It would hav been more polite of him, according to marine etiquet, to go to leeward, and Smith reminded him of that fact in rather plain language. He didn't appear to be a gentleman, though, and held on. The weather was squally and Smith had ordered our topsail in, but this fellow's breach of good manners awoke the yachtsman's instinct in him, and in a moment Ollick had monkeyed up the mast and reset the sail. The Gilly, feeling the increased pressure, dipped a little more of her rail under, gave her head a jaunty toss, and, kicking up her heels, began to forge through the water with a pleasing rustle. The fellow had the windward position of us, and his boat was a racing box, but in spite of all that we out-footed him. As we crossed his bows, and he dropped astern, Smith gave vent to some derisiv language, pointed out small and insignificant craft which he might tackle for a race with a reasonable prospect of success, and otherwise so harrowed up the man's feelings that he went about and put off in another direction.

After the squalls were over the wind died out entirely, and we had to anchor to keep the Gilly from going backward. While we lay there Ollick got supper; then a little breeze ruffled the water, and, taking advantage of it, we bore down upon the anchorage of the Knickerbocker Yacht Club, of which the Editor and Smith and the Gilly are members. It was dark when we got there; the tide was running like a mill-race, and the Gilly's buoy, to which she was in the habit of tying up, was surrounded by so many other yachts that she had to be warped in by passing a line from one boat to another, and finally to the buoy. During this process I found that I had done Ollick injustice in supposing that he had exhausted his powers of objurgation on the previous occasions that had drawn upon them. For, added to the perplexities of darkness, a stifling atmosphere, and a rushing tide bearing us toward some black rocks that looked like the discolored teeth of dragons, a swarm of musketoes settled down upon the devoted tar, and made life a burden; I may simply say that Ollick's profanity did the subject simple justice, and whenever he paused for breath the Editor took up the strain and enriched the air with his ornamental blasphemy. Smith is a member of the Congregational church, but he showed signs of satisfaction at hearing his sentiments expressed in so much better terms than he could command. I never saw so many musketoes before in my life. The air was thick with them, and their voracity was unbounded. To protect myself from them I lay flat upon the floor of the cabin, covering myself, head and heels, with a blanket, under which I sweltered until morning broke, and then Ollick, his face and arms swollen from the bites of the pests, took us ashore, and we came to the city. All that day my chair in the TRUTH SEEKER office rocked and tipped with a compound motion, as though at sea, and I had only to close my eyes to find myself back upon the waters of Long Island sound, tossing and dipping among its restless waves. The click of the type as it went into the compositors' sticks answered to the lap, lap of the water against the sides of the yacht, and upon opening my eyes the delusion was not the more readily dispelled when I observed that in the TRUTH SEEKER office and aboard the Gil Blas the same Editor sat at the helm.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

ARCHBISHOP ELDER in a recent address proffers the Catholic church as the workingmen's best friend, and urges them to beware of "the danger that there is, now that the day has arrived in which the workingmen assert and maintain their rights, of forgetting religious obligations."

THE pope continues a determined struggle with Italy to get possession of a certain coveted territory.

SAM JONES has difficulty in filling all his numerous engagements; special trains are run, and the audiences are prodigious.

DR. MCGLYNN'S recent statement that the Germans are attempting to Germanize the Catholic church in the Northwest is extensivly contradicted.

FEARS are expressed that the animosity being raised in the South by late resentful expressions in the North may lead to calamitous results in the event of a war with England.

A ST. PETERSBURG firm has equipped and started for Central Asia an expedition which will establish cotton plantations and make an analysis of the soil of Turkestan and the Trans-Caspian territories.

ONE of the usual feeble periodical investigations is being made into the corruption of New York police courts that enables many of the worst criminals and leaders of "gangs" to obtain release from jail through political "pulls" as often as they are sent there.

THE Ute Indians in Colorado are commencing hostilities, and troops hav been prepared to dispatch against them.

LAST Sunday the Salvation Army, after holding services, attempted to march through Ocean Grove, N. J., but was prevented by the police.

THE Socialists are commencing a violent warfare against Henry George and his following for their attempt to expel the former from the United Labor party.

THE leader of the "Whyos," the worst gang of roughs in this city, was killed on the 13th by a saloonkeeper whom he attacked in his own bar-room, breaking up the furniture and throwing bottles at the proprietor's head.

IT is thought that Germany is deterred from declaring war only by the emperor's determination that no army shall go into the field without him. His ill health prevents his attendance at present, but trouble may be expected to follow his death, and his condition is anxiously watched.

ON the night of the 10th a crowded excursion train of fifteen cars, from Peoria, Ill., to Niagara Falls, crashed into a burning bridge near Piper City. The wreck was frightful, only four sleeping cars remaining on the track. One hundred and eighteen bodies were taken from the ruins, and the injured numbered four times as many more.

ON the morning of the 9th, Willis McDearmon, a school-teacher near Babattia, Tenn., found his school-house surrounded by a mob, who refused him admission on the ground that he was a Prohibitionist. McDearmon opened another school-house. The Anti-Prohibitionists installed a new teacher, and pupils divided according to parents' views on the question.

SENATOR FRYE, just returned from a European tour, says: "I found girls in factories in Venice working with great skill for from five to twelve cents a day, the most experienced getting twelve cents, out of which they had to liv; but how they liv is a wonder. Farm hands all over Europe earn twenty cents a day. Women do most of the field work. I saw no improved machinery on the farms of the Continent. It seems certain that there must be a European war in the near future. The only way to avoid it is to disband the armies, and that can't be done."

Gems of Thought.

I FANCY Hesper would hav been a little shocked if one had called her an Atheist. She went to church most Sundays—when in the country; for, in the opinion of Lady Margaret, it was not decor us there to omit the ceremony: where you hav influence, you ought to set a good example—of hypocrisy, namely! But if anyone had suggested to Hesper a certain old fashioned use of her chamber door, she would hav inwardly laughed at the absurdity.—Geo. Macdonald.

MAN, know thyself—study thy body, its every law and function, what it needs for food and drink, what it should breathe and how it should be clothed, what will develop it in harmonious proportions and how it may be clean and pure; study thy mind, the laws which govern thought, the highest uses which thought may be made to serve; study thy heart, what it is to love and to be loved, what it means to love not only persons, but truth, virtue, justice, as thy very self. And, having done all this, see how thy physical, thy affectional parts are so intimately interwoven that thou canst not draw a line of separation between them. See and know that thou art the temple of temples, whose incessant sacrifice is ceaseless aspiration for divine ideals, a never-ending search for knowledge, and a warm, unbounded love. This surely is natural, practical, universal religion. No sect, no system, has patented it. It is equally natural in all sects and under all systems. No word signifying less than universal will do for a prefix to it.—Frederic A. Hinckley.

THERE is no need of pulling down Christianity any more—it is down. It is now in order to study it as we study the myths and systems of Greece and India, with a certain sympathy and kindly construction, such as one puts upon a life that is ended. Nay, more, one may well recognize that this past religious world attained in its day, a power over mankind which has hardly yet been dreamed of by the baby religion of the new world, now in its manger. The world is practically without a religion which can curb human passions and selfishness as they were largely curbed by superstitious terrors. Those fears fled and laughed at, it is too soon to expect men to put faith in the power of the infant religion that has neither threat nor bribe. But this interval of skepticism will close, and the world presently be startled by the miracles of love incarnate in science.—M. D. Conway.

OH, I see thee old and formal, fitted to thy petty part,
With a little hoard of maxims preaching down a daughter's heart.
"They were dangerous guides—the feelings—she herself was not exempt;
Truly, she herself had suffered"—Perish in thy self-contempt!
Outliv it—lower yet—be happy! Wherefore should I care?
I myself must mix with action, lest I wither by despair. —Tennyson's Locksley Hall.

YE high, exalted, virtuous dames,
Ty'ed up in godly laces,
Before ye gie poor Frailty names,
Suppose a change o' cases;
A dear-loved lad, convenience snug,
A treacherous inclination—
But, let me whisper i' your lug,
Ye're aiblins tae temptation.

Then gently scan your brother man,
Still gentler sister woman;
Tho' they may gang a kennin wrang,
To step aside is human;
One point must still be greatly dark,
The moving why they do it;
And just as lamely can ye mark
How far perhaps they rue it.

—Burns's Address to the Unco Guid.

LIVING men must hav living institutions. It is very idle to suppose that we are to be ruled by men who are lying in their graves. Each age is capable of judging of its needs: it is not to be supposed that a past age should know what we should want.—National Baptist.

EVERY age must take care of itself, and we must giv those that come after us credit for reopening the poll-book and letting in a new class of voters [women, for instance, 1882] as soon as one is found which can exercise the right usefully to itself and to the public.—Edinburgh Review.

THE spirit which has tried to fasten upon Paine the stigma of licentiousness, and has completely failed of doing so, has had no anxiety to fasten this stigma upon Hamilton or Washington, when success might hav rewarded industry. The reason is evident. Hamilton and Washington flung themselves against the orthodox tradition with destructiv force. The mantle of orthodoxy is a mantle of charity. It hides a multitude of sins that would else be published and paraded with unmitigable zeal.—J. W. Chadwick.

HE that does good to another man does good also to himself; not only in the consequences but in the very act of doing it; for the consciousness of well-doing is an ample reward.—Seneca.

JACOB DECEIVES HIS FATHER, SWINDLES HIS BROTHER, AND TELLS LIES.—Gen. xxvii, 19, 20.

Odds and Ends.

"PA," said a Second avenue boy, "I know what makes folks laugh in their sleeves!" "Well, my son, what makes 'em?" "'Cause that's where their funny-bone is."

HE dropped his melon on the pave,
And when it fell kerflummux,
"Well, never mind," said he, "'twill save
A heap of trouble for our stomachs."

FOREMAN (to country editor): "Do you want the Rev. Mr. Goodman's sermon, 'Feed My Lambs,' to go on the editorial page?" Editor (absentmindedly): "No. Run it in the 'Agricultural Department.'"

THEIR love confessed, when ecstasy was o'er,
And they had partially returned to reason,
"Darling," said he, "hast ever loved before?"
"Well, no," she answered—"that is, not this season!"

FIRST Omaha politician: "I'm afraid it's all up with us, B ll." Second Omaha politician: "What's the matter?" "The World says the only two great issues of the future are labor and temperance." "Great Jinks! An' we must either work or stop drinkin' to catch votes?" "That's just it. Which shall we do, Bill?" "Commit suicide."

OMAHA man (at the circus): "So you are king of the Cannibal Islands, eh? I hav always given freely to heathen missions, and am glad to see one of the brands snatched from the burning." Cannibal king: "I came here to preach to you people, but was induced to travel for these kind men." "What did you expect to preach against?" "Against the use of tobacco? Most of the missionaries you sent us had smoked all their lives." "Ah, ha! So even you object to tobacco-smoking ministers?" "Yes, we don't want any more like them. Tobacco spoils the soup."

"SARY," said a Dakota man to his wife, "did you take them ten bunches of wheat I brought in an' put 'em all together an' mix the roots all up, an' plaster some mud on 'em in good shape?" "Yes, I fixed 'em." "Put the bunch in the wagon, an' I'll take it to town an' giv it to the ed'tor an' tell him it all grew from one seed. And then he will say in the paper that he 'was on Wednesday showed a stool of wheat by Farmer Doozenberry, in which there were over four hundred stalks an' heads. This remark'ble product is all from one grain of seed. Dakoty agin the world! Next!'"

"HERE you are, are you, you young reprobate?" said Mr. Badgerly, as he came across his son playing base-ball on the common. "So this is the way you spend the time that you ought to be putting in at school, is it? Here the teacher's been sending word wantin' to know if you were sick, and I've been hunting for you for the last hour. No, sir; I don't care if it is your strike or whose strike it is. I won't hav any more of this blame nonsense. You just——" Here the boy made an ineffectual pass at the ball, and the old gentleman paused. "Great Scott!" exclaimed the old man under his breath, as he pulled off his coat, "how many more strikes you got?" "Two," replied the boy, who had retreated to a safer distance as he observed his father's preparations. "Well, just hand me that bat, and I'll show you what your old father can do in the way of a home run. Pitch 'em up there, boy."

THE milkmaid known in former days,
If plain was not unbearable,
And often won the poet's praise;
But the milk made now is terrible.

IF Tennyson got £60 for writing the "Jubilee Ode," how much were ten Wordsworth? What is your opinion of Edgar A. Poetry? Why did Laurence Sterne instead of going straight? Notwithstanding his name, Joseph never Addison, nor a daughter either. What made Jonathan Swift, Richard Savage, Bishop John Still, and Mrs. Barbauld? Why did Richa d Lovelace? What a reputation Sir Walter Scott! Where did Edmund Waller? What sorrow caused Mrs. Fanny Steers? The writer Congreve over the fact that these notes are no Whittier if it is thought desirable, but it will be more to the point to promis, as he does faithfully, not to do so Hannah More.

IT was a New Bedford man who, when a terrible storm set in one night, rushed into the house of a neighbor and cried out, "Jones, this is the ending up of earth!" "I'm afraid so—I'm afraid so!" was the reply. "And what shall we do?" "Make our peace with heaven!" The wind blew still stronger, the house shook, and the caller exclaimed, "Jones, you lost five bushels of wheat last fall?" "Yes." "And you hav your suspicions?" "I hav. The man who took my wheat had better own up." "Can you forgiv him?" "I can." "Well——" Here the wind suddenly dropped, and after a look through the window the conscience-stricken man turned and finished, "Yes, if ever I meet him I'll advise him to call around!"

WHEN the young debutante gets sight of a beau,
She scarcely can peep through the leaves of her fan,
Her heart doth so flutter, her cheeks do so glow,
As she asks, all a-trembling, "Who is the man?"

Twenty doth bring her to years of discretion;
No longer she blushes, but changes her plan;
With thoughts of the pocket, the place, the profession,
She questions the circle with, "What is the man?"

At thirty, each day the thought doth appal her,
That hour by hour her roses grow wan,
Her circle of lovers grows smaller and smaller—
She duns each deceiver with, "Which is the man?"

Forty changes her tune, and, grown romantic,
Deems it charming to simper as much as she can;
Haunts watering-places, steams the Atlantic,
For the query of life now is, "Where is the man?" —Life.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 14. No. 35. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY. } New York, Saturday, August 27, 1887. { 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

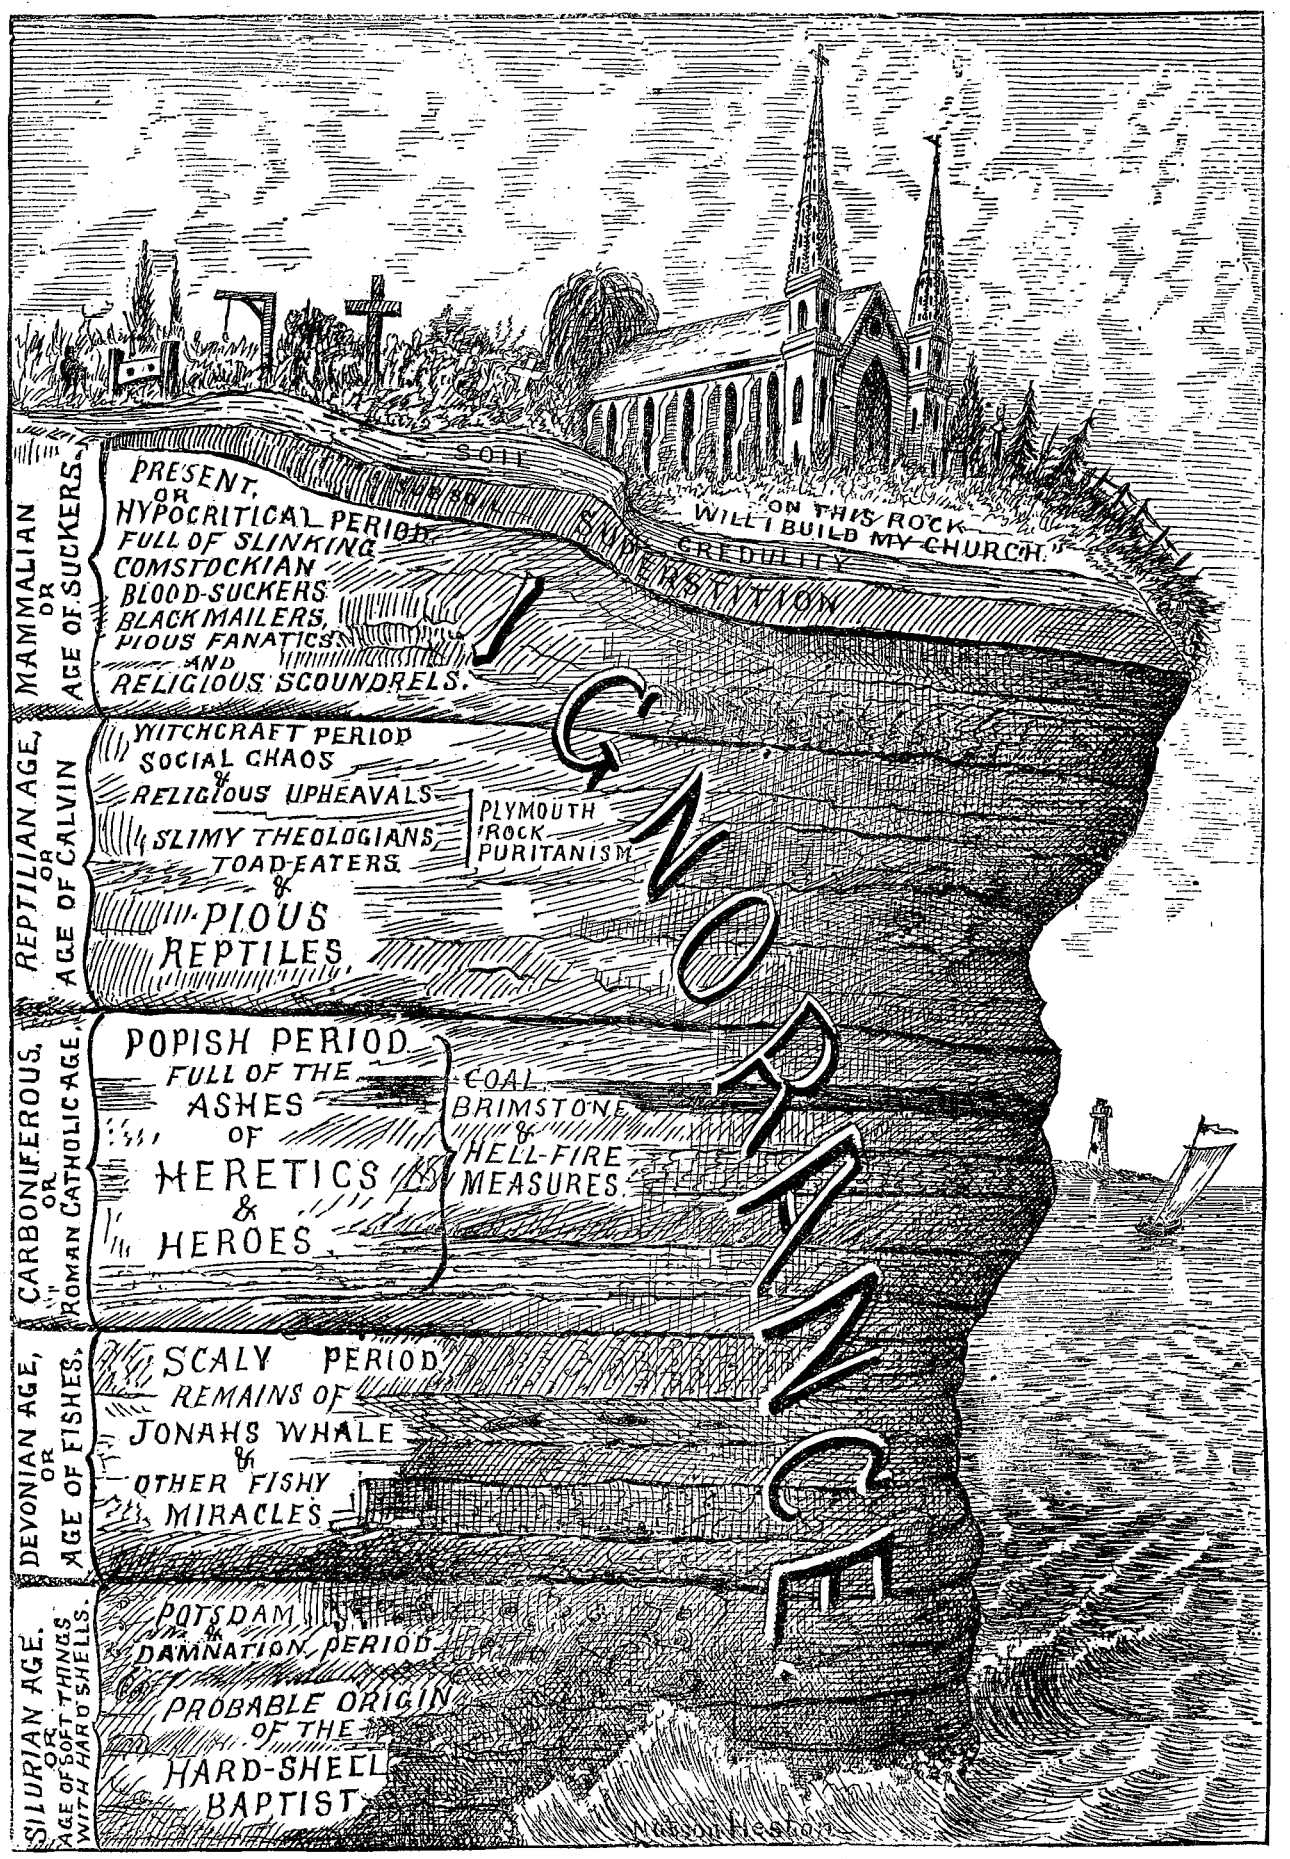
CONCERNING the Labor leaders the Tribune remarks: "The men who hold it their most sacred duty on earth to strive to better the condition of their fellow-men, and who profoundly believe that they hav discovered the right way to do it, are never to be despised."



THE reporters who collect news of the doings of the labor organizations of New York city hav formed an assembly of the Knights of Labor which they hav named in honor of the late Dr. Horace Greeley. The purposes of the Horace Greeley assembly hav heretofore been purely social, but recently when the labor news reporter of the Tribune had a disagreement with his city editor and found it expedient to leave the paper, the Central Labor Union passed solemn resolutions denouncing the city editor and ordering that all news of the Central Labor Union's affairs be withheld from the Tribune's reporters. And so it has come about that the Tribune alone, the paper founded by Horace Greeley, is not represented in the Horace Greeley assembly, and its labor reporters are at present struggling under a boycott by their fellow-newsgathers.

THE Melbourne Liberator adds to an old item concerning Italy: "In 1861, a government inquiry revealed the interesting fact that out of the 26,000,000 population, 17,000,000 could neither read nor write. In the kingdom of Naples it was still worse. In five years the government, hated and opposed as it was by the priests, started 11,137 elementary schools, which were attended by 2,217,870 boys aud girls. All these would hav grown up in ignorance if the pope and his party had had their way. The first ragged school in Rome was opened by an American lady in 1870. As late as that year the inspectors found the children in Roman schools so ignorant that they could not make them understand either geography, syntax, or spelling. Some of them thought the Adriatic a mountain, Sardinia a city, Milan the capital of Sicily. One said Brutus was a despot, Dante a French poet, Petrarch a famous poetess. One boy declared Columbus an apostle; another said he was the Holy Ghost. Another said Cardinal Grant was president of the United States. Some did not know in what country Rome was, and had never heard of Jesus Christ. There were about 70,000 priests, monks, and nuns in Italy at the time."

THE Conservator, the organ of the colored folks of Chicago, has this to say about McGarigle, the "boodler" of that town who escaped to Canada: "So you let McGarigle get away, did you? I 'nowed it, leastways I 'spected it. You all was too perticular 'bout his health an' his high-toned ways. If he had been a colored man put in jail for grabbin' a stray chicken they'd dun put him in a cell and forgot he was there. This way makin' fish out o' one man an' dog-meat out o' 'nother ain't right."

THE Dallas, Texas, Times relates this as evidence that prayer is answered: "Just before the election there were prayers offered up for the success of the Prohibition amendment in Texas. Now that the amendment is defeated by such an overwhelming majority there are those who are disposed to ridicule the power of prayer. Those who are so disposed should not laugh too loudly. In a colored church in Dallas a part of the congregation prayed for the triumph of Prohibition. As soon as it had finished the other part raised its voice asking for the triumph of the anti's. It was a case where one or the other side had to win. The anti's claim there is much in prayer."

A CORRESPONDENT of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat spent the Fourth of July in a part of Illinois where the farmers hadn't had rain for a month, and were praying for it to come. He tells this story: "I was in the house of one of these farmers, a strong believer in the efficacy of prayer, and he told me he thought that the Lord was sending them the drouth to punish them for their wickedness. After dinner I went out into the woods and lay down under a tree. Pretty soon a big dead limb dropped off a tree close to my head. I had lived in the country long enough to know that was a good sign of approaching rain. Then, in a little while more, I heard a tree-toad chirp. Rain sign No. 2! Then I heard a rain crow caw, and I sat up to listen. Sign No. 3! Presently I heard a locomotiv whistle and the train rumble over a track I knew was fifteen miles away. Sign No. 4! I got up and went into the house and told my friend that I had been out praying for rain to come before night, and added that I was confident of getting what I wanted. He looked at me mournfully, and said in a hopeless way that he guessed not. It wasn't for an irreligious man from St. Louis to come out there and outpray all the people of that neighborhood. I took him out in the yard and showed him the clouds. 'Oh,' said he, with cheerfulness, 'that'll pass around us. We've had that to occur before.' But I made him make everything secure, and before long there came along a rain that would hav drowned a man if he had been out in it. The farmer was in ecstasies, and would hav canonized me if he had known how. I left while my laurels were green, and I suppose my old friend hasn't yet decided whether or not I possess supernatural powers."

THE ROCK OF AGES GEOLOGICALLY CONSIDERED.

FOUR hundred and one convicts confined in the main prison at Nashville hav appealed to the people of Tennessee to work for the adoption of the Prohibitory amendment. After saying that three-fourths of the inmates were made criminals by intoxicants, they close their appeal as follows: "Wearing the garb of disgrace, being dishonored and counted unworthy to mingle with the people of our state, we yet hav the same love for our wives, the same devotion to our mothers, the same affection for our sisters, and for their sake, and for the sake of our children, we appeal to you to unite as one man and free the state from a curse created by the hands of man, discountenanced by the law of God." Rev. N. W. Utley, chaplain of the penitentiary, certifies at the bottom of the list of names that the document was prepared by the convicts themselvs as a voluntary act.

Dr. McGlynn's Position and His Church.

From all reports, news, and items that hav come within our reach, we can fairly conclude that Dr. McGlynn's case, especially his relation to his church and the position he is holding toward Catholic doctrins and ecclesiastical authority, has not yet been clearly stated and illustrated from an unbiased, philosophical point of view. From all this we may even venture to assert that Dr. McGlynn, not having started on his "new crusade" systematically, with a scrupulously measured and investigated plan, got into such a Scylla and Charybdis that he lost the control of his own destiny and is actually at the mercy of the waves.

Let us giv a fair, an impartial consideration to Dr. McGlynn's case in order to show the reader those latent agencies that are in operation beneath the surface of this singular disagreement of a Roman priest and his powerful church.

The bare case is this:

Dr. Edward McGlynn, a Roman Catholic priest, outside of his church availing himself of the liberties of an American citizen, proposes publicly a doctrin against the individual ownership in land, and declares it a wrong done to the multitude. He consequently espouses the theory of abolishing individual ownership in land, maintaining and teaching that land is the common property of all, entirely in the same way as are sunlight and air. The nation should be the owner, and its government is to administer it, collecting yearly rents from it so as to be able to abolish all other taxes, which are an unjust and unbearable burden upon the poor laborers.

The public teaching of this so-called land theory constituted an offense in the eyes of the Catholic church authorities. They warned and admonished the priest, who having persisted and preached the same principles in spite of remonstrances of the church authorities, there arose an open split between church and priest. As the priest would not part with his cherished principles, he incurred the ire of Rome, who finally launched down its heaviest thunder upon the head of the champion of the famous land theory—that is, excommunication.

Apart from these two offenses—the new land theory, and refusal to obey, or contumacy—Dr. McGlynn is also accused of having advocated the public school system in America against the Catholic parochial school system.

This is the case objectivly.

Whenever something of interest emerges from within the jealously guarded pales of the old Latin church, an unusual attention is paid to it all the civilized world over. It was more especially so with the case in question, which very closely interested the most important and most populous strata of modern society: the men of wealth or capitalists, and the men of labor—that is, the producers and transformers of raw material. Those theories, if realized, would undoubtedly revolutionize society; and so we venture to say that its every thinking member is entitled to giv an opinion on the subject or to take a subjectiv view of the case.

In accordance with this assumption we shall consider Dr. McGlynn's case from a theologico-philosophical point of view, with due consideration toward the case of both parties.

The first question which offers itself for discussion here is, whether the new "land theory" can really constitute an offense in the eyes of the Catholic church, and consequently cannot be taught by a priest of that church. Rome examined the land theory, but, too cautiously, pronounced no sentence concerning it, excommunicating the priest for obstinate disobedience. This caution may be a good policy toward the clamorous masses upholding and encouraging the fearless priest who, by the flocking multitude, is considered as being right; a martyr of his principles, a man of the people, a defender of the poor and oppressed, etc. Yet, it is not altogether wise. Learned ecclesiastics, or, in fact, all good theologians, know that the church has decided doctrins and laws with regard to this land theory; and such learned men will smile at the blind declamation and ignorant assertion of Dr. McGlynn that "it is not against the doctrins of the church;" "it is no dogma;" "no archbishop, no pope, has the right" to excommunicate him, etc.

We do not know which to admire more, his boldness in haranging the masses with such assertion, or his ignorance of Christian, particularly of Thomistic, philosophy. And he was educated in Rome!

What, we ask him, is the corner-stone of his cherished land theory? Is it not the abolition of individual right of ownership in land? What is to succeed to it? Natural or common ownerships. Now, we know only of two alternativs: either to possess individually (personally), or in common. To take possession of individual persons' properties by other individuals, without their consent, is robbery; to do the same under the auspices of a mob-created law, a king, or any monarch, is tyranny. If Dr. McGlynn were any kind of a theologian—not to speak of philosophy—he would undoubtedly know that there are pure, scriptural dogmas that need no special declaration, and such is the last commandment of the Decalog. "Non domum, non agrum, non servum, non ancillam, non bovem, non asinum, et universa quæ illius sunt." Would Dr. McGlynn oblige us by showing us whether the Catholic church has a dogma declared and proclaimed against murder?

His insipid and self-admiring declamation for a dogma, a declaration, and the like, exhibits him in such a light that "ignaros fallit, notis (vel scientibus) autem est derisui." He seems either not to know that the teachings of the church do not consist of a row of dogmas, or to know what is to be believed by a Catholic Christian. If he only looked in his school-books, he would find out very easily the nature of his doctrins: whether they are rejected and condemned by his so much beloved and admired church, or tolerated. We fear, however, that he would not know where to find them.

Does he really believe that the most autocratic of all social institutions, the Latin church, would, or, in fact, could tolerate such doctrins? It is impossible to suppose; and the fact is, that his doctrin has long been condemned, ever since the times of Gnostics; later against the Albigenses; still later against Th. Campanella; against Proudhon; against Fourier, etc. It is a doctrin of the Catholic church that "Homo iure naturæ potest acquirere et possidere dominio perfecto stabiles proprietates;" that is, "A man can by natural law (right) acquire and possess with perfect ownership any kind of real estate." And: "Imo, spectato iure gentium, homines naturæ officio tententur ad divisionem stabilium proprietatum." Communism, no matter of what kind, is most positivly rejected and condemned by the church, and private ownership is not only admitted, but positivly declared as the only lawful way of possessing unmovable goods. Where here does the necessity of a "dogma" come in? Is it not enough when the church advocates a doctrin and condemns its opposit? It should suffice such a pious Catholic man, who in his heart is so warmly attached to it that even by excommunication he cannot be severed from it?

Dr. Edward McGlynn does not know his own position, nor that of his own church; not even guessing from afar the fundamental principles upon which that old establishment is built. He only knows the archbishop, the cardinals, the pope, and the ecclesiastical "machine;" for the church itself and its dogmas he is full of filial and tender love. We shall undertake to show the doctor that he is the follower of Spinoza, consequently a Pantheist; a follower of Rousseau, Voltaire, Proudhon, etc.; therefore a strong Infidel, at the best, a Rationalist (lucus a non lucendo).

The father of modern Pantheism, Baruch Spinoza, whom, after Voltaire, we admire, study, and love the most—although we feel and think even more liberally than our great master, whose works (being so impious) Dr. McGlynn probably never read—beautifully, admirably explains the position of a natural man, the society, monarchy, aristocracy, freedom, slavery, god, etc. Except the scholastics, all philosophers adopted his views concerning society (although Socrates and Plato also approached his opinions); and there is no doubt that Dr. McGlynn is also his disciple.

Man in a natural state has no laws. There is no sin, no virtue, no merit, nothing good, nothing bad, nothing beautiful, nothing ugly, nothing just or unjust, etc., but all is either useful or harmful, comfortable or otherwise. A man is free just to the extent to which he is physically capable. He can destroy his enemies, acquire the necessaries of life in any way whatsoever. When natural man enters society, by this act, which is spontaneous, he will spontaneously lose some of his liberty, retaining only one share of it, equal to that of each other. The sacrificed rights collectivly constitute the public authority or executiv power. As each member of the society, singly or collectivly, cannot administer municipal, judicial, or legislativ affairs, all the members do it together by votes, electing certain persons whose business it will be to administer justice, create and execute laws, etc. That is, they constitute a parliament, government, kingdom, or republic. Certainly such is the origin of nations and all organized society. The power and authority has its source in the people, and the people thus is entitled to the right of election, and to create legislation, and to appoint the administrators of their own laws and rights. This is a republic.

Does Dr. McGlynn, as a citizen of the great American republic, approve of this theory? That he does, is perfectly known, since this was and is still his platform, whence he dared disobey his church authorities, the ecclesiastical "machine."

But now, there is another theory, diametrically opposed to this, and Dr. McGlynn, under oath, professes to adhere to and acknowledge that too! That other theory is included, as in a nutshell, in the following modest little axiom, "Omnis potestas desursum, a Deo" ("All power is from above, from God"). The followers of this principle say, "Nemo potest dare, quod non habet;" that is, "Nobody can giv what he does not hav." Since one man is no legislator in a multitude, one man is no parliament, and one man has no right and power, neither can a great number of such men hav such a power and right. The power is with God; God givs the power, by selecting one and putting him into power; that is, constituting him king, emperor, pope, etc. Hence, "Guilielmus, speciali Dei gratia imperator Germaniæ." "Leo XIII., speciali Dei gratia Pontifex Maximus." "Joannes, Dei et apostolicæ sedis gratia episcopus." Power and authority is given from above (from pope, emperor, king, bishop) downward by nomination, appointment, consecration, ordination, etc. People hav no right to elect a priest, a bishop, a count, a duke, a king, a pope.

The former is an Infidel system, the latter one is the "revealed" one; the former was in practice in pagan Rome, is in republics to day, is also among various Protestant sects and Infidels, upheld by Dr. McGlynn; the latter one in all kingdoms, empires, and in the orthodox churches, upheld by Dr. Mcglynn with oath and public profession.

Now, how does this agree? Worst of it for Dr. McGlynn is the ridiculous position into which he got by holding his American citizenship above the allegiance that he owes to his church. The authority of a Pantheistico-Protestantico-Infidel theory, his free American citizenship, above divine authority!—admissi, risum teneatis amici!

What is it, anyway, hypocrisy or ignorance?

We may add, that the constitution of the Catholic church is that of an absolute monarchy (see Catholic Philosophical Manuals); Dr. McGlynn is a citizen of it. Furthermore, the Catholic church teaches (see again Catholic Philosophical Manuals) that material power is less, the spiritual one is more, higher and more sublime. A republic—being of no divine origin, as all power is from above—is disregarded, not acknowledged, even denounced; better and higher is a kingdom; still higher is an empire; the highest, and the most sacred, is the popery; hence the three crowns. The pope is the king of kings, and more—the vicar of God. Dr. McGlynn is his citizen; yet in the same breath he claims that the pope has no right to summon him to Rome, or excommunicate him. Isn't this the most absurd and ridiculous claim?

No matter what a pope says in his encyclicas about his Liberalism, love and friendship toward free institutions, republics, it is a dangerous hypocrisy. Republicanism and popery are the zenith and nadir; the greatest possible oppositions, the two farthest distant extremities. The professional followers of one cannot be the friends of the other. If the church would, for an instant, admit Dr. McGlynn's theories, it would be the most astonishing suicide, a refutation and abjuration of its own very foundation.

Did Dr. McGlynn ever think about the questions here ventilated? We are sure that he never did.

He made an irreparable blunder right at the beginning; and this was his acquiescence into those praises which his parishioners hav him overwhelmed with, concerning his excellency, goodness, etc., as a priest; it was the locking of the door behind his back. He knew that if he persisted, his excommunication was but a matter of time; he also knew that he would persist. Having been praised so highly as a Catholic priest, a faithful disciple of the just-mentioned Roman doctrins and theories, that a really learned man never would claim, he could not fall back on Infidelism or any Protestant denomination without being pointed at by archbishops, priests, and Catholic laymen as a hypocrit; so then he had to slide down in the ridiculous situation where he is found to-day, clinging to the threshold of a house whence he had been flung out. Is this manly?—is it worthy of an educated man?

Otherwise, too, he had shown great frailties. His speeches and public orations are all ex abrupto, ex tempore—without a second's preparation, or previous careful, written elaboration; beginning where the irresponsible tongue deems proper, ending where chances suggest after one or two hours of unsystematical declamation. This is a very serious defect in a public speaker.

His attacks on the Roman machinery are skin-deep, unworthy of a doctor of theology; any man of newspaper learning and education could, without much hazard, rival him. An excommunicated Roman doctor of theology is expected to cut deeper, to show thorough competency and familiarity with the subject, and hav courage enough to tell all that is to be told.

In an organized body of men, be it religion, association, lodge, state, family, no man can be his own judge. Why does Dr. McGlynn pretend that his excommunication is null and void? He is not, and cannot be, regarded as his own judge; his judge is Rome, and Rome excommunicated him, and this ends all. A person who is not his own master; who has no free will; who is fed, sheltered, and provided for by another, is in the power of that person, who has and exercises full and unquestionable authority over the mind and body of his subject. Such a person is a slave, to whom his keepers prescribe eating, drinking, dressing, work, way of living; refusal of marriage, of free migration, opinion, speech, etc. A Roman priest is exactly such a pitiable creature, and can not possibly appeal to his less important American citizenship.

There is a second charge against Dr. Edward McGlynn, reproaching him for his predilection for our public schools. An Infidel or a Protestant cannot see the reason why the most orthodox of the churches should oppose public schools, where, it is thought, both the government and the community strive to do their very best for the education of their own children. We shall explain it.

Modern society is far advanced on the field of practical and experimental knowledge. Things in the visible world are explained according to experience and knowledge, not according to their appearance. To know and to believe are two things. If we explain things in the light of modern experience, we reduce the objects of belief; hence the legitimate supposition in the Catholic church that our public schools educate Infidels—that is, knowers and doubters, not believers.

Another justified objection is the objection to the Bible in the public schools. The Bible is for Protestants the only source of revelation; for Catholics it is not. The Catholic church reserved the right to explain and comment upon the Bible to herself; because the unity of faith is banished wherever the source of revelation is used and interpreted arbitrarily by the many—"quot capita tot sensus." And this accounts for the number of sects and denominations among Protestants. This is the Catholic objection. Our objection is more sweeping. We do not regard any ancient book as a source of ethics. Morality cannot be based on alleged, or even true, histories of ancient manners and obscure nations, men, and countries. Morals are based on science, or knowledge of facts and things, whence we form our principles, and adhesion to our principles givs us virtue, and a virtuous man is a moral man.

Now, Dr. McGlynn, advocating our public school system without reserve, acted correctly from a Protestant point of view, but very wrongfully from the point of view of his church. The Catholic church never educated, because she could not and would not, to science and experience. The principles of Christian philosophy had been laid down for these last four thousand years; there is no change, progress, imaginable. Such a step could only be taken over the dead body of the church. Scientific progress is encroachment on church territory. If Dr. McGlynn knew this, and still acted as he did, he is a traitor to his church; if he did not know the principles of his church, he is pitiable.

We quote the ground principle of the Catholic church in this matter in the following philosophical proposition: "Status civilis nullum ius habet imponendi suos magistros, suasque scholas patribusfamilias quoad filiorum educationem tum intellectualem tum moralem;" that is, "No state has any right to force its school-masters and its schools upon fathers of families with the view to educate their children in any manner, intellectually or morally." As to tolerance—as it would be required in a common public school—the Catholic church teaches: "Libertas conscientiæ in se spectata est omnino impia," i. e., "Liberty of conscience, considered in itself, is absolutely impious;" but, "Libertas conscientiæ socialiter considerata, si in datis circumstantiis tolerari potest, numquam tamen est approbanda, et multo minus protegenda vel inculcanda," i. e., "Liberty of conscience, socially considered, if it can be tolerated under given circumstances, is, however, by no means to be approved, and much less to be protected and inculcated." Again: "Libertas cultuum in se spectata est absurda," i. e., "Liberty of worship considered by itself is absurd." And: "Quamvis socialis auctoritas civilis possit quandoque tolerare cultuum libertatem, eam tamen lege aliqua sancire nullatenus potest," i. e., "Although social civil authorities occasionally could tolerate the liberty of worship, sanction it by law they could not possibly." Also: "Libertas docendi sive voce, sive scripto est intrinsece absurda et inhonesta," i. e., "Liberty of teaching, either in speech or in writing, is absurd and dishonest intrinsically." "Libertas docendi est ad corruptionem mentis et cordis," i. e., "The liberty to teach is only destined to corrupt mind and heart."

Here the Catholic leading principles are seen in broad daylight. Is this the liberality and friendly feelings of the pope and church toward republics and liberal institutions? Can a republic and liberty hav any more dangerous enemies than Roman hypocrisy? Is this institution the idol of Dr. McGlynn, to which he is so much attached that he cannot separate himself from it even if thrown out or ejected?

Poor Dr. McGlynn! Does he know his situation? He certainly does not realize it.

What, then, did prompt him to plunge himself into this pool? Dr. McGlynn is not responsible for the act—it has secret natural reasons, only to be understood in the light of ethnological relations, racial sympathy, which works unnoticed. Examples are the Catholicity of the Latin and Celtic races, the Protestantism of the Teutonic family, the orthodoxy of the Sclavonic tribes, the monotheism of all Shemites, the Trinitarianism of the Aryan stock in Asia and the West.

This also explains the denunciation of the Teutons in this country by Dr. McGlynn; but for his superficial and shallow objects, together with his little motivs, and scratches on the surface, on Roman collars, Germanization, etc., nothing, nobody, answers, not even Dr. Edward McGlynn.

Freethought in Australia.

The Freethinkers hav just been having a lively encounter with the authorities in Sydney, New South Wales. In the early part of last month, when the loyalists of our sister colony were exerting almost superhuman strength to create an enthusiasm over the unpopular jubilee celebrations, a meeting was called by the mayor of the city. The object of this meeting was to get up a treat for the public school children in celebration of the "jubilee" of the queen of England. Amongst the two hundred persons who attended were a good sprinkling of republicans, who constitute a large section of the Secularistic party. To the great discomfiture of the conveners of the meeting, the Secularists, or, more correctly speaking, the republicans, who were present succeeded in carrying an adverse amendment; and, as may be imagined, they succeeded in thoroughly arousing the ire of their opponents. The disappointed loyalists, not to be outwitted in this manner, induced the mayor to call another meeting in order to undo the work of the first one; and in order to secure themselvs against another defeat by the republicans, they secretly issued tickets to their known sympathizers in order to pack the meeting. But Demos was not to be thwarted in this manner. No sooner did the news spread that the tickets were being issued than a number of forged tickets were instantly prepared by the disloyalists, and to the surprise of their opponents a great number of them gained admission before the forgery was detected. Then commenced the contest in hot earnest. The doors were closed upon the crowd to prevent them from entering, but they quickly succeeded in forcing their way inside, and a scene of confusion and disorder ensued. Groans, cheers, hooting, and hissing drowned the voices of the would-be speakers, and fighting became general. The mayor adjourned the meeting in the midst of the wildest disorder. But the dispute did not end here. Sir Henry Parkes, being appealed to, ordered all the theaters to be closed on Sundays. This was a terrible blow to the Secularists, for they could no longer hold their concerts and lectures on that day, and a deal of indignation is being expressed in the matter. The government justify their action toward the Secularists on the ground that the latter constitute a "despicable minority"—an unpardonable sin in the eyes of our noble rulers, and, unfortunately, a sin also according to the popular ethics of a great number of the Secularists themselvs. A petition is being signed for presentation to the New South Wales legislature asking that the theaters be reopened on Sunday; a subscription is being got up for Mr. Thomas Walker, who is principally dependent on these lectures for a living, and there the matter rests at present. Freethought lectures may be for the time suppressed, but the desire for freedom is intensified.

The jubilee celebration has come and gone, and a more opportune season could probably not hav been chosen if striking contrasts were to be brought into prominence. We hav witnessed grand illuminations, and costly ones too, and at the same time poverty and destitution on the part of those who hav produced these grandeurs; we hav had fashionable balls and torchlight processions, while thousands of able and willing workmen are vainly parading the streets in search of employment, that they and their families may obtain food and clothing. Unfortunately for those who hav been instrumental in getting up the ephemeral jubilee demonstrations, they hav had to hold them in a time of keen social depression; and they hav far from created the feeling of satisfaction which they desired.

The Freethinkers of Melbourne are having a quiet time of it just now; although, by the way, Mr. Symes recently received intimation that his paper would again be prosecuted, the reason not being given. Although I say Freethinkers are having a quiet time, do not misunderstand me to imply that they are making no headway. On the other hand, we hav good cause to congratulate ourselvs on the solid progress which has been made for some time past. As Freethinkers, more attention has been given to matters relating to freedom than has been the practice in the past; and as Secularists, more attention has been bestowed on secular matters and less on theological controversy. As showing this healthy tendency, it is sufficient to note that the weekly debates of the Australasian Secular Association hav been upon such questions as "Why Do Men Starve?" "Black and White Labor, or the Chinese Question," "The Causes and Cure of Larrikinism," "Why Do Workers Want?" "The Want of Liberty the Cause of Starvation," "Political Privilege the Cause of Present Evils," "Is Anarchy Superior to Government?" and "Is Poverty Curable by Government?" When such live issues as the foregoing are discussed by the Secularists week after week, without intermission, and when, moreover, public debates are held every Sunday evening at the Melbourne Anarchists' Club upon all the weighty problems of land, currency, commerce, and political and social questions generally, it speaks well for the development of radical thought in this far-away corner of the globe.

There hav been several changes in the Freethought press of the colonies since I last found time to write to you. The Rationalist (N. Z.) has not been revived as the Liberal, as was intended; and I hav reason to fear that the company which floated it has mysteriously collapsed. The Reflector (N. S. W.) only issued for a few weeks, and then promised to appear as a monthly—a promis that was never fulfilled. The Henry-Georgian paper, Our Commonwealth (S. A.) has been transformed from a weekly to a monthly, and is manfully struggling to keep afloat. A sprightly little State-Socialistic weekly, the Radical, has been started at Hamilton (N. S. W.); and a miserable little scissors-and-paste hotch-potch has just shown itself at Sydney (N. S. W.), bearing the ambitious title of the Republican, though why it is so called is not very clear, unless its object is to catch the sympathies of the Sydney republicans, now that they are having their political corns trodden on by the government which they are always so proud of claiming to be a democratic one in fact, if not in name. And lastly, there is Honesty (Melbourne), a monthly periodical, devoted to political and social matters generally, and Anarchism in particular.

Little news comes from New Zealand regarding the state of the Freethought propaganda there; and, in fact, the movement appears to be languishing since the demise of its recognized organ, the Rationalist, although there is no doubt that the latter has left behind it an influence which will continue to be felt for some time to come. I hope next time I write to send better tidings from this bright little spot in the Australias. DAVID A. ANDRADE.

Do, As Well As Doubt.

On every side we see accumulating the evidences of the persistent efforts of the church to stay the current of Freethought. All the combined energies of the different sects of Christians are being exerted to dam the waves of progress. The most infamous, yet subtle, schemes are resorted to to intimidate Infidels from the utterance of their honest convictions. Fully realizing its inability to refute our arguments or impair the force of the facts arrayed against it, the church employs such despicable minions of intolerance, sectarian hate, and bigotry as Anthony Crary Comstock to lobby bills through a venal and corrupt legislature, with the admitted intent to suppress all Liberal literature, or any publication objectionable to sectarianism.

Not alone the sanctity of our homes, but even private correspondence, is invaded; and yet thousands of Liberals sit supinely by. Not being immediately, individually molested, they remain inert, with owl-like complacency, blinking at the priestly machinators laying cunning snares to deprive them of liberty and every right that makes life desirable.

Alas! many actually giv of their means to help the power that shall enslave them. They giv ten, twenty, fifty, a hundred dollars to the church they avow they despise, and then declare they cannot afford to subscribe to a Liberal paper, the exponent of the principles they profess to love. It is to be regretted that such persons left the church before the glorious principles of Infidelity, "justice, and promotion of others' happiness" had evoluted them out of Christian selfishness and hypocrisy.

It speaks well for Infidelity that, despite being thus dead-weighted, it makes such grand progress and draws to its support such hosts of the best and noblest the world produces. The desire to inspire men with the love of liberty, right, and truth, and each other with a spirit of fidelity to duty, should be the first desire of every friend of humanity. Let all honest hearts make especial effort, then, to sustain the Liberal press, the bulwark of our liberty, and induce friends and neighbors to subscribe.

Our cause is onward. Neither mollusk, priest, nor parson can stay the car of progress. If they do not speedily evolute out of their old ruts, they will be buried in the mud of oblivion.

A PERSON who derives all his instruction from teachers or books, even if he escape the besetting temptation of contenting himself with cram, is under no compulsion to hear both sides; accordingly it is far from a frequent accomplishment, even among thinkers, to know both sides; and the weakest part of what everybody says in defense of his opinion, is what he intends as a reply to his antagonists.—Mill.

Call for the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Auxiliary Secular Unions and to all citizens of the United States and Canadas who support the Nine Demands of Liberalism:

You are wanted to attend the Eleventh Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Chicago, October 15th and 16th.

The Congress will be called upon to consider measures for carrying on the work of Freethought and securing the adoption of such laws by the various state governments and by the national government as shall make the United States thoroughly secular, and the repeal of all laws now on the statute books which conflict with the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

Local auxiliary Unions are entitled by the Union constitution to five representativs—the President and Secretary and three delegates. All charter-members and life-members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of state Executiv Committees, are entitled to seats and votes in the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats, but not votes, except by permission of the Congress.

It is hoped that every auxiliary Union will send a full delegation to the Congress, and that every Freethinker in the United States and Canada who can will be present.

News and Notes.

Fortunately my traveling companion, F. A. Brockway, of Crescent City, W. T., who had landed early in the morning when we first struck the sand bar, August 6th, became my good angel, and returned with the vessel's boat; and so, by hard work at rowing over a rough sea, I had a chance to quit my floating prison-house and find consolation in roaming amid the half-dozen houses of Dungeness, and eating my dinner where I could sit upright with more prospect of swallowing my food, which I could scarcely do on board the grounded steamer. Having nothing else to occupy the afternoon, Mr. Brockway and myself tramped over the forest-embowered country. I found some elegant farm buildings and well-cultivated fields on this apparently wild shore, and discovered that about Dungeness are the richest lands of the territory. Valuable stock is here, ranging in value from one hundred to four thousand dollars per head. The butter made in this section commands a premium in the market. It is astonishing what the soil can produce. I never saw such exuberant wheat fields. They giv as high as one hundred and twenty-three bushels to the acre. The oat crop ranges from one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty bushels to the acre, the grass three or four tons, potatoes eight hundred bushels, and turnips one thousand bushels to the acre. These figures are verified by actual measurement. Of course, the average yield is only about half. As to fruits, apples, pears, peaches, plums, and cherries are produced in abundance. It costs, however, about one hundred dollars per acre to clear these lands, the trees—some of them are of enormous growth—running up to three hundred and fifty feet in hight. I spent several hours in studying agriculture, waiting for the high tide. About five o'clock the boat was right side up, and by sunset we sped on our way to Port Townsend, and arrived there Saturday evening. I was glad to be able to bid a long farewell to the Dispatch—so named, I suppose, because it is generally behind time, and goes aground on every other trip.

I had the pleasure of meeting Squire Morris at Dungeness, who is an old-time Infidel of the coast, and who flourishes in spite of his Methodist neighbors, and is hale and hearty in his veteran service.

Port Townsend is a quiet yet vigorous little city, and by no means behindhand in the race for empire. It has the grandest natural scenery and surroundings. It is prosperous, and has bright hopes and flattering prospects. From the porches of its residences on the elevated shores the eye sweeps the circle of a hundred miles that includes bays, straits, rolling woodlands, and distant mountains clad with perpetual snow.

A majority of its best and wealthiest citizens are unflinching Liberals, all of whom are activ, pushing business men. A syndicate has just been formed for the building of a railroad from this point to the Columbia river, and thence to Portland, passing through excellent coal, mining, and timber lands. The enterprise will giv Port Townsend an immense advantage for the China trade, and will make it probably the western terminus of the Union Pacific railroad lines, in which case it will hav a magnificent growth. The harbor of Port Townsend is one of the best and largest in the world. It is about six or seven miles long and from four to six miles wide, and affords anchorage in every part, being in all places from seven to fifteen fathoms deep. A thousand ships might anchor here. It is six hundred miles nearer China than San Francisco, and is the only American port that can compete with Vancouver, the terminus of the Canadian Pacific. Vancouver and Port Townsend are about the same distance from China, the harbors are of about the same size, and it looks as if these eventually would be the English and American competing points for the great tea trade of the East. San Francisco is out of the race if expedition is taken into account, for she is at least a three-days' voyage behind Port Townsend and Seattle. I reckon that these latter will divide the honors in this commercial contest; being on different sides of the sound, each has some advantage which the other does not possess.

The Alaska trade is getting to be of vast importance. The mines of that country are being wonderfully developed—as well as the fisheries—and are a source of great wealth. As Alaska is not an agricultural country, all the supplies will be shipped from Puget sound. They even supply from that point the distant Amoor country. It will thus be seen that as commerce develops Puget sound will be one of the grandest marts in the world, and its shores will one day be as lively and brilliant as those of the Mediterranean itself.

I see my friend Jeffries, of Albany, wants to come West. I advise him to correspond with D. W. Smith, of Port Townsend, and I don't think he could find a better place for Liberal enterprise than on the sound. Mr. Smith was last year mayor of Port Townsend, and is one of the bravest Liberals and go-ahead men in the country. I lectured Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday evenings to large and appreciativ audiences, and I found stanch and noble friends. I enjoyed the delightful hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. James Searey, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Jackman, and Mr. and Mrs. Capt. H. E. Morgan, with that of Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Smith. These hav all been in this country for years, and partake of its glorious pioneer spirit. They are not at all afraid. They hav battled with fortune on land and sea, and won the prize. With these, also, is Mr. Vincent, Judge J. A. Kuhn, Chas. Eisenbeis, Capt. John F. Hinds, Mr. Church, F. W. Hastings, L. B. Hastings, David Littlefield, Capt. Hoxie, A. J. Smith, David Spoor, Wm. Paine, Dr. Hunt, L. H. Jones, J. J. Calhoun, Quincy A. Brooks, collector of the port; A. C. Adams, W. E. Stevens, N. T. Oliver, G. Behrman, John Slater, and many others. All are prominent in the community, many holding offices of trust. They hav been in the country from the beginning and are its advance guard for all enterprises of pith and moment. I hav enjoyed myself, and set my face eastward with a happy heart, for I hav found comrades who hav made my work splendid with hope and cheer, and their kindness and generosity and bright greetings hav given sunshine to every toil. and I hav had scarcely a moment of discouragement or gloom.

Wednesday morning I leave Port Townsend, with its promis-crowned hights overlooking the far shining waters, and glancing to the Orient with expectant eyes, and in the afternoon, amid the golden mists, Seattle, from its resplendent hights, also puts forth its eager hands for conquest. John H. Hummell, Messrs. Amunds, Wickstrom, Judge Bush, John Lavender, and others, again I greet. Judge Bush, who was for so many years in Ingersoll's office, has prepared a most excellent and exhaustiv work on the "Oath Question," and I hope to see it soon in print, for it is a valuable text-book and will be of great service in our political reform. He givs the history and nature of the oath in all nations and religions, and shows that the Christian oath has been an intrusion on the common law oath, and was not originally the form of oath in English courts.

I leave Seattle early on Thursday morning and in the afternoon arrive at Portland, where my friends, Newnert, Saunders, Niles, Beal, etc., are ready for the line of advance. I was glad again to greet McElsander, all the way from Eagle Creek, and Mrs. Haight, of East Portland, who is one of our unflinching pioneer women in this land, and whose hospitality was one of the delights of my pilgrim journey.

I lectured Thursday evening on "American Poetry," and then we mingled the practical with the ideal and after the lecture organized a Secular Union. Mr. Hewitt presided at the meeting. Mr. Fisk was elected president of the organization, Mr. Whitfield secretary, and Mr. Neunert treasurer; and I hav no doubt we shall hav a strong society at this place to push the Nine Demands. I believe that when I return Portland will be one of the most flourishing points on the coast for Secular work.

All day Friday it is a lovely day. I leave Portland early in the morning by steamer, and go up the broad and beautiful Columbia to the Dalles. In some places the river is a mile and a half wide. The scenery is wild and grand. The country is so rugged that it has been surveyed only from two to seven miles from the shores on either side. The banks shoot up abruptly a thousand feet and assume all sorts of fantastic shapes. The mighty mountain appears, and vast forests rolling away for hundreds of miles. The magnificent peak of Mt. Hood is in view, and they say it is still a volcano and belches fire and smoke. It is white against the sky, fourteen thousand feet aloft.

We pass the cascades by rail, and these roll and tumble with terrific force, but I reckon some day ships will shoot these rapids with safety. They must hav had some big earthquakes here some day, the shores are heaved and tossed into such numberless forms. The scenery is constantly varying, with green fields, palisades, bare peaks, wooded knolls, sandy beaches, and rifted rocks. We pass the ancient burying-ground of the Indians that juts halfway into the river, where the remains of their melancholy tombs are seen, in contrast with the marble monument erected in honor of one of the early white settlers.

Beautifully the sunset streams over the river and the shores, and the boat speeds on to new and entrancing prospects. Amid the glistening walls of green and gold and gray, and the silver radiance of the misty sky, we arrive at the Dalles and take the cars for Colfax. We expect to be at Paseo next week; and Goldendale, Aug. 21st; Baker City, Aug. 28th; Prairie City, from Aug. 29th to Sept. 5th; Emmett's and Boise City, Idaho, from Sept. 5th to Sept. 19th; Salt Lake City, for Convention of Utah Liberals, Sept. 24th and 25th, and then Eastward by Canon City, Denver, etc., for Chicago in November.

Persecution for Opinion's Sake.

Ever since civilization and enlightenment began, those who hav evolved new theories or adopted unpopular views hav been maligned, abused, persecuted, and sometimes treated to a dungeon cell. In former times, when people were very superstitious and ignorant, and closer kin to the brute creation, the rack, the thumb-screw, the ax, the gibbet, were freely used in trying to suppress freedom of speech and of thought. But it was impossible to crush out liberty and right. The sense of the best part of humanity always believed that to speak his honest thought is every free man's right, and to-day, in consequence of that right, in consequence of the world's progress, there is less persecution in it than ever before.

Yet, there is still too much of it for the world's good. Men and women suffer daily for opinion's sake, and will until all cruelty, hatred, and malignity are banished forever out of the world.

"Aunt Elmina," whom you know as the author of "Little Lessons" and other books, has, as you are aware, been arrested, not long ago, on a charge of using the United States mails in a wrong way. She is greatly distressed in consequence of the arrest, and feels that she, too, is persecuted for opinion's sake.

How true, or untrue, the charge against her may be, the trial in October next will determin; but we, who hav known her for a truly good woman; who hav read her books, essays, and sensible ideas in many newspapers; hav known how her heart has gone out time and again to the aged, the poor, the destitute, and unfortunate, cannot feel that she has wilfully transgressed the laws of the land, or that she has intended any wrong whatever. She may hav been indiscreet, imprudent, unwise in her choice of methods, as viewed from our standpoint, and not hers; her way may be entirely different from our way; but for that, we should not condemn her or turn the cold shoulder in the hour of her extremity. Let us esteem her for the good that she has done, for the noble and valuable work she has contributed to the world; for her kind heart, her love for the human race and zeal to benefit the same, which last may hav been the means of drawing her into the vortex of trouble in which she is now plunged.

E. W. Chamberlain, treasurer of the National Defense Association, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 30th called for testimonials certifying to the good works that she has done; and surely we can all testify, and gladly, to her ability as a writer and reformer, and the benefit that many hav received from her hands.

We all like to hav our friends stand by us, and it is noble not to desert a friend in the hour of need—the hour when a friend is a friend indeed, for it is in the time of trial and adversity that friends show their true worth—and let us all assure "Aunt Elmina" of our appreciation of all her good works, and also of our sympathy in the misfortune that has befallen her. The children, by mentioning her kindly in their little letters, will help to make her heart glad in this hour of sorrow and trouble.

Christianity and Civilization.

It is often said that Christianity has contributed to the civilization of the world. It is asserted that arts, sciences, and material improvements hav followed in the footsteps of its missionaries; that when the Bible is introduced, man quits his savage state, and advances toward a higher condition. Such statements are contradicted both by reason and fact.

It is not possible that a religion founded upon mystical records of the dreams of illiterate savages could foster civilization. Man's improvement has been built upon facts capable of proof, and knowledge gained by experience. Christianity is erected upon visions and delusions. When Jacob, out of the many gods of his ancestors, chose Jehovah for his god, he made the selection owing to a dream that he had in his sleep. When this same Jehovah sent his son to redeem the world, the knowledge that he was his son, born of a virgin, and not a mere man, begotten like other men, was communicated to Joseph in a dream. When the law of Moses concerning meats clean and unclean was abolished, it was because Peter dreamed a dream. This is the teaching of the Bible. It is not the teaching by which peoples are civilized. It is the teaching which keeps them in ignorance, and binds them to poverty and slavery. When they come out of those conditions and advance to a better state, they awake from sleep, and cast away the memory of dreams. Night with its drowsy slumbers is past for them, and by the bright light of day they investigate, they test, they prove, they accept, or they reject.

A religion which teaches its disciples to despise this life and consider it as only a passage to another, can never civilize the world. It is the savage who is content to liv from day to day as best he can, hoping, when he dies, to pass to some happier spirit land. If he emerges from that condition, cultivates the earth and makes it bring forth harvests, adopts means of making life more useful and beautiful, it is because he recognizes the advantages resulting therefrom in this world, and not because he submits his intellect to a religion which teaches him to count this life as nothing and urges him to take no thought for the morrow. If he abandons violence toward his fellows and acts with justice and propriety, it is because he learns that such conduct is most conduciv to his interests here, and not because he has adopted a religion which teaches him that rewards and punishments belong to a future state, and that every offense may be pardoned at the eleventh hour.

Civilization, instead of advancing with Christianity, has ever receded where she has placed her foot. Thousands of years before Jesus was born, there were mighty civilizations. There was that of Rome, mistress of the world. Arts, science, and letters flourished under her government. A religion which, however false, had at least a poetic beauty and a refining influence wanting in more modern theologies, was here. Where the Roman eagle advanced, uncultured man abandoned his rude ways. He wandered no more about the forest, depending upon the chances of the chase to save him from starvation. Along the great Roman roads that stretched over the known world, the fruits of industry were carried. If wrong were done, even in remote corners of her colonies, the citizen of Rome could turn to his protecting mother, claiming his right. Christianity itself bears witness to the civilization it found already established, for its Bible tells us that Paul, in the hour of peril, claimed the privilege of a Roman citizen and appealed to Cæsar. But a sad hour came, and Constantine, unworthy successor to a noble line, bowed his neck to the cross. Rome became Christian, and that once mighty organization began to crumble to pieces. Where she had reigned supreme, the savage roamed again. The center whence earthly justice, earthly knowledge, earthly art, had spread over the nations, became the center whence the anathemas of heaven were hurled against all who did not sacrifice this world to win another. The rule of Christ had set in. The age of darkness had commenced. Civilization was lost in the black cloud of a blind faith.

Older even than that of Rome was the civilization of Greece—a thing of beauty and of joy that did not quit the world without leaving behind it a sweet fragrance which delights us still. The songs of its poets are music to our ears, the sculptures of its artists brightness to our eyes in our own day. But the voice of the singer is hushed, the hand of the artist has lost its cunning. Greece became a battle-ground where Jesus and Mohammed struggled for power to lead men to seek a better world by making this world worse. In her land once dwelt the philosopher, the man of letters, the wise legislator, the artist, and the poet. From her ports once sailed the vessels of the wealthy merchant, bearing the fruits of her soil and the manufactures of her cities. In her land dwell now the beggar, the assassin, and the brigand. From her shores sails now the starving fisherman, lazily dreaming of a time to come when he hopes to be transferred to another and a better world. The cross and crescent hav done their work. We look for Grecian civilization to-day, and see only the traces of former loveliness in her beautiful corpse.
